

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. This is a Key-Numbered Volume

Each syllabus paragraph in this volume is marked with the topic and Key-Number section  under which the point will eventually appear in the American Digest System.

The lawyer is thus led from that syllabus to the exact place in the Digests where we, as digest makers, have placed the other cases on the same point---This is the Key-Number Annotation.

STATE v. COVINGTON.

Criminal law §200(4)—Acquittal bar to prosecution for offense arising out of same transaction.

Defendant having been acquitted on a charge of violating the Act of 1917, c. 12, which in sections 1, 2, and 3 denounces the offenses of receiving, possessing, and transporting liquors, cannot, though only one of the three separate offenses was charged, be prosecuted for others denounced arising out of the same transaction, for section 6 limits the fine in such cases to $500 and imprisonment to six months, and to allow the state to split the same transaction into three indictments might result in the imposition of triple penalty.

Error to Circuit Court, Haywood County; Thos. E. Harwood, Judge.

Shane, alias Shang, Covington, was indicted for violating the liquor laws, and, plea of former acquittal having been sustained, the State brings error. Affirmed.

W. H. Swiggart, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

Bond & Bond, of Nashville, for defendant in error.

MCKINNEY, J. The defendant in error was indicted at the January term, 1919, of the circuit court of Haywood county for violating the liquor laws. The indictment contained two counts, the first charging the defendant in error with unlawfully receiving intoxicating liquors, and the second with unlawfully being in the possession of intoxicating liquors.

At the next term of the court the defendant in error interposed a plea of former acquittal, which was sustained by the court, and the defendant in error was discharged.

In said plea of former acquittal the defendant in error set out that he had been tried and had been given a verdict of not guilty upon an indictment returned at the May term, 1918, charging that in April, 1918, he "did transport into this state and from one place to another in this state and within the county aforesaid, intoxicating liquors, including wine, ale and beer, for another person, firm and corporation."

After setting out said former indictment and trial, and the result thereof, and averring that the judgment rendered on said verdict of not guilty was final, the plea concluded with the following averments:

"The defendant says that the offense for which he was acquitted and upon which said judgment of not guilty was pronounced is the identical offense as the one charged the defendant in this case, and that the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine said case and to pronounce said judgment.

"The defendant further says that the facts upon which the presentment above set out was predicated and based are the identical facts upon which the presentment is predicated and based in the present case."

The Attorney General moved the court to strike out said plea of a former acquittal because it did not charge the same offense. The court overruled said motion, and, the state having declined to take issue, the court thereupon dismissed the case. From this action of the court the state prayed and was granted an appeal to this court.

The first three sections of chapter 12 of the Acts of 1917 are as follows:

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Tennessee, that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to receive, directly or indirectly, intoxicating liquors including wine, ale and beer, from a common, or other carrier, in this state, whether intended for personal use, or otherwise, and whether interstate or intrastate shipments or transportation.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to possess intoxicating liquors, including wine, ale and beer, hereafter received, directly or indirectly, from a common or other carrier in this state, whether intended for personal use or otherwise, and whether interstate or intrastate shipments or transportation.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that it shall be unlawful for any express company, railroad company, or any common carrier or person to ship or transport into this state or from one place to another within this state, intoxicating liquors including wine, ale and beer, for any person, firm or corporation, whether in original packages or otherwise and whether intended for personal use or otherwise."

The punishment prescribed for violating the provisions of said act is contained in section 6 thereof, which is as follows:

"Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, that any person, firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction, be fined not less than fifty dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, and in the discretion of the court may be imprisoned in the county jail or workhouse for a period of time not exceeding six months."

Had the original indictment contained three counts charging, respectively, (a) receiving, (b) possessing, and (c) transporting liquors, and had the jury found the defendant guilty on all three counts, under the provisions of the act, the maximum punishment which could have been imposed would have been a fine of $500 and an imprisonment of six months.

The plea, which must be taken as true, says that this was one transaction, so that if the state were permitted to split this one transaction into three parts and charge the defendant with receiving in one indictment—possessing in the second, and transporting in the third—and the defendant should be found guilty in each case, then the court could impose a fine of $500, and an imprisonment of six months in each case. While the statute only contemplated a maximum fine of $500, and an imprisonment of six months for the entire transaction.

The principle involved is thus stated in 16 Corpus Juris, 272, to wit:

"There is also another rule which declares that, if the prosecution under the second indictment involves the same transaction which was referred to in the former indictment, and it was or properly might have been, the subject of investigation under that indictment, an acquittal or a conviction under the former indictment would be a bar to a prosecution under the last indictment. This rule is sometimes called the 'same transaction test.'"

This text is supported by a great many authorities.

It is well illustrated in our case of Fiddler v. State, 7 Humph. 508, in which the defendant was presented for betting on a horse race. To this indictment the defendant pleaded that he had been indicted for running a horse race along a public road, and had been convicted thereof on his own confession, and punished therefor; and that said horse race for running which he had been so convicted and punished, and the horse race for betting on which he is presented, is one and the same horse race. To this plea the Attorney General demurred. The court sustained the demurrer, and fined the defendant. The statute involved was section 2 of chapter 10 of the Acts of 1833, which provides that—

"Be it enacted, that all and every person betting or running, aiding and abetting in running any horse race in or along any public road in this state, shall be liable to be indicted under the same rules and provisions as are now in force and use in this state against unlawful gaming."

It will be noticed that this act prohibits (a) betting on a horse race, and (b) running a horse race.

This court reversed the trial court, holding the plea of former conviction to be good. The court held that there was but one transaction, and hence the matter of gaming, by betting on a horse race, was a proper subject of investigation under the first indictment. In the first indictment the state could have included a count for betting, but the state has no right to split up one transaction of this nature into parts, and find an indictment on each part.

In Hite v. State, 9 Yerg. 379, an entirely different principle was considered, and the question there involved has no bearing upon the present case.

We are of the opinion that the trial judge was correct in dismissing the case, and his judgment is affirmed.

LANDSEN v. CITY OF JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. May 31, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations \S 812(5) — One city commissioner cannot waive requirement of notice of injury.

Even if the statutory requirement of notice to a city of claim for personal injuries can be waived by the governing body of the city, one of the city commissioners has no authority to waive such requirement.

2. Municipal corporations \S 812(5)—Ratification of commissioner's promise to pay hospital expenses does not waive notice of injury.

Ratification by the governing body of the city of the promise of one of the commissioners that the city would pay the hospital expenses of plaintiff for an examination of her injuries is not a waiver of the requirement that notice of claim for injuries be given the city.

3. Municipal corporations \S 812(5)—Officer's waiver of right to notice can be ratified only by formal action.

A municipality can, in the absence of fraud or imposition, ratify an act of its officer in waiving the statutory requirement of notice of claim for injuries only by formal action taken by the proper officials.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Madison County; R. B. Baptist, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Maggie Lansden against the City of Jackson. Judgment dismissing the suit and sustaining demurrer to the declaration was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals and the case remanded for hearing, and defendant appeals. Case dismissed.

W. N. Kay, of Jackson, for appellant.

R. F. Spragins and F. W. Pope, both of Jackson, for appellee.

BACHMAN, J. This suit was instituted by Mrs. Maggie Lansden against the city of Jackson to recover for injuries alleged to have been suffered by her on or about the 6th of August, 1917, by reason of the defective condition of one of the sidewalks in said city. A demurrer was filed on behalf of the city on the grounds that no notice of the plaintiff's claim had been served upon the mayor of the city, as required by chapter 55 of the Acts of 1913, and that no facts or circumstances were alleged to show a waiver by the city of the notice provided for. The authority of the city or its officers to waive the provisions of the statute was also challenged. The demurrer was sustained by the trial judge and the suit dismissed. Upon appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals a majority of that court were of opinion that, although notice had not been given, as required by the act referred to, the allegations of the declaration were sufficient to show a waiver on the part of the city, and the judgment of the circuit court was reversed and the case remanded for hearing.

The allegations of the declaration upon which the action of the Court of Civil Appeals is predicated are as follows:

"Plaintiff further avers that, while no written notice was served upon the mayor of said city of said accident and injury within the time prescribed by the state statute upon this subject, yet she avers that the said city did receive and have notice of the accident and injury and the circumstances connected with same, on the next day after the said accident and injury, and that written notice as prescribed by statute was made unnecessary and a useless formality, and was waived by the city, by reason of the following facts, to wit:

"On the next day after said accident plaintiff sent for Mr. Z. K. Griffin, who was at that time one of the commissioners of the city of Jackson, and informed him of all the facts connected with said accident and injury and as to the manner in which the plaintiff was injured, and thereupon the said commissioner directed the plaintiff to go to a hospital and to have an X-ray examination of her injured parts, and he promised that the defendant city would bear the expense of same; that at the next meeting of the board of commissioners of said city, to wit, on the following day, the said Z. K. Griffin, commissioner, reported the facts in regard to the plaintiff's said injury and his action relative thereto, and of the direction which he had given to the plaintiff, whereupon the other two commissioners, constituting said board, one of which was mayor of said city, approved and ratified the action of said Z. K. Griffin; that on or about December 2 or 3, 1917, plaintiff had another conference with the said commissioner, Z. K. Griffin, in which plaintiff advised the commissioner that she had or was going to leave the hospital where she was being treated; that she had not recovered from said injury, and was looking to the city 'to do the right thing by her,' and the said commissioner thereupon stated that the city would consider her claim and treat her right in the matter; that again prior to March 4, 1918, plaintiff had another conversation with the said commissioner, in which the latter directed the plaintiff to present her claim to the board of commissioners of the city of Jackson, which she did on March 4, 1918, at which time she discussed her claim at length with the board of commissioners, but they failed to reach an agreement; that the mayor of the defendant city thereupon suggested that plaintiff meet the commissioners in conjunction with their attorney, to which plaintiff agreed, and did again appear before said board on April 24, 1918, and her case was again brought up and discussed, and at which meeting the plaintiff was finally informed by the mayor and city attorney that the city would not pay the sum demanded by the plaintiff on account of her said injuries.

"Plaintiff therefore avers that because of the foregoing facts, and by leading the plaintiff to believe that her claim would be adjusted by the city without suit, she was thereby misled, and therefore did not seek legal advice as she would have done, but for the negotiation which she had been drawn into through the representation of said mayor and commissioners, and her rights would have been protected by the giving of the required notice after being so advised by counsel of the necessity of said notice, and so the defendant city waived the written notice as prescribed by statute and is estopped to rely upon the failure to give such written notice as a defense in this case."

Upon these facts it is insisted that the city of Jackson has waived the compliance with the provisions of the act of 1913, and is now estopped to set up as a defense such non-compliance on the part of the plaintiff.

It will be seen that the failure to give the prescribed notice is sought to be excused upon the ground that the city had actual notice through the commissioner Griffin, with whom the plaintiff advised immediately following the injury, that the commissioner directed the plaintiff to go to a hospital and have an examination of her injuries made, and that the city would bear the expense thereof, and that upon report of his action to the other commissioners the same was ratified and approved. Whether municipalities, when acting through their governing bodies, are authorized to waive the provisions of protective statutes, is a question upon which there is a conflict of authority; the weight of authority seems to be that they cannot do so. McQuillin, Municipal Corporations, § 2714; Dillon, Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 1613; Gay v. Cambridge, 128 Mass. 387; Walters v. Ottawa, 240 Ill. 259, 88 N. E. 651; Lucas v. Pontiac, 142 Ill. App. 470; Starling v. Bedford, 94 Iowa, 194, 62 N. W. 674; Huntington v. Calais, 105 Me. 144, 73 Atl. 829; Blumrich v. Highland Park, 131 Mich. 209, 91 N. W. 129; Blair v. Ft. Wayne, 51 Ind. App. 652, 98 N. E. 736.

[1] However, we do not think it necessary to here determine this question, for the reason that in our opinion the facts disclosed do not constitute a waiver by the city of the benefit of the statute. The purpose of the act of 1913, as pointed out in White v. Nashville, 134 Tenn. 688-695, 185 S. W. 721, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 960, was not to benefit municipal officials, but is for the protection of municipal bodies corporate, and it is also held therein that it is not within the power of individual officers or agents of the municipality to waive the required notice.

Assuming that the governing body of the city of Jackson had authority to waive notice to the city, it has not done so in the instant case; for, in the absence of a proper showing of authority, the acts or declarations of the commissioner Griffin could in no wise be binding upon the municipality.

In Nashville v. Toney, 10 Lea, 643, in passing upon the question of the authority of the mayor of a municipality to revive an indebtedness of the city, barred by the statute of limitations, it was said:

"We have not been referred to any authority, either in the charter, ordinances or resolutions of the city, and can find none, which authorizes or empowers the mayor, by his individual or sole promise, to bind the city for any purpose, and hence we presume there is none. And as will be seen by the provisions of the above-cited ordinances, he is prohibited from doing so, unless authorized by existing laws, or by order of the city council. It is scarcely deemed necessary to cite authorities to show that without such authority he has no power to do so. In the case of Mayor and City Council of Nashville v. J. G. Fisher et al., decided at Nashville, 1875, unreported, this court, Judge Freeman delivering the opinion, says: 'We hold the principle to be sound, as stated by the Supreme Court of New Jersey, Sachem v. Seymour, 24 N. J. R. 153, that the powers of a municipal corporation can only be exercised by the governing, legislative body of such corporation, * * * in pursuance of authority given from such governing body, in the form of an ordinance, or legislative enactment of such body, or in pursuance of powers granted or conferred in the charter by the Legislature.' See, also, Mayor, etc., v. Hagan, 9 Baxt. 495; Belote v. Wynne, 7 Yerg. 341; Muse v. Donelson, 2 Humph. 166. While we have no doubt but that these promises had the effect to lull the plaintiff into security, and may cause a loss which to her may be serious, yet it is clear that these promises of the mayor were unauthorized and not binding on the defendant, and hence inoperative to prevent the bar of the statute. And for this error in the charge of the court and in the admission of testimony as above indicated, we are compelled to reverse the judgment and grant a new trial."

The principle there announced was reaffirmed in Taylor v. Railroad, 86 Tenn. 249, 6 S. W. 400; the court saying:

"The doctrine of this case we regard as conclusive upon the question of the want of authority of its officers 'to bind the city by their declarations or representations. If they could not do so by express agreement, it must logically follow that they could not do so by indirection, such as an estoppel would be."

So, in Cole v. Seattle, 64 Wash. 1, 116 Pac. 257, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1166, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 344, it is said:

"The city council is the only authority which, under the organic law of the city, can take cognizance of such claims, and it necessarily follows that it is the only authority which can waive compliance with the charter. * * * We therefore hold that a compliance with the reasonable terms of the charter provision cannot be waived by statements or acts of any officer or employé or any other than the city council, and that to establish a waiver by the council some affirmative cognizance of the claim, other than the rejection by the council, must be pleaded and proved."

But it is contended that the city ratified and approved the acts of the commissioner and is therefore bound. In answer to this insistence it is to be seen that, according to the allegations of the plaintiff, legal notice of her claim was not presented to the mayor or board of commissioners until about five months after the happening of the accident and nearly two months after the expiration of the ninety days provided by the statute, and action by the city was not taken thereon until a later date.

[2, 3] If it could be held that the allegations are sufficient to constitute a ratification by the city of the acts of the single commissioner, such could extend no further than to the statements made by him to the plaintiff, which in the most liberal view, cannot be construed as a waiver of the city's right under the statute. However this may be, we think that the stability and certainty of the acts of a municipal corporation, particularly in dealing with protective rights granted the corporate body by statute, demand far more than informal action by corporate officials; there must be definite legal action by the proper officials before the municipality can be bound. There may be, of course, cases where fraud or circumstances of imposition would lead to a different conclusion; but the allegations here make no such showing.

The case will be dismissed.

FAIRBANKS, MORSE & CO. et al. v. GAMBILL.

1. Pleading ¶110—Plea in abatement waived by disregard of it by all parties.

Where no replication was filed to plea in abatement and no action thereon invoked after it was filed, but it was entirely ignored by the parties and the court, and the case proceeded with on the merits, the plea in abatement was waived.

2. Appeal and error ¶930(1)—Evidence of party recovering verdict must be accepted.

The Supreme Court must, after verdict for plaintiff, accept as the established facts in the case the version of the plaintiff as to controverted questions of fact.

3. Negligence ¶136(25)—Proximate cause for jury, unless undisputed facts are susceptible of but one inference.

Where the facts are controverted and of such a character that different minds might reasonably draw different conclusions therefrom, the question of proximate cause is for the jury, but when the facts are undisputed and are susceptible of but one inference, the question is one of law for the court, and the same rule applies where an independent intervening cause is relied on by defendant.

4. Negligence ¶59—"Proximate cause" defined.

"Proximate cause" is one of which the injury is a natural and probable consequence, such a consequence as, under the circumstances might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrongdoer.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate Cause.]

5. Explosives ¶7—Proximate cause of injury held for jury.

Where defendant left with plaintiff a can containing gasoline which he stated did not contain any dangerous or explosive substance, and plaintiff, mistaking the can for an oil can of his own, poured it on kindling to light a fire, from which an explosion resulted, the question whether defendant's wrongful act was a proximate cause of the injury was properly submitted to the jury.

6. Explosives ¶7 — Not contributory negligence in law to use kerosene to kindle fire.

It was not contributory negligence as a matter of law for plaintiff to use kerosene to kindle a fire, or to pick up a can of gasoline, left by defendant with the statement that it contained nothing explosive which had been placed where plaintiff ordinarily kept his kerosene can of similar appearance.

7. Negligence ¶100—Contributory negligence no defense to wanton misconduct.

Statement by defendant that a can containing gasoline contained no dangerous or explosive substance constituted willfulness, wantonness, and recklessness on his part, so that he cannot rely on plaintiff's contributory negligence as a defense to liability for injuries caused thereby.

8. Damages ¶131(1)—$5,000 for burns on arm and face held excessive by $2,500.

A verdict awarding $5,000 damages for second degree burns on the arms and first degree burns on the face, which caused considerable pain, but which had entirely healed without permanent injury, leaving only small scars, held excessive, and reduced to $2,500.

Certiorari to Court of Civil Appeals.

Action by Charles H. Gambill against Fairbanks, Morse & Co. and another. Judgment for the plaintiff in the circuit court was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals, and plaintiff brings certiorari. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals modified, and that of circuit court affirmed on condition that plaintiff accepts a remittitur of part of the amount awarded.

E. T. Seay, Jno. B. Keeble, and F. M. Bass, all of Nashville, for plaintiff in error.

W. H. Washington, B. D. Shriver, and J. E. Travis, all of Nashville, for defendants in error.

HALL, J. An action of damages instituted in the circuit court of Davidson county by the plaintiff, Charles H. Gambill, against the defendants, Fairbanks, Morse & Co. and D. K. Lee, to recover for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff as a result of the negligence of the defendants. The trial of the case in the circuit court resulted in verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $5,000.

Defendants' motion for a new trial having been overruled, an appeal in the nature of a writ of error was taken by the defendants to the Court of Civil Appeals. That court reversed the judgment of the circuit court, and dismissed the suit upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict and judgment, and that the defendants' motion for a directed verdict, made at the conclusion of all the evidence, should have been sustained by the trial judge. The Court of Civil Appeals also sustained the defendants' assignment of error going to the excessiveness of the verdict, being of the opinion that the verdict of $5,000 was excessive in view of the nature of the plaintiff's injuries. The plaintiff filed his petition in this court for a writ of certiorari, which was granted, and the case is now before this court for review.

The plaintiff's declaration contains one count, and avers that the plaintiff was working as a laborer for the Tennessee Central Railroad Company at the time of sustaining his injuries, and used in his work a certain office in the railroad yards of said company in Nashville, Tenn.; that the defendant D. K. Lee was demonstrating a motor hand car belonging to the defendant Fairbanks, Morse & Co., which hand car was propelled by gasoline; that said Lee, being the agent of the defendant Fairbanks, Morse & Co., and while acting within the general scope of his authority as such agent, brought into the office of the plaintiff a can, such as is commonly used to contain coal oil, without any mark upon it indicating its explosive qualities and asked permission of the plaintiff to store the can in his (plaintiff's) office, assuring plaintiff at the time that it did not contain anything dangerous or explosive, and "negligently impressed plaintiff with the belief that it was coal oil, entirely harmless, and only had the properties of coal oil, and thereby threw plaintiff off his guard, whereas in truth and in fact it was pure gasoline, a highly volatile and dangerous explosive"; that on the day of the accident, to wit, 28th day of December, 1916, plaintiff, mistaking said can for his own can, which contained coal oil, and which was similar to the can left in the office by the defendant Lee, use it to pour some coal oil on the kindling to start the fire in the office stove, a use entirely harmless and without danger for coal oil or any other oil of similar properties, and while doing so plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care, but that by reason of the negligence of the defendants, and as a proximate result of being deceived and misled as to the identity, nature, and dangerous and explosive qualities of the contents of said can, it took fire and exploded with terrific force and violence, covering plaintiff with sheets of flames, whereby his body, head, face, nose, hands, arms, and legs were severely burned.

Both defendants filed pleas of not guilty. The defendant Fairbanks, Morse & Co., however, first filed a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court upon the ground that it was not in court by proper service of process by reason of the fact that the defendant D. K. Lee, upon whom process was served, was not at the time of the service an officer of the company, but was merely an employé or traveling salesman or solicitor for said defendant company, and was not therefore, such agent or representative as that service of process issued against said defendant could be properly and lawfully executed upon said Lee.

[1] There was no replication filed, or issue joined on said plea in abatement, and no action of the court was in any manner invoked by the defendants upon it after it was filed. So far as the record shows, it was entirely ignored by the parties to the suit and the court, and the case was proceeded with on the merits. This amounted to a waiver of the plea in abatement.

Upon the trial in the circuit court plaintiff testified that during the year 1916 he was in the service of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company as a car inspector in its yards at Nashville; that he had an office in the east end of what was called the old freighthouse; that the defendant D. K. Lee was engaged in the business of demonstrating motor hand cars for the defendant Fairbanks, Morse & Co., that is, hand cars operated by gasoline power; that in the summer of 1916, the defendant Lee was down in the yards of the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, demonstrating a hand car which he had for sale, and which he desired to sell to the Tennessee Central Railroad Company, and that about noon Lee walked into his (plaintiff's) office with a can of oil of some kind in his hand, and asked him if he would allow him (Lee) to leave it there. Plaintiff says that he asked Lee if there were any gasoline about it, and that Lee replied, "No;" that he asked Lee if there were anything dangerous or explosive about it, and that Lee replied, "No;" that thereupon he (Gambill) told Lee that the company (Tennessee Central Railroad Company) had an oil house up there near the shop, and he could go and leave the oil there, and that Lee replied that it was so far up there he did not care to go. The plaintiff says he then stated to Lee that the track walker had an old shanty at the spur track, and that possibly the track walker would let him leave his oil there; that Lee replied, "No, I will just leave it here," and set it down in one corner of the office. Plaintiff further testified that as Lee started out of the office he (Lee) said if anything happened he would be responsible for it. Plaintiff says that he got the impression from the statements made by Lee that the contents of the can were entirely harmless and not explosive. He says the can was an ordinary coal oil can, and was just like the can he (plaintiff) kept in the office, which contained coal oil. The plaintiff testified that he kept coal oil in the office for the purpose of filling his lanterns, and was also in the habit of kindling fires in the office stove with coal oil; that he would usually put kindling in the office stove and pour a little coal oil on it and stick a lighted match to it, and in this way start the fire; that he had been doing this for a long time, and did not regard it as dangerous to do so. Plaintiff further testified that the can remained in his office until the 28th day of December, 1916, when he went into the office early in the morning between 6 and 6:30 o'clock and put some coal and kindling in the stove, and picked up a can which he thought was his own can containing coal oil, which he had been in the habit of using to start the fire, but by mistake got hold of the can which had been left in the office by the defendant Lee, which contained gasoline, and poured it on the kindling in the stove, and it happened that there were some life coals in the stove, which fact was not known to him, as there had been no fire in the stove since the day before the accident, and the can immediately exploded with terrific force, throwing the burning gasoline and fire on his body, seriously burning him about the hands, arms, and face. He testified that other railroad employes had access to his office, and some one had moved his can from the place where he usually kept it, and placed the can containing the gasoline in its stead the night before the explosion without his knowledge.

Plaintiff's testimony as to the representations made to him by Lee as to the contents of the can at the time he left it in the plaintiff's office is substantially corroborated by the testimony of the witness Monroe Bostick, who testified on behalf of the plaintiff. Bostick says that he was in the office of the plaintiff when Lee brought the can in and asked the plaintiff if he could leave it in the office. Bostick says the plaintiff asked Lee what was in the can, stating to Lee that the company did not allow him to keep any explosives in the office. Bostick says that Lee told plaintiff that the can did not contain any explosive; that it wouldn't explode.

The defendant Lee testified on behalf of the defendants, and admitted leaving the can of gasoline in the plaintiff's office; testified that the plaintiff was familiar with the contents of the can, and denied that he told the plaintiff that the can did not contain anything explosive. He testified that the plaintiff did not ask him as to the contents of the can at the time he left it in his (plaintiff's) office, and that he made no representation whatever to plaintiff as to the contents of said can.

[2] The jury, however, settled this controverted question of fact in favor of the contention of the plaintiff, and this court must therefore accept the version of the plaintiff as to the circumstances under which the can of gasoline was left in his office by Lee, and the statements made by Lee as to its contents, as the established facts of the case, and must determine the question of the defendants' liability upon them.

It is insisted by the plaintiff that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in sustaining defendants' assignment of error to the effect that the trial court erred in not directing a verdict in favor of defendants upon their motion made at the conclusion of all the evidence, and in dismissing plaintiff's suit.

Upon the other hand, it is insisted by the defendants that the action of the Court of Civil Appeals was correct, because the proof failed to show that the negligence of Lee, if any, in not advising plaintiff of the contents of the can, which was left in his office, was the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries, but that his injuries were the direct result of the act of the plaintiff in attempting to kindle a fire in the office stove with the contents of said can.

It is further insisted by the defendants that, even if the defendant Lee were negligent in not advising the plaintiff of the contents of said can, and that such negligence directly and proximately contributed to the plaintiff's injuries, still the plaintiff was also guilty of negligence which directly and proximately contributed to his injuries in attempting to use the contents of said can in building a fire in the office stove in which there were live coals, which contributory negligence, it must be held, barred his right to recover.

[3] The general rule is that what is the proximate cause of an injury is a question for the jury; the court instructing them as to what the law requires to constitute it, and the jury applying the law to the facts. But whether the question is one to be determined by the jury depends on the facts of each case. Thus where the facts of the particular case are controverted, and are of such a character that different minds might reasonably draw different conclusions therefrom, a question of fact is presented properly determinable by the jury. See opinion in the cases of J. S. Moody and J. M. Horn v. Gulf Refining Co., 218 S. W. 817, decided at the present term of the court; R. C. L. vol. 22, § 31; Teis v. Smuggler Min. Co., 158 Fed. 260, 85 C. C. A. 478, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 893; Pilmer v. Boise Traction Co., 14 Idaho, 327, 94 Pac. 432, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 254, 125 Am. St. Rep. 161; Stone v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 171 Mass. 536, 51 N. E. 1, 41 L. R. A. 794; Huber v. La Crosse City R. Co., 92 Wis. 636, 66 N. W. 708, 31 L. R. A. 583, 53 Am. St. Rep. 940.

But when the facts are undisputed and are susceptible of but one inference, the question is one of law for the court. Teis v. Smuggler Min. Co., 158 Fed. 260, 85 C. C. A. 478, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 893; Snyder v. Colorado Springs, etc., R. Co., 36 Colo. 288, 85 Pac. 686, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 781, 118 Am. St. Rep. 110; Clark v. Wallace, 51 Colo. 437, 118 Pac. 973, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 349, and note; Illinois Central R. Co. v. Siler, 229 Ill. 390, 82 N. E. 392, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 819, 11 Ann. Cas. 368; Coy v. Indianapolis Gas Co., 146 Ind. 655, 46 N. E. 17, 36 L. R. A. 535; Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Columbia, 65 Kan. 390, 69 Pac. 338, 58 L. R. A. 399; Stone v. Boston, etc., R. Co., 171 Mass. 536, 51 N. E. 1, 41 L. R. A. 794; Smith v. Public Service Corp., 78 N. J. Law, 478, 75 Atl. 937, 20 Ann. Cas. 151.

To the same effect is the rule where an independent intervening efficient cause is relied on by the defendant. R. C. L. vol. 22, § 32; Clark v. Wallace, 51 Colo. 437, 118 Pac. 973, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 355 and note.

[4] In determining what is proximate cause, the true rule is that the injury must be the natural and probable consequence of the act—such a consequence as, under the surrounding circumstances of the case, might and ought to have been foreseen by the wrongdoer as likely to flow from his act.

Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653.

In Deming v. Merchants' Cotton Press, etc., Co., 90 Tenn. 306, 17 S. W. 89, 13 L. R. A. 518, this court said:

"The proximate cause of an injury may, in general, be stated to be that act or omission which immediately causes or fails to prevent the injury; an act or omission occurring or concurring with another, which, had it not happened, the injury would not have been inflicted."

This definition was approved in the later cases of Railroad v. Kelly, 91 Tenn. 699, 20 S. W. 312, 17 L. R. A. 691, 30 Am. St. Rep. 902, Anderson v. Miller, 96 Tenn. 35, 33 S. W. 615, 31 L. R. A. 604, 54 Am. St. Rep. 812, and Chattanooga Light, etc., Co. v. Hodges, 109 Tenn. 331, 70 S. W. 616, 60 L. R. A. 459, 97 Am. St. Rep. 844.

[5] The plaintiff's declaration avers a state of facts which show that the defendant Lee willfully and deliberately misrepresented the contents of said can to the plaintiff at the time he left it in his office, in that he told the plaintiff that it did not contain gasoline or any other explosive substance. The averments of the declaration are amply sustained by the proof offered on behalf of the plaintiff. While the plaintiff does not expressly so testify, it may be inferred from his testimony that if he had been advised that the can contained an explosive substance he would not have permitted the defendant Lee to leave it in his office. If the can had not been left in plaintiff's office by the defendant Lee it is certain that the accident, which resulted in injury to the plaintiff, would not have happened.

We are of the opinion that the question of whether or not the defendant Lee's act in leaving the can in the plaintiff's office, and stating to him that it did not contain anything dangerous or explosive, was the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries was one for determination by the jury. We are of the opinion that the question of whether the defendant Lee should have reasonably anticipated that plaintiff might, through mistake, undertake to use the contents of the can for some of the purposes for which kerosene or coal oil is ordinarily used, and in doing so would sustain injury, was one for determination by the jury. We do not think it can be said, as a matter of law, that the defendant Lee could not reasonably have anticipated that such a result would happen from the leaving of the can in the plaintiff's office under the circumstances which the proof shows it was left. It is a matter of common knowledge that coal oil is generally used for illuminating purposes, both in lamps and lanterns, and is also commonly used for kindling fires, and that it is generally kept on every premises for one or both of these purposes, and in cans similar to the one left by the defendant Lee in the plaintiff's office, containing gasoline.

In Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Deselmes, 18 Okl. 107, 89 Pac. 212, the defendant sold to Powers & De Selmes two barrels containing a mixture of coal oil and gasoline, as ordinary coal oil. The two barrels were emptied into a galvanized iron tank in their store. The plaintiff was a clerk of Powers & De Selmes, and carried two gallons of this oil to his home, and this oil became ignited while the plaintiff's wife was undertaking to kindle a fire in the stove. The evidence leading to that conclusion was circumstantial. The defendants sought to invoke the doctrine of contributory negligence upon the part of the plaintiff's wife in using the oil to kindle the fire in the stove. The court, in its opinion, said:

"With reference to the charge of contributory negligence contained in the answer of plaintiff in error, no proof having been introduced other than is shown by the general evidence in the case, which raises a presumption that the wife of defendant in error was at the time of the accident engaged in the act of kindling a fire with the use of the oil, we cannot hold that such defense is sustained. The use of coal oil for such purpose is too common and too well known for the court to say that it was negligence on her part to so use it, beside the instinct of self-preservation justifies the presumption that in so using it she did so with due care."

In Ellis v. Republic Oil Co., 133 Iowa, 11, 110 N. W. 20, the court said.

"The use of kerosene in kindling fires is too common and too well known for us to say that a person using reasonable care may not employ that agency without being chargeable with negligence."

In Peterson v. Standard Oil Co., 55 Or. 511, 106 Pac. 387, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 625, the court said:

"The common knowledge of the community is that its [kerosene] primary use is for the purpose of illumination; that secondarily it is used in oil stoves for heating purposes. It is also used for the purpose of removing grease and oils from wood or iron, and for kindling fires, as well as for many other purposes. Its use for any of these purposes is not uncommon, and we think that the employment of it for the purpose of kindling fires is not in itself negligence."

[6, 7] The fact that the plaintiff mistook the can containing the gasoline for his can, which contained coal oil, the two cans being identical, is not at all unreasonable or unnatural; and we are of the opinion that the defendants cannot be heard to say, after leaving the can containing a highly volatile fluid in the plaintiff's office, assuring him that it contained nothing dangerous or explosive, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in mistaking the can containing gasoline for his own can, which contained coal oil, and in attempting to kindle a fire in the office stove with its contents. The representations made by the defendants to the plaintiff as to the contents of the can were false and fraudulent, and constituted such willfulness, wantonness, and recklessness on his part as to show an utter disregard for the plaintiff's rights. This being true, the doctrine of contributory negligence cannot be invoked by the defendants to defeat his right to recover.

In view of the facts the defendants are responsible for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiff, even if it could be said that he were guilty of negligence in undertaking to kindle a fire in the office stove with what he thought to be coal oil. Railroad v. Roe, 118 Tenn. 601, 102 S. W. 343; Birmingham R., etc., Co. v. Jung, 161 Ala. 461, 49 South. 434, 18 Ann. Cas. 557. In both of these cases the rule is announced that contributory negligence is not available as a defense where the injuries complained of were caused by the wanton or willful misconduct of the defendant.

We are of the opinion, therefore, that the Court of Civil Appeals committed error in sustaining the defendants' motion for a directed verdict, and in dismissing the plaintiff's suit.

The defendants also filed a petition for writ of certiorari, seeking to have reviewed the action of the Court of Civil Appeals in refusing to pass on certain other assignments of error made by them in that court.

We have passed on these assignments of error, and have discussed them in a memorandum opinion, and they need not be discussed here. It suffices to say that none of them are sufficient to vitiate the verdict and judgment, and call for a reversal.

[8] Now, coming to the plaintiff's further assignment of error that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding that the verdict of the jury was excessive, we are of the opinion, after a careful reading of the evidence bearing upon the plaintiff's injuries, that the verdict was excessive. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was burned about the hands and forearms, and that there were some slight burns about his face and head. The physician who attended him testified that all of these burns were first and second degree burns. The physician described the first degree burns as being those where there was a simple reddening of the skin, the burns not being sufficient to cause blisters, that the second degree burns were those which cause blisters and cause the skin to peel off, and that third degree burns were those of sufficient severity and depth to cause the flesh of the burned member to slough. According to the testimony of the physician the worst burns the plaintiff had were on his hands and forearms, and he says that these were second degree burns. The evidence does show that the skin peeled off of the plaintiff's hands and forearms, and left some scars upon both his hands and his forearms; but there is no evidence tending to show that he is permanently injured. There is no evidence tending to show that he incurred any expenses in the way of hospital bills or for medical treatment. While it is true that he was confined in the hospital 22 days, his hospital bill was paid by the railroad company. Furthermore, the proof fails to show that he lost anything in the way of earnings while he was injured. The evidence does show that his injuries were very painful for at least a few days, but that he has fully and permanently recovered; there remaining only some scars on his hands and forearms as a result of said burns.

We are of the opinion that the sum of $2,500 would be ample compensation for the injuries sustained by the plaintiff. It results that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals will be modified, in so far as it sustained the defendants' motion for a directed verdict and dismissed the plaintiff's suit; but its action in holding that the verdict in plaintiff's favor is excessive will be affirmed. And a remittitur is ordered; and, unless the same is accepted by the plaintiff, the judgment will be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. If the remittitur is accepted, the judgment, less the amount of the remittitur, will be affirmed, with costs.

Appeal and error §581(2, 8), 756—Instructions not considered where there is no reference to motion for new trial or showing of exceptions saved.

Where, on appeal, there is no reference to the motion for new trial either in the abstract or the brief of appellant, and the abstract does not show that exceptions were saved to the giving of an instruction, such instruction cannot be considered.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Woodruff County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by Bailey & Co. against W. J. Loveless and others to recover the amount of a draft. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jonas F. Dyson, of Cotton Plant, for appellants.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellants instituted this action below against appellees to recover the amount of a draft drawn on the latter by one Saxton, payable to appellants, it being alleged that appellees received the draft into their possession and thereafter willfully destroyed it without paying same. Liability of appellees is asserted under section 137 of the Negotiable Instruments Law (Act No. 81 of 1913), which provides that if the drawee destroys a bill he will be deemed to have accepted the same. The case has been here before on appeal. 126 Ark. 257, 190 S. W. 430.

It appears from the testimony as abstracted that there was an issue in the case as to whether appellees' agent destroyed the draft, and, if so, whether it was done willfully or merely by accident. Appellants undertook to prove by admissions of appellees' agent that he deliberately threw the draft in the waste basket and burned it; but the proof adduced by appellee tended to show that the draft was not intentionally destroyed, but merely that it could not be found at the time, and that if it was destroyed at all it was done by accident.

The sole ground urged here for reversal of the cause is that the court erred in giving an instruction at the request of appellees on the subject of burden of proof. There is no reference to a motion for new trial either in the abstract or the brief of appellant. Neither does the abstract show that exceptions were saved to the giving of the instruction. These omissions are fatal to appellants' contention. The rules of this court require an abstract of the record, and in the absence of a recital in the abstract, showing that exceptions were properly saved at the time to the alleged erroneous ruling of the court and brought forward in the motion for new trial, we must assume that no such exceptions were saved.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed.

Railroads §350(16) — Automobile driver's negligence in failing to stop held for jury.

In an action for damages to an automobile struck by a train, evidence that other tracks were blocked with cars, that plaintiff slowed down his car and looked and listened, that the locomotive was not working steam, and that no whistle was blown nor bell rung, held to make the issue as to whether plaintiff should have stopped his car before crossing the track one for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Columbia County; Chas. W. Smith, Judge.

Separate suits by J. F. Gunnells and P. N. Bustion against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, to recover for injuries to person and property. Judgment for J. F. Gunnells, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Upthegrove and J. R. Turney, both of St. Louis, Mo., and Gaughan & Sifford, of Camden, for appellant.

McKay & Smith, of Magnolia, for appellees.

SMITH, J. Separate suits were filed against the appellant railroad company by appellees, J. F. Gunnells and P. N. Bustion. The complaints were identical, each one claiming a separate personal injury, and, in addition, Gunnells claimed damages to his automobile on account of a collision between the auto in which they were riding and a locomotive on the line of appellant's railroad. The jury returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff J. F. Gunnells and assess his damages sustained to his automobile in the sum of $134, and as to the other issues we find for the defendant."

This verdict conclusively shows that the jury found nothing on account of personal injury for either plaintiff, although the testimony shows that each sustained a slight injury, for which compensation might have been allowed. Judgment was pronounced upon this verdict, and the railroad company has appealed.

The instructions requested by the railroad company would, if given, have directed a verdict in its favor, as they in effect told the jury it was the duty of the occupants of the car to have stopped the car before driving over the tracks. The court refused instructions to that effect, and, over appellant's objection, gave an instruction numbered 5 reading as follows:

"You are instructed that the plaintiff, in attempting to pass over defendant's track at the crossing, is only required to do what a man of ordinary care would do under similar circumstances to avoid any probable or possible danger from a passing train, and, if need be, stop as well as look and listen. If you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff in approaching the track at the crossing slowed up his automobile, looked and listened, and did not hear the approaching train, and did not hear any whistle blowing and any bell ringing, and that he could not see the approach of the train on account of the obstruction between him and the train, and you further find that this was all that a man of ordinary care would do under similar circumstances, then it will be your duty to find that the plaintiff is not guilty of contributory negligence, notwithstanding you find that the plaintiff did not bring his automobile to a full stop."

The testimony developed the following facts: The main line of the railroad runs east and west through the town of McNeil, and a number of tracks are situated south of the main track. There is a sharp curve in the main track to the north on the west side of the town at about the point where the whistle is usually blown for the station. On the morning the accident occurred all the tracks south of the main track were blocked with cars for some distance west of the crossing. Appellees were going north, and when they reached the crossing, which is of considerable width on account of the number of tracks, they slowed down the car, put it in low gear, and looked and listened and continued to look and listen for a train, and, not hearing one, drove on over the crossing without seeing the engine until they were within about five or six feet of it and too close to avoid the collision. The engineer admitted that the engine was not working steam, but that the train rolled into the station under its own momentum, and, according to the testimony offered on appellees' behalf, the whistle was not blown nor was the bell rung. The failure to blow the whistle or ring the bell constituted the negligence complained of, and the jury's verdict has resolved in appellees' favor the conflict in the testimony on that question.

We think the testimony recited made a case for the jury; in other words, we are unable to say as a matter of law that appellees should have stopped their car before crossing the tracks. Indeed, appellees insist that, if they had stopped the car, they could not have seen the train or its smoke, as very little smoke was escaping, and that it was making no noise which they could have heard, and that, if they had stopped the car and had gotten out and walked up to the main track and looked in both directions, the train could have reached the crossing in the time it would have taken them to have gone back to the car and made it to the main track. Of course, one of the occupants of the car might have flagged it across the tracks; but the jury had the right to say whether due care on appellees' part imposed that duty. Appellee owned the car and was driving it. The instructions set out above told the jury that it was appellees' duty to do what men of ordinary care would have done under the circumstances; and we cannot say their conduct fell below that standard.

In the case of St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Stacks, 97 Ark. 410, 134 S. W. 317, substantially the same contention was made as is presented here, and it was there said:

"The evidence for appellee shows that neither the whistle was sounded nor the bell rung for the crossing; and while the omission of the engineer to give these statutory signals did not relieve appellee of the duty of looking and listening for the approach of trains, yet they are warnings which he had a right to rely on in determining whether a train was drawing near. According to appellee's own testimony, his view of an approaching train from the east was obstructed by box cars, both on the south and middle tracks. In such case, while the traveler must not relax his endeavor to see approaching trains, yet necessarily he relies to a great degree upon his sense of hearing to discover the approach of a train, and in doing this he listens not only for the noise made by the running of the train but for the signals which the engineer is required to give by ringing the bell or sounding the whistle for the crossing. Appellee's testimony tends to show that he was in possession of all his faculties and continually exercised them during his passage over the crossing. The testimony adduced by him shows that the headlight was dim, and on that account its rays did not warn him. It is admitted that the steam had been shut off, and that the train was drifting or gliding in, and on this account the jury might have inferred that the train came in with little noise, and no smoke escaping to give warning of its approach, that it had rounded the curve before appellee came upon the crossing, and that for this reason he could not see it on account of the box cars obstructing his view. If he could have seen it after it passed the curve, the jury might have found that it would have done no good for him to have stopped his wagon between the south and middle tracks to have tried to look between the box cars on those tracks."

The doctrine of that case was reiterated in the recent case of Billingsley v. St. L. S. F. R. Co., 136 Ark. 1, 206 S. W. 43.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

RELIANCE LIFE INS. CO. v. HARDY.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Continuance ¶12—For illness of counsel within discretion of court.

Defendant life insurer's motion for postponement of trial on account of the illness of its leading counsel was addressed to the discretion of the trial court.

2. Continuance ¶12—Motion properly denied where defendant knew of illness of counsel.

Where defendant life insurer knew its leading counsel was ill, and should have anticipated services of other counsel might be necessary, but failed to take steps to procure them, trial court did not abuse discretion in overruling insurer's motion for postponement of trial on account of illness of counsel.

3. Insurance ¶360(3)—Life policy not forfeited for nonpayment of premium where insurer had funds belonging to insured.

Where an insurer, on last day of grace for payment of $19.88 quarterly premium on life policy, had in its hands $20 belonging to insured as a benefit payable to him under a health policy issued by insurer, it cannot claim the life policy was forfeited for insured's failure to pay the quarterly premium; if insurer had in its possession funds belonging to insured derived from any source, it was its duty to appropriate and apply them to prevent forfeiture.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Phillips County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by Velma Hales Hardy against the Reliance Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Milton B. Rose, of Memphis, Tenn., for appellant.

Moore & Vineyard and Fink & Dinning, all of Helena, for appellee.

WOOD, J. On July 3, 1916, the appellant issued to Eno D. Hardy two policies of insurance. One was a life policy and the other a health policy. They were separate instruments and separate contracts, but between the same parties. The health policy was issued for a period of 12 months and was made payable to the insured, and was not assignable, except by the written consent of the company. The life policy was payable to the executors, administrators, assigns, or beneficiaries of the insured. The annual premium on the health policy was $19.50. The annual premium on the life policy was $56.58. On August 9, 1917, at the request of the insured the premiums on the life policy were made payable quarterly instead of annually, and the beneficiary was changed to the insured's wife, Velma Hales Hardy, the appellee.

August 18, 1917, Eno D. Hardy contracted fistula and was confined on account thereof

10 days, which entitled him to sick benefits under his health policy in the sum of $20. The claim for this sick benefit was sent in to the company, according to the testimony of the appellee, "some time in July or August." "She was not sure about the date." At any rate, there was a delay in paying this claim until November 10th, when the company sent Hardy, by letter, check for $20, which he received November 14, 1917, and signed receipt to the company for the amount thereof, dated November 10, 1917. On the same day Hardy applied to the company to reinstate his policies, remitting to appellant, with his application, the sum of $19.88. This application was declined by appellant on November 17, 1917. Appellant on that day returned to Hardy the amount of his remittance, which he accepted.

The quarterly premium due on October 3, 1917, on the life policy was the sum of $19.88. Under the terms of the policy, if this quarterly premium was not paid one month after the same became due, the policy lapsed. If paid on the 3d of October or one month thereafter, then the policy did not lapse, but continued in force until the next quarterly payment, which was due January 3, 1918.

Hardy, the insured, died on the 20th of December, 1917. The appellee instituted this action on the life policy which was in the sum of $3,000.

The appellant denied liability on the ground that, at the time of Hardy's death, the policy had lapsed, because of the nonpayment of the premium, which in order to keep the policy in force should have been paid on or before November 3, 1917.

The case was called for trial on October 30, 1919. Messrs. Bevins & Mundt had been retained the day before to assist Milton B. Rose, leading attorney for appellant in the trial of the cause. Appellant, through its assistant counsel, asked for a postponement of the trial until a later day of the term, assigning as a reason that they had not had sufficient time to acquaint themselves with the facts and law of the case, and that Milton B. Rose was sick and unable to attend. The court overruled the motion.

The above were the issues and facts developed at the hearing upon which both parties asked for a peremptory instruction. The court granted the prayer of the appellee and instructed the jury to return a verdict in the sum of $3,337.60. Judgment was rendered for the appellee in that sum, from which is this appeal.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling its motion for a postponement to a later day in the term on account of the illness of its leading counsel, Milton B. Rose. The certificate of the physician attached to the motion shows that Rose had been ill all the summer. The issue had been made up for more than 18 months at the time the motion for a postponement was filed. The continued illness of Rose during the summer before the day set for the trial of the cause should have caused the appellant to anticipate that the services of other counsel might be necessary at the trial, and proper diligence on its part would have resulted in the employment of such additional counsel in time for them to have prepared for the trial of the case when the same was called. At least, the motion was addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and we do not discover any abuse of discretion in overruling the motion.

The appellant contends that the undisputed evidence shows that the policy upon which this action was based lapsed and was forfeited on account of the failure of the insured to pay the premium due October 3, 1917, on or before November 3, 1917; the latter date being the last day of grace for the payment of the premium.

[3] Appellant's contention cannot be sustained for the reason that the undisputed evidence shows that on November 3, 1917, it had the sum of $20 in its hands belonging to Hardy, which sum exceeded the amount that was then due the appellant for the premium on the policy in suit. It is of no consequence that this fund accrued to Hardy under the provisions of a different policy from that in suit. The policies were issued on the same day and were between the same parties; but even if that were not true, and if the appellant had in its possession funds belonging to Hardy derived from any source whatsoever, it was the duty of the appellant, in the absence of instructions from Hardy that he desired the use of the funds for some other purpose, to appropriate the same for the payment of his premium when it became due in order thereby to prevent forfeiture of the policy.

The undisputed evidence shows that Hardy was sick in August, 1917, and that his claim for $20 sick benefits which had accrued under his health policy had been sent to the company long prior to October 3, 1917, when the premium was due. Yet the appellant delayed sending him the amount of the sick benefit until after November 3, 1917. If Hardy after making claim for sick benefit had directed the appellant that he desired the use of this amount for some other purpose than the payment of the premium on his life policy, then appellant would not have been warranted in appropriating the funds in its hands for the payment of the premium. But in the absence of such direction, appellant could not hold on to the funds of Hardy until the time for the payment of the premium had expired and then declare a forfeiture for the non-payment of such premium. Since the payment of the premium was for Hardy's benefit, the presumption is that he would have consented thereto. But that matter is not left to presumption, for the undisputed proof here is that he desired to pay his premium and to continue his policy.

Hardy on November 10, 1917, applied for reinstatement and remitted $19.88. On that date he had not yet received the $20 sick benefit which reached him on the 14th, and, of course, he could not know whether the company had allowed his claim for sick benefit and whether it had applied same for the payment of his premium. At the time Hardy receipted the company for the sick benefit fund, the company had not returned to him the $19.88, which he had remitted to it. This remittance was not returned to Hardy until the 17th. So there was no interval from October 3, 1917, until November 14th, when the company did not have money in its hands of Hardy's more than sufficient to have paid his premium.

The appellant, having kept in its hands money of the appellee until after time for the payment of Hardy's premium expired, will not be heard to say, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, that it had no right to use this money to pay the premium and thus prevent a forfeiture of Hardy's policy. In other words, the effect of the undisputed evidence is to show that the premium was paid.

The trial court was correct in so holding and in granting the prayer of appellee for a peremptory instruction in her favor. Although there is some difference in the facts, the case is ruled by the doctrine announced and the principles applied in Union Central Life Ins. Co. v. Caldwell, 68 Ark. 505, 58 S. W. 355, where we said:

"The doctrine does not arise out of the peculiar facts of any particular case. It does not depend upon contract, custom or course of dealing for its existence and potency. It has its origin in that fundamental principle of justice which will compel one who has funds in his hands belonging to another, which may be used, to use such funds, if at all, for the benefit, and not to the injury, of the owner; for his consent to the one, and dissent to the other, will be presumed. * * * These principles are founded upon reason and common fairness and honesty, and they will have application wherever it becomes necessary to prevent a forfeiture, which is favored neither at law nor in equity."

See, also, Nat. Ins. Co. v. Mooney, 111 Ark. 514, 164 S. W. 276; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Henley, 125 Ark. 372, 188 S. W. 829.

The judgment is correct, and is therefore affirmed.

BRADLEY COUNTY ROAD IMPROVEMENT DISTRICTS NOS. 1 AND 2 v. JARRATT et al. (No. 14.)

1. Highways \S 80—State highway department not bound to make preliminary survey, and where it fails district may engage engineers to make same; "may."

The provision of Road Laws 1919, vol. 1, Act No. 237, \S 5, that boards of commissioners of highway districts may make application to the state highway department for preliminary surveys and the department may make such plans and estimates, is not mandatory in view of the word "may," which, while used in a mandatory sense, ordinarily imports permission, possibility, or ability, and hence, as section 6 provides, it shall be the duty of the boards of commissioners to make improvements as expeditiously and as economically as possible, such a board has authority to engage an engineer to make preliminary surveys where the state highway department is unable to make the same for lack of funds.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, May.]

2. Appeal and error \S 839(1)—Questions not disposed of below will not be reviewed.

Questions not disposed of by trial court will not be reviewed on appeal.

Appeal from Bradley Chancery Court; E. G. Hammock, Chancellor.

Suit by E. J. Jarratt and others against the Bradley County Road Improvement Districts Nos. 1 and 2, consolidated with a suit by J. T. Tatum against the same defendants. From decrees of injunction, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

J. R. Wilson, of Warren, for appellants.

W. C. Medley, of Eldorado, and J. C. Clary and B. L. Herring, both of Warren, for appellees.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellees, E. J. Jarratt et al., property owners in Bradley county road improvement districts Nos. 1 and 2, instituted suit against appellants in the Bradley chancery court to restrain them from making a preliminary survey of the roads proposed to be constructed in said districts, created by Act No. 237 of the Legislature of 1919 (Road Laws 1919, vol. 1), and to cancel contracts entered into between the boards of commissioners of said road improvement districts with H. R. Carter, an engineer, to do all the engineering work connected with the improvements to be made and supervision of the construction thereof, at his own expense, for a compensation equal to 5 per cent. of the cost of construction not exceeding $1,000,000 and 4 per cent. in excess of $1,000,000, one-half of the compensation to be paid when the plans, specifications, and estimates of cost of the improvements are completed, and the balance in installments as the work progresses. The validity of the contracts was attacked on the grounds: First, that they embraced the cost of the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of cost of the improvements, which, under the act aforesaid, were to be made and prepared for said districts by the highway department of Arkansas, free of charge; and, second, that the contracts were procured by taking advantage of the ignorance of the commissioners as to the meaning and terms of the act creating the districts and are arbitrary, unjust, and inequitable.

Appellant H. R. Carter filed answer, admitting that he entered into the alleged contracts with said Bradley county road improvement districts, but denying that the boards of commissioners of said districts were without authority to embrace in the contracts the charge for preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of the cost of improvements, and that the contracts were procured through a lack of knowledge on the part of the commissioners as to the meaning of the act creating the districts, or that they are arbitrary, unjust, and inequitable.

Appellee J. T. Tatum, alleged owner of real estate in said districts, also entered suit in said court to enjoin appellants from making a preliminary survey, plans, and estimates of the cost of the contemplated improvements in said district, upon the same grounds alleged in the bill of appellees E. J. Jarratt et al., and the further ground of the alleged invalidity of practically every section of Act No. 237 aforesaid, creating Bradley county road improvement districts Nos. 1 and 2.

Appellant H. R. Carter filed answer to the petition of appellee J. T. Tatum, specifically denying every allegation assailing the validity of his contracts with said improvement districts and the act of the Legislature creating them.

The testimony in the two cases was the same and disclosed that, after the passage of Act No. 237, creating the districts, the commissioners of each met in the office of the state highway commissioner and perfected an organization; that the commissioners thereupon made personal requests of the state highway department to have preliminary surveys made of the roads to be made under said Act No. 237, which requests were refused by the state highway commissioner for the reason that no funds were available for that purpose; that the appropriations were insufficient to cover preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates for proposed districts under the Alexander Road Law, which required preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of costs as prerequisites to the organization of proposed road districts; that only $20,000 had been appropriated for the purpose of making preliminary surveys by the state highway department; that the general and special sessions of the Legislature of 1919 provided that 9,000 miles of roads in the state should be improved; that a preliminary survey thereof would have cost $8 per mile, and a final survey to ascertain the yardage of the road would have cost from $100 to $125 per mile; that the boards of commissioners of Bradley county road improvement districts were informed by the state highway department that they would have to employ an engineer anyway, and he could make the survey under the direction of the state highway department and file the surveys, plans, and specifications with it for approval; that the course suggested was adopted; that three engineers made talks before the boards and applied for the position of engineer of each district, one of whom was H. R. Carter; that Carter did not tell the commissioners they would have to employ him, or use words to that effect; that, later, H. R. Carter was employed as engineer, and entered into written contracts with the commissioners for engineering services, including preliminary, as well as final, surveys, plans, and specifications for the improvements and supervision of the construction thereof, for a fee of 5 per cent. on the cost of said improvements up to $1,000,000 and 4 per cent. in excess thereof.

The causes were submitted to the court upon the pleadings, testimony of the several witnesses, in substance detailed above, the written contracts of employment, and a certified copy of Act No. 237 aforesaid, from which the court found that it was the purpose and intent of section 5 of said Act No. 237 to absolve the property in said districts from the cost of preliminary surveys, plans, and specifications, and to place that burden absolutely upon the state highway department as a condition precedent to proceeding with the improvements. In accordance with this finding, the court rendered decrees against appellants, permanently enjoining them from making the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates as a charge against the land situated in said districts, and from proceeding with the improvements at all until such time as the state highway department shall make the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of cost of more than one type of surface roads and transmit them to the commissioners of said districts. By consent of all parties, both causes were consolidated for the purpose of appeal, and an appeal from the decrees has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1] It is insisted by appellants that the court erred in interpreting sections 5 and 6 of said Act No. 237 as mandatory upon the state highway department to make the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of cost of improvements to be made in said districts free of charge against the lands thereof as a condition precedent to proceeding with the improvements. The requirement in section 5 of said act for the board of commissioners in each district, after qualification, to apply to the state highway department for preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of cost of the proposed improvements, is clearly mandatory; but it is just as clear, from the language used in said section 5, when read in connection with the other sections of the act, that the duty imposed upon the state highway department to make the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of the cost of the improvement at the expense of the state was a sound discretionary one, dependent upon the conditions, facilities, etc. In this respect, the section reads:

"And the state highway department may make such plans and estimates on more than one type of surface for the roads, together with any recommendations that they may see fit to make."

Had the intention been to compel or force the state highway department to make the preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates, the Legislature could have easily employed the word "shall" in this connection, as it did in the first clause of the section, in relation to the application to said department for such surveys. The use of "shall" for "may" would not have been absolutely controlling as to the intent, but, in the connection used, would have been indicative of it. While the word "may" is frequently used in an imperative or mandatory sense, ordinarily its employment in statutes imports permission, possibility, ability, etc. 26 Cyc. 1590. Had the intention been to employ the word "may" in its imperative or mandatory sense in said section 5, the Legislature would certainly have imposed the duty upon the commissioners to adopt one of the preliminary surveys and plans furnished by said department. The section of the act immediately following made it optional with the commissioners whether they would accept the preliminary plans of said department, or some other plan. Again, the intention, in the use of the word "may" in said section 5, as imposing discretionary power only on the state highway department to make preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates, is indicated in the broad mandatory powers conferred on the commissioners of the districts by sections 3 and 7 of said act. Section 3 provides:

"It shall be the duty of the respective boards of commissioners to make the improvements in their respective districts as herein authorized, as expeditiously and economically as possible, and they shall have all the necessary powers to accomplish this purpose."

Section 7 provides:

"For the purpose of assisting them in the preparations of plans for the improvement in said districts, the commissioners of each of said districts may employ such persons as they see fit, including an engineer, and fix their compensation. * * *"

It is apparent, from a reading of these two sections in connection with section 5 of said act, that the intention of the Legislature was that the commissioners should make the same as expeditiously and economically as possible, with the aid of preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of the state highway department, if the conditions as to finances, etc., warranted the department in making them, but, if unable to procure them from the department upon request, then to employ an engineer to assist them in the preparation of the plans and completion of the improvements. No other interpretation of section 5 of said act would give effect to the other provisions of the act and the accomplishment of the improvements intended by the Legislature. The undisputed proof is to the effect that the commissioners requested the state highway department to make the preliminary surveys and that the request was denied for the reason that no funds were available for that purpose.

[2] The appellees contend that the decrees of injunction should be upheld because the engineering contracts were entered into without the exercise of discretion on the part of the commissioners and in ignorance by them of the provisions of the law, and for the further reason that the contracts are arbitrary, unjust, and inequitable. The interpretation placed upon the act by the commissioners, as empowering them to make a contract with an engineer for preliminary surveys, plans, and specifications, when unable to procure them from the state highway department for a good reason, was correct. The reasonableness or unreasonableness of the amount of the fee agreed upon for engineering services was not fully developed by the evidence nor passed upon by the court, so we refrain from expressing an opinion as to whether exorbitant, unjust, or inequitable.

A number of other questions are raised and argued by appellees in support of the injunction decrees, but they were not developed by the evidence or passed upon by the chancellor. The gist of the evidence and the decrees of the court were restricted to the proposition of whether the commissioners had authority under the act to employ an engineer to make preliminary surveys, plans, and estimates of cost of the improvements. Many of the questions raised have been settled adversely to the contentions of appellees in recent opinions written by this court. The other questions not having been developed or passed upon by the chancellor, a decision of them at this time is pretermitted.

For the error indicated, the decrees of injunction are reversed, and the causes remanded, with directions to dissolve the writs and for such further proceedings as may be desired, not inconsistent with this opinion.

FAIRBAIRN v. POFAHL et al. (No. 28.)

1. Vendor and purchaser \S 254(3)—Vendor, giving bond for title and accepting notes, has an equitable mortgage.

Where a vendor sells land, taking the notes of the vendee for the purchase money, and executes a bond for title, the effect of the contract in equity is to create a mortgage in favor of the vendor on the land to secure the purchase money, subject to all the essential incidents of a mortgage.

2. Vendor and purchaser \S 278—Provision for acceleration of payment is valid, though not contained in notes.

Where vendor contracted to sell land, receiving a cash payment and a series of notes, the fact that the notes made no provision that, in case of two defaults, the vendor might declare the entire sum due, does not invalidate such provision in the contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser \S 278—Provision for acceleration of payment not invalid, as working forfeiture.

Where vendor sold land under a contract providing that, in event of two defaults in payment of a series of notes given for the purchase price, he might declare the entire sum due, such provision is not invalid as working a forfeiture, for the purchaser might thereupon pay the entire amount and in event the land was sold on foreclosure of the vendor's equitable mortgage, the purchaser would be entitled to any surplus in excess of the balance due.

Appeal from Pulaski Chancery Court; John E. Martineau, Chancellor.

Action by Minnie E. Fairbairn against J. H. Pofahl and another. From a decree dismissing the complaint, complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Carmichael & Brooks, of Little Rock, for appellant.

A. J. Newman, of Little Rock, for appellee.

SMITH, J. This case was tried in the court below upon the following agreed statement of facts:

On September 16, 1918, appellant entered into a contract to sell E. C. Smith a lot in the city of Little Rock for the sum of $1,200, of which $100 was in cash, and the balance of purchase money was evidenced by 110 notes, for $10 each; the first note falling due October 16, 1918, and one note on the 16th day of each month thereafter, with interest at 8 per cent. The contract of sale provided that, if a second default in payment was made, all the notes then remaining unpaid should at once become due and payable. The contract also provided that Smith should insure the property for appellant's benefit and should keep the premiums paid. Smith failed to insure the property, and made default for four consecutive months in the payment of his notes. Thereafter, for a valuable consideration, Smith assigned his contract to appellees J. H. and Mary Pofahl.

This suit was brought to enforce the contract, and at the time it was brought four notes were due and unpaid. After the suit had been brought and service had, an answer was filed by the Pofahls, in which they asked to be allowed to pay all money past due, and the court fixed a time within which they might do so, together with court costs and an allowance for an attorney's fee. Within the time limited the tender was made, and appellant's complaint dismissed, and this appeal is from that order.

Appellee states the issue to be decided as follows:

"Can the appellant, at her option, declare the residue of the promissory notes of appellees due and foreclose same upon a failure to pay two or more of such notes when due, as provided in the contract of sale, but not so provided or expressed in either or any of said notes?"

[1] This court has several times said that—

"Where a vendor sells lands, takes the notes of the vendee for the purchase money, and executes to him a bond for title, the effect of the contract in equity is to create a mortgage in favor of the vendor upon the land to secure the purchase money, subject to all the essential incidents of a mortgage." Newman v. Mountain Park Land Co., 85 Ark. 208, 107 S. W. 391, 122 Am. St. Rep. 27; Strauss v. White, 66 Ark. 170, 51 S. W. 64, and cases there cited.

[2, 3] The law as thus announced is applicable to the facts of this case. Appellant has in equity a contract having the essential incidents of a mortgage, and it only remains to be decided whether the provision of the contract maturing all the notes in the event of the default stipulated against is valid and enforceable.

It is first insisted that the provision is void for the reason that the stipulation occurs only in the contract, and is not contained in the notes, or any of them. In the case of Farnsworth v. Hoover, 66 Ark. 367, 50 S. W. 865, a mortgage was given to secure a loan of $500, due in five years, and the interest notes each provided that, on failure to pay interest within 30 days after due, the holder might collect principal and interest at once. That provision did not appear in the mortgage securing the notes. It was there contended that the provision maturing the entire debt was void; but the court held otherwise, and in the opinion said:

"The mortgage sufficiently identifies the notes, evidencing the debt which it was given to secure. The mortgage being only a security or incident to the debt, it was not necessary for it also to contain a condition making the whole debt due upon failure to pay any installment of interest, in order to justify foreclosure for the entire debt. It was sufficient that the notes contained such a provision. The notes and mortgage were executed at the same time, and in relation to the same subject, as parts of one transaction constituting one contract. 1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 71, 76, 349, 354; Fletcher v. Daugherty, 13 Neb. 224. In the cases cited to support the opposite view, neither the note nor mortgage contained such a provision as that in the notes sued on herein. In the absence of such a clause in either the note or mortgage, there would, to be sure, be no authority to declare the whole debt due."

Here the bond for title and the notes constituted a single contract, and it is this contract or equitable mortgage which appellant seeks to enforce, and the notes merely evidence the sum due and secured by the contract, and we think the provision accelerating the payments, if otherwise valid, is not rendered unenforceable by reason of the fact that it does not appear in both the contract and the notes. In Jones on Mortgages (7th Ed.) vol. 1, § 76, the law is stated as follows:

"A stipulation that the whole sum shall become due and payable upon any default in the payment of the principal or interest is universally held to be legal and valid. It is not objectionable as being in the nature of a penalty or forfeiture."

A note to the text cites a large number of cases supporting the text quoted. Our own case of Farnsworth v. Hoover, supra, from which we have quoted, is itself authority for upholding the validity of a provision accelerating the maturity of payments, for such was the effect of that decision.

No forfeiture is worked by upholding the provision. Appellees may pay the sum due and the accrued interest, and thus perfect their right to a deed. They may purchase at the foreclosure sale and thus acquire the title; or, if another purchases at that sale and bids a sum in excess of the balance due, appellees will be entitled to that excess. In any event, their rights are not forfeited under the contract. By their default they have accelerated the terms of payment; but this is not a forfeiture.

It follows, therefore, that the court was in error in dismissing appellant's complaint, and that a decree should have been entered for the foreclosure of the lien, and the decree will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

CHAS. F. LUEHRMANN HARDWOOD LUMBER CO. v. COATS & GREEN.
(No. 395.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 10, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 14, 1920.)

1. Sales ¶174 — Insistence for change in manner of inspection breach of contract by buyer.

Where contract of sale of lumber provided that inspection should be made in a certain manner at the mill, an insistence by the buyer that the inspection should be made at delivery as a condition precedent for payment, while contract required payment when loaded, constituted a breach of the contract.

2. Sales ¶174—Breach of contract as to payment warranted seller in refusing to perform.

Where buyer of lumber breached contract of sale by insisting that inspection should be made at place of delivery as condition precedent for payment, while contract required payment when loaded, seller was entitled to refuse to further perform.

3. Appeal and error ¶1012(1)—Findings not clearly against preponderance of evidence not disturbed.

Findings of fact which do not appear to be clearly against the preponderance of the evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Lawrence Chancery Court;
Lyman F. Reeder, Chancellor.

Action by the Charles L. Luehrmann Hardwood Lumber Company against Coats & Green. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oliver & Oliver, of Corning, for appellant.
Smith & Gibson, of Walnut Ridge, for appellees.

SMITH, J. Appellant is a corporation, with its situs in St. Louis, Mo., and is a dealer in lumber. Appellees were a copartnership, and owned and operated a sawmill at Ponder's Switch, about six miles east of Hoxie on the Frisco Railroad. Appellant and appellees entered into a contract in writing on June 6, 1917, whereby appellees, for a price there specified, agreed to saw for appellant 400,000 feet of gum lumber. The contract contained the following provisions:

"To begin cutting by 1st of July, and complete the order in 3 months. Lumber to remain on sticks from 90 to 120 days, or as ordered loaded by C. F. Luehrmann Hw. Lr. Co.

"This order to be followed up with regular stock order from Chas. F. Luehrmann, Hw. Lr. Co."

On August 14, 1917, appellant advanced $500, and on September 9, 1917, made an additional advance of $250, and on each occasion took a bill of sale for certain piles of lumber therein described. Appellees contended that these bills of sales were mere mortgages intended to secure the advances made; but the court found that they were in fact bills of sale, and appellees have prosecuted no appeal from that finding.

A controversy arose between the parties, and appellant brought suit in replevin for the lumber covered by the bills of sale, and by an amended complaint prayed judgment for damages for breach of the contract to deliver lumber. An answer was filed to the original complaint, in which ownership of the lumber replevied was denied; and, while no answer appears to have been filed to the amended complaint, its allegations were treated as being in issue. The cause was transferred to the chancery court, and was tried without any question of misjoinder of causes of action having been made, and as these causes could, under the act of May 11, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 798), have been consolidated and heard together, had they been brought separately, we proceed to a consideration of the merits of the questions presented, as did the court below.

Appellees resisted the claim for damages upon the ground that appellant had breached the contract by a failure to comply with its terms, and had thereby absolved appellee from the legal duty of continued performance. The court below expressly found the fact to be that appellant had failed to make advances upon the lumber; but it does not appear that the contract contained any such requirement.

Under the order of delivery which issued in the cause appellant took possession of the piles of lumber contained in the bills of sale, and, after inspection, shipped it out. The lumber thus shipped measured out 56,984 feet, whereas in the bills of sale the piles so shipped were estimated to contain 70,000 feet, and judgment was prayed for the loss of profits sustained on this difference of approximately 14,000 feet. As to the lumber covered by the bills of sale, the court found that the sums of money there recited as paid were advanced as portions of the purchase money, and that nothing remained to be done except to grade the lumber according to the "National Rules," as provided by the contract between the parties, and to pay the balance of purchase money when so determined. The court found this balance to be $482.33, and rendered judgment in appellee's favor for that amount.

The testimony showed an enhancement of from $10 up per thousand in the market price of the lumber; but the court refused to award any sum as damages for the deficiency of 14,000 feet for the reason that the recitals in the bills of sale as to amount of lumber sold was a mere estimate, and the bills of sale conveyed only the lumber in the piles, much or little, and we are unable to say that that finding is clearly against the preponderance of the evidence.

The court also expressly found the fact to be that appellant had failed to furnish regular stock orders for additional lumber, and had failed to pay in cash for lumber when loaded, and that these defaults in the performance of the conditions of the contract released appellees from further performance on their part, and the correctness of this finding presents the controlling question in the case.

The senior member of the firm of Coats & Green was also the senior member of the firms of Coats & Inman and Coats & Milner, and appellees insist that this was but one partnership, in which Milner bought Inman's interest and, in turn, sold to Green. It is not clear, however, that this statement is correct; and it does appear that Coats operated at least two mills, and one of them under the firm name of Coats & Milner. That firm also had a contract with appellant to saw lumber, and there was a controversy over its terms; but it would, of course, make no difference whether appellant breached its contract with Coats & Milner if it in fact complied with the terms of the contract it had with appellees.

[1] The record contains correspondence between the parties, which shows that the differences between them became accentuated as the correspondence progressed. Appellees were complaining of appellant's failure to inspect and load out the lumber, and in a letter dated March 7, 1918, appellees declared themselves absolved from further obligation to perform because of breaches of the contract on appellant's part. The circumstances stressed in this letter were that a draft drawn to cover three cars of lumber (which had been inspected and loaded and shipped by appellant's representative) had been drawn on, and dishonored by, appellant. A reply to this letter was written in which it was stated that—

"While, if the writer had been in town when this draft was returned, might not have returned it, still I am of the opinion that, without any advice from Mr. Alexander, to the effect that you were going to draw a draft on us for the stock, and if he had advised us you were going to ship this stock subject to delivered inspection, and taking in consideration the fact that the office had no means of knowing how you are in your inspection, it would appear to be perfectly all right for the office to have had a doubt as to the advisability of paying the draft without having specific instructions."

This letter also stated that—

"We think, however, that we should see the lumber before we pay for it practically in full."

The imposition of this condition in regard to inspection operated as a demand that final inspection should be made at the point of delivery, rather than at the point of shipment, and the contract did not give that right.

By the terms of the contract lumber was "to be taken up on grades, National Rules to govern (at prices stated), all f. o. b. a 13-cent rate to St. Louis," and the terms of payment specified in the contract were "2 per cent. for cash when loaded." The lumber was "to be taken up" at the mill, and the contract provided how the inspection would be made, and the insistence that the inspection should be made otherwise or elsewhere, as a condition precedent for payment, while the contract required payment when loaded, constituted a breach of the contract.

[2] One cannot refuse to perform a contract according to its terms, and thereafter insist that the other party perform. So, if, as the court found, appellant had failed to perform the contract, either by furnishing specifications for sawing or in paying for lumber taken up, then it could not thereafter demand, as damages, the profit which would have accrued had appellees continued in the performance of the contract, notwithstanding appellant's prior breach thereof. Gauger v. Sawyer & Austin Lbr. Co., 88 Ark. 422, 115 S. W. 157; Harris Lbr. Co. v. Wheeler Lbr. Co., 88 Ark. 491, 115 S. W. 168; Rodgers v. Wise, 106 Ark. 310, 153 S. W. 253, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1009.

[3] The court's finding of fact appears to be not clearly against the preponderance of the evidence, and will therefore be affirmed.

RUNDELL v. ROGERS. (No. 22.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.)

1. Landlord and tenant §150(1) — Landlord not agreeing to repair cannot be compelled to.

Unless a landlord agrees with his tenant to repair the leased premises, he cannot, in the absence of statute, be compelled to do so.

2. Customs and usages §16—Local custom not provable to render landlord liable for failure to repair.

A local custom cannot be shown to render a landlord liable for failure to make repairs in contravention of the rule that he is not required so to do in the absence of agreement or statute.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Saline County; M. H. Holleman, Special Judge.

Action by Bee Rogers against W. R. Rundell. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

Appellant, pro se.

J. S. Utley, of Benton, for appellee.

WOOD, J. This action was brought by the appellee against the appellant. The appellee alleged that he rented about five acres of land from the appellant which was to be cultivated in corn during the year 1918; that appellee was to pay one-third of what was produced to the appellant; that appellant with the permission of appellee gathered his share of the corn; that in doing so he gathered more than one-third; that the appellant negligently failed to keep the fence in good repair around the land, and thereby negligently permitted hogs to get in the field and to eat and destroy all the corn that appellant left; that on account of the negligence of the appellant, as set forth, the appellee lost 30 bushels of corn, worth $1.75 per bushel. The appellant denied the allegations of the complaint.

The appellee testified to the renting of the land as set forth in the complaint and that he planted the same in corn; that after the crop was laid by he went away and was gone until late in the summer; that on his return he found that appellant's hogs had been getting in the corn; that the inclosure around appellant's pasture, which was within the same general inclosure as the cornfield, was not hog-proof; that he saw appellant's hogs in the pasture and saw hog tracks where they had been passing through an opening under a culvert between appellee's cornfield and appellant's pasture; that appellee gave appellant permission to gather his share of the corn; that later, when appellee came home, he found that all the corn was gone.

Over appellant's objection, appellee and other witnesses were permitted to testify that the custom in that locality was for the owner to keep up the fence around a farm when it was rented. To this ruling of the court the appellant duly excepted.

According to the undisputed evidence, there was no agreement on the part of the appellant to make repairs of any kind.

From a judgment in favor of the appellee is this appeal.

[1] "Unless a landlord agrees with his tenant to repair leased premises, he cannot, in the absence of a statute be compelled to do so," is a rule of law well established in this state and elsewhere. Delaney v. Jackson, 95 Ark. 131, 128 S. W. 859; Jones v. Felker, 72 Ark. 405, 80 S. W. 1088; Brown v. Dwight Mfg. Co., 200 Ala. 376, 76 South. 292, L. R. A. 1917F, 997; 16 R. C. L. 1030, § 552, note 18; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 215, 4a.

[2] A local custom cannot be shown in order to render the landlord liable for failure to make repairs in contravention of the above well-established rule. 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, 217.

"The tendency of modern decisions is not to imply covenants which might and ought to have been expressed, if intended." Sheets v. Selden, 7 Wall. 423, 19 L. Ed. 166. Moreover, if it were competent to prove a local custom, the testimony adduced by the appel-lee in this case was not sufficient to show that the custom was of such long standing as to be generally known. St. L., I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Wirbel, 108 Ark. 437, 158 S. W. 118; Ward Furn. Mfg. Co. v. J. B. Isbell, 81 Ark. 549, 99 S. W. 845.

The testimony concerning the local custom was therefore incompetent, and the court erred in admitting it. The error is prejudicial to appellant.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause will be remanded for new trial.

HARDEMAN v. ARTHURS. (No. 21.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨323—Contract held to make cropper employé not tenant.

A contract, whereby one party was to furnish the tools, teams, seed, and land and the other to furnish the labor according to instructions of the first party, with nothing to show an intention to give the second party exclusive dominion of the land or of the crops planted thereon, creates the relation of employer and employé rather than that of landlord and tenant, though the land was to be cropped on shares.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨326(6)—Title to crop under lease on shares is in landlord, so that a purchaser from cropper is guilty of conversion.

Ordinarily when the parties occupy the relation of landlord and tenant the title to the crop is in the tenant, but where they occupy relation of landlord and cropper on shares, the title to the crop is in the landlord, so that in the latter case a purchaser from the cropper is guilty of conversion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Woodruff County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by L. P. Hardeman against W. A. Arthurs, in which William Wilson and another were brought in as parties defendant on motion of the original defendant. From a judgment dismissing the complaint as to defendant Arthurs, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to grant a new trial as to defendant Arthurs.

Jonas F. Dyson, of Cotton Plant, for appellant.

Roy D. Campbell, of Cotton Plant, for appellee.

WOOD, J. L. P. Hardeman, as party of the first part, entered into a contract with William and Grover Wilson, the parties of the second part, whereby the party of the first part was to furnish the tools, teams, seed, and the land as his part and the parties of the second part were to furnish all the labor necessary to cultivate the 40 acres of land "according to the rules of share cropping." If the parties of the second part failed to perform the necessary labor according to the instructions of the first party or his foreman, the first party could have the same done at the current wages of the country after giving the second party notice, and charge the amount to the second party, to be paid out of their half of the crop. Such were the essential provisions of the contract under which the Wilsons cultivated the land of Hardeman for the year 1917. In December, 1917, the Wilsons sold to W. A. Arthurs a bale of cotton, produced by them on the farm of Hardeman under the above contract. Hardeman, hereafter for convenience called appellant, brought this action against Arthurs, hereafter called appellee, to recover the sum of $129, which appellant alleged was the value of the bale of cotton belonging to appellant that appellee had purchased of the Wilsons.

The appellant alleged that appellee knew at the time he purchased the bale of cotton from the Wilsons that the same was raised by the Wilsons on appellant's land under a share cropper's contract. The appellee answered, denying the allegations of the appellant's complaint, and alleged that any cotton purchased by him from the Wilsons was purchased in good faith, without any knowledge of any interest or title of the appellant in the cotton. He alleged that the Wilsons were necessary parties, and moved that they be made parties defendant, which was done.

The Wilsons answered, admitting that they made a crop on the land of appellant in the year 1917; that appellant had furnished them certain supplies for that year, but alleged that they had performed work for the appellant, and that upon an accounting with appellant, including the bale of cotton sold by them to the appellee, they would be due the appellant the sum of $32.50, which they tendered in open court. They further alleged that appellee purchased the bale of cotton from them in good faith, without any knowledge or notice of appellant's claim on the cotton. Appellant replied to the answer of the Wilsons, and set up that they were indebted to him in the sum of $87.70, for which he asked judgment.

The appellant testified that the Wilsons worked a share crop with him. The testimony of the Wilsons, in substance, was to the effect that they made the contract to make a crop on appellant's place in the year of 1917; that appellant was to furnish everything and get one-half. They made five bales of cotton, and divided it all with appellant except the last bale, which was sold by them to the appellee for $116.44.

Appellee testified that he bought the bale of cotton from the Wilsons; that he had no notice that he had any interest in the cotton. He had bought two bales from them previously. Appellee knew that the cotton came from the appellant's place, but did not know anything about the contract of appellant and the Wilsons. On cross-examination the appellee was asked:

"Q. At the time they sold the cotton to you, didn't they go into the facts of the case and tell you that they had been dividing this cotton with Hardeman out there? A. Well, I don't know, I don't remember if they did."

Appellant testified that the Wilsons raised five bales of cotton, including the bale in controversy, under the share crop contract, which he made an exhibit to his complaint.

The court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the appellee, to which ruling the appellant excepted.

The appellant prayed for the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the title to the crop raised by one working on the shares is in the landlord, and one who purchases same or any part thereof is responsible to the landlord for the conversion thereof."

The court refused this prayer, to which ruling the appellant duly excepted. A judgment was entered, dismissing the appellant's complaint as to the appellee Arthurs, from which is this appeal.

[1] The court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the appellee. The contract, as we construe it, clearly creates the relation of employer and employe, rather than that of landlord and tenant. There is no language in the contract indicating that the share of the crop which appellant was to receive was for the use or rent of the land, or that the possession of the land was surrendered by the appellant to the Wilsons for the year 1917. There is nothing to show that the Wilsons had either exclusive dominion of the land during that period or of the crops to be planted thereon, giving them the right to pursue their own methods in the cultivation thereof, and the right to gather and hold the same as their own, until the division was made between them and the appellant. On the contrary, the language of the contract shows that appellant had the right to direct the Wilsons as to how they should perform the labor necessary for the cultivation and harvesting of the crop.

[2] In Tinsley v. Craig, 54 Ark. 346-349, 15 S. W. 897, we said:

"Ordinarily when the parties occupy the relation of landlord and tenant, the title to the crop is in the tenant, and he pays the landlord rent in kind or otherwise; and in general where they occupy the relation of landlord and cropper on shares, the title to the crop is in the landlord, and he delivers a part of it to the cropper in payment of his services."

The relation is determined by the terms of the contract, which in this case plainly shows that the relation, as before stated, is that of employer and employé rather than landlord and tenant. See, also, Hammock v. Creekmore, 48 Ark. 284, 3 S. W. 180; Neal v. Brandon, 70 Ark. 79-82, 66 S. W. 200; St. L. I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Hardie, 87 Ark. 475-483, 113 S. W. 31; Valentine v. Edwards, 112 Ark. 354-356, 166 S. W. 531.

For the error indicated, the judgment is reversed with directions to grant appellant a new trial as to appellee Arthurs.

NEW CORONADO COAL CO. et al. v. JASPER. (No. 397.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 10, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 14, 1920.)

1. Removal of causes ¶86(5) — Complaint charging joint liability against resident and nonresident must be traversed in petition for removal.

Material allegations of a complaint, charging joint liability against a resident and a non-resident defendant, must be traversed in a petition for removal to the federal court by a statement of facts conclusively showing that the plaintiff fraudulently joined the defendants in the suit to deprive the nonresident defendant of his right to a trial of the cause in the federal court, and such petition should preclude every theory of joint liability.

2. Removal of causes ¶86(5)—Petition for not sufficient to preclude theory of joint liability.

In an action against resident and nonresident defendants to recover damages for conversion of coal, a petition for removal of the cause to the federal court held not to sufficiently traverse the material allegations of the complaint as to the joint liability of the defendants.

3. Master and servant ¶313—Joint liability for conversion.

Where a master directs employé to take property of a third person, the master and servant are jointly liable for conversion.

4. Mines and minerals ¶51(3)—Evidence held to sustain finding that defendant pulled pillars in coal mine.

In an action by a mine owner for conversion of coal and for damages occasioned by the pulling of pillars in the mine, evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that defendants pulled the pillars in question.

5. Mines and minerals ¶51(3)—Evidence held to show wrongful mining of coal.

In an action for conversion of coal, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the acts of defendants in taking coal from plaintiff's mine were willful, wanton, and malicious.

6. Evidence ¶208(2)—Record of another suit admissible to show knowledge of certain facts on the part of defendant.

In an action against several defendants for conversion of coal and wrongful pulling of pillars in a mine, court did not err in permitting the complaint and proceedings in a prior suit to be read to the jury for sole purpose of showing that defendant's foreman knew the location of the dividing line between plaintiff's and defendant's mines at the time the pillars were pulled; such foreman having testified to the nature of the former suit and disposition made of it, thereby showing a knowledge of the contents of the complaint.

7. Partnership ¶219(4)—Service on one of several partners warrants judgment against partner served.

Where members of a partnership are sued, and service is only had upon one of them, a judgment in favor of plaintiff binds the served partner personally and as a partner, and partnership funds impounded by attachment and garnishment.

8. Appeal and error ¶1064(1)—Instruction permitting judgment against partnership instead of member harmless.

In an action against members of a partnership, only one of whom was served with process, an instruction directing the jury to find against the "New Coronado Coal Company," the firm name, could not have prejudiced the defendant served on the ground that a partnership cannot be sued as an entity and judgment rendered against it as such.

9. Trial ¶279—Party doubting meaning of instruction must make specific objection.

If there is any doubt as to what the court means in an instruction, party not satisfied therewith must make a specific objection challenging it on account of ambiguity.

10. Mines and minerals ¶51(5)—Profits properly awarded as damages for tortious act.

Where adjoining owner wrongfully pulled pillars in plaintiff's coal mine, causing a squeeze and rendering it impossible for plaintiff to mine his coal, which he had sold under contract, court properly charged that the measure of damages was the profit that plaintiff would have netted on the unrecoverable coal; such profits being ascertainable with reasonable certainty.

11. New trial ¶102(3)—Diligence not shown where one of several defendants knew of witness.

Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion for new trial for newly discovered evidence, where at least one of several defendants moving for a new trial must have, prior to the trial, known of the witness, and that he would testify favorably for defendants.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; Paul Little, Judge.

Action by John W. Jasper against the New Coronado Coal Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Warner, Hardin & Warner, of Ft. Smith, for appellants.

Covington & Grant, of Ft. Smith, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellee, John W. Jasper, instituted this suit against appellants, Arkcoal Mining Company, a corporation, C. A. Beggs, B. J. Malone, Minnie Malone, M. A. Malone, A. M. Malone, and the New Coronado Coal Company, a partnership, alleged to have been composed of the five last-named parties, in the Sebastian circuit court, Greenwood district, to recover damages in the sum of $55,681.50, on account of: (1) Wanton, willful, and malicious conversion of 2,820 tons of coal out of Central mine No. 5, on the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, section 21, township 5 north, range 31 west, in said county; and (2) the wanton, willful, and malicious pulling of pillars in said mine, causing the roof to fail or squeeze down, thereby preventing appellee from mining 16,410 tons of solid coal and 10,000 tons of pillar coal.

The complaint contained an allegation, among others, that the appellants owned and operated a mine known as the "Phoenix property" just south of "Central No. 5 property" aforesaid; that B. J. Malone was general superintendent, and C. A. Beggs mine foreman, of the New Coronado Coal Company, and the members of said partnership operating the "Phoenix property"; that B. J. Malone, as such general superintendent, wrongfully directed the other employes of said company, as well as the mine foreman, and that C. A. Beggs, as such mine foreman, wrongfully directed the other employes, to make openings from the land and coal in the Phoenix property into and through the land and coal of Central No. 5 property, and, pursuant to said unlawful, willful, and wanton directions, did wrongfully take 2,820 tons of coal and cause the roof to cave in so as to prevent appellee from mining 16,410 tons of solid coal and 10,000 tons of pillar coal.

A. M. Malone filed a petition and bond for removal of the cause to the United States District Court for the Western District of Arkansas, setting up that the controversy involved issues between himself and appellee alone, in which appellee claimed damages against him in the sum of $55,681.50 on account of an alleged wrongful act of removing and mining coal underneath land held by appellee under lease; that he was a non-resident and appellee a resident of the state of Arkansas; that the only residents of the state made defendants in appellee's suit were C. A. Beggs, B. J. Malone, and Minnie Malone, who had no interest whatever in the issues involved in the litigation; that they were joined as defendants in appellee's suit for the fraudulent purpose and with the fraudulent intent to prevent a removal of the cause from the state to the federal court; that the mining operations of the "Phoenix property" were under his immediate direction, and that C. A. Beggs, B. J. Malone, and Minnie Malone were in the employ of petitioner and his partner, C. M. McKoin, and that neither of said parties were charged with the duty of directing or superintending the mining operations of the petitioner and C. M. McKoin aforesaid; that none of the alleged wrongful acts set forth in the complaint were done by either C. A. Beggs, B. J. Malone, or Minnie Malone, or with their knowledge or under their directions.

The petition to transfer the cause was overruled by the court, to which ruling appellants objected and excepted.

Thereupon A. M. Malone filed a separate answer, in which he admitted that the New Coronado Coal Company was composed of C. M. McKoin and himself, and that they mined 1,497 tons of coal out of a solid body in "Central No. 5 property," but charged that they did so in good faith, under an agreement which they believed gave them the right to do so, that he was willing to pay a reasonable royalty for the coal so mined, and in which he specifically denied all other material allegations of the complaint.

C. A. Beggs, B. J. Malone, and Minnie Malone filed separate answers, in which each specifically denied all the material allegations in the complaint.

The Arkcoal Mining Company and M. A. Malone were not served and did not appear, and C. M. McKoin was not made a party and did not appear.

The proceeding was by attachment and garnishment. In response to the writs of garnishment, the McAllister Fuel Company admitted an indebtedness of $4,899.92 to the New Coronado Coal Company, and paid the amount into court; and the Merchants' National Bank of Ft. Smith admitted an indebtedness of $3,185.30 to the New Coronado Coal Company and $142.60 to A. M. Malone personally, and gave bond to pay same into court; and the Huntington State Bank admitted an indebtedness to C. A. Beggs of $142.60 and paid it into court.

The cause was submitted to a jury upon the pleadings, evidence, and instructions of the court, which resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee for $11,000.35 against the New Coronado Coal Company, a partnership composed of A. M. Malone and C. M. McKoin, and against A. M. Malone and C. A. Beggs, upon the theory that said parties had wrongfully converted 1,497 tons of coal belonging to appellee, of the value of $3,068.85, at the rate of $2.05 per ton, the price for which appellee had contracted to sell it on board cars, and for $7,931.15, lost profits on 26,413 tons of coal rendered unrecoverable by wrongfully pulling pillars in "Central No. 5 property," thereby causing the roof to cave in or squeeze down and obstruct the opening to the coal. The garnishments were all sustained, the money deposited in court in response to the writs was ordered paid to appellee, and judgment rendered in his favor against the garnishee and its bondsman which had not paid the fund into court. From the judgment an appeal has been prosecuted under proper proceedings to this court.

The record is too voluminous to incorporate a summary of the evidence of each witness in this opinion, and, for that reason, we can only make a general statement. Certain defendants were dropped from the suit for want of service and other causes, so the suit is one by appellee against C. A. Beggs, A. M. Malone, and the New Coronado Coal Company, composed of A. M. Malone and C. M. McKoin. In the fall of 1917 appellee purchased a tract of land called "Mottu property," west of "Central No. 5 property," which is a coal mine on the land heretofore described. On January 8, 1918, he leased "Central No. 5 property" for a term of two years for mining purposes, agreeing to sell the output of the mine for $2.05 per ton, on board cars, to the owners of the property. Prior to the purchase of the "Mottu property" and the lease of "Central No. 5 property," appellee, in connection with L. E. Lake, under the corporate name of "Phoenix Coal & Mining Company," for a number of years operated the coal mine known as the "Coronado property" under lease. On July 20, 1917, the Phoenix Coal & Mining Company was ousted and the land sold, and afterwards conveyed to the Arkoal Mining Company, a nonresident corporation. A. M. Malone and C. M. McKoin leased it as partners under the partnership name of New Coronado Coal Company. The New Coronado Coal Company began to operate the mine in October, 1917. B. J. Malone was employed as general superintendent and directed the work on top of the ground. C. A. Beggs was employed as foreman and had direction of the work under ground. Between October, 1917, and June, 1918, the New Coronado Coal Company, by direction of A. M. Malone, under the supervision of the company's foreman, C. A. Beggs, crossed over the north line of the "Coronado property" onto "Central No. 5 property," mined and hauled out of the solid body of coal thereon 1,497 tons, taking it to the surface through the "Coronado property." After having mined that amount, the owner, Central Coal & Coke Company, enjoined appellants in the courts from mining more. Appellants' testimony tended to show that they mined the coal in good faith, believing appellee had surrendered his lease on the particular land from which the coal was taken, and that they had made an arrangement for exchange of coal by which they would acquire the title to the coal so mined.

Appellee's testimony tended to show that he declined to surrender his lease, and, in the face of his refusal and with full knowledge of his rights, appellants mined the coal.

Upon the damage issue growing out of the alleged pulling of the supporting pillars between the "Coronado property" and "Central No. 5 property," appellants' witnesses, to the number of eight or nine, testified that the pillars in question were pulled by appellee in the spring of 1917, while operating the "Coronado property" in the corporate name of "Phoenix Coal Company"; that the caving of the roof occurred while witnesses were in the employ of the Phoenix Coal Company, and not after the New Coronado Company began to operate the mine; that the condition of the roof in "Central No. 5 property" at the time they testified was the same as when they pulled the pillars in the spring of 1917.

Appellee's witnesses testified that the squeeze, which obstructed the entry or slope and covered the track from the "Mottu" mine into and through "Central No. 5 property" along the south side thereof to the body of coal on the east end, was caused by the pulling of the pillars in the spring of 1918, along the line between the two latter properties; that they did not pull them; that early in the month of July, 1917, and later in the month when the Phoenix Coal Company was ejected from the "Coronado property," the pillars were intact and had been standing for 10 or 12 years.

Appellants' motion for new trial contained a request for new trial on account of newly discovered evidence of L. E. Lake. The evidence set out in the motion, to which Lake would subscribe, if present, was that he had personal charge of the mining operation of the Phoenix Coal & Mining Company in "Central No. 5 property" prior to and up to May 1, 1917, and that in April of that year, the pillars in question were pulled under the supervision of Bert Agnew at his direction; that appellants had no knowledge or means of knowing, and, after making diligent inquiry, did not learn of the facts to which Lake would testify or that he resided in Newton county, until after the trial. The motion for new trial was denied over the objection and exception of appellants.

[1-3] It is first contended that the court committed reversible error in overruling the petition to remove the cause to the federal court. The sole guide for a proper determination of this question must be found in the allegations of the complaint and petition for removal. The material allegations of the complaint, charging joint liability against resident and nonresident defendants, must be traversed in the petition of removal by a statement of facts conclusively showing that the plaintiff fraudulently joined the defendants in the suit to deprive the nonresident defendant of his right to a trial of the cause in the federal court. C., B. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Schwyhart, 227 U. S. 184, 33 Sup. Ct. 250, 57 L. Ed. 473. We do not think the charge in the complaint that C. A. Malone individually, and as a partner in the New Coronado Coal Company, became a joint tort-feasor with B. J. Malone and C. A. Beggs on account of their acts, respectively, as general superintendent and mine foreman, in ordering their employes to mine coal and pull pillars in appellants' mine, was sufficiently traversed. It is true A. M. Malone in the petition attempts to controvert joint liability by alleging that the wrongful acts charged "were not done or suffered to be done by either the said Beggs, B. J. Malone, or Minnie Malone, nor were they done with their knowledge or under their directions, and that they are in no way responsible for the alleged damages"; in other words, it is charged in the petition for transfer that A. M. Malone himself directed the employes, including Beggs and B. J. Malone. It is not denied in the petition to transfer that B. J. Malone was superintendent and C. A. Beggs mine foreman of the New Coronado Coal Company, composed of A. M. Malone and C. M. McKoin. Without such denial, the traverse was insufficient because A. M. Malone, individually and as a partner, would be liable jointly with either or both for acts done by them within the scope, or apparent scope, of their authority. In order to effect the transfer of the cause, the petition of removal should have precluded every theory of joint liability of the resident and nonresident defendants. There was no error in overruling the petition to transfer.

It is next insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict:

(1) Because there is no evidence to show appellants pulled the pillars which produced the squeeze that obstructed appellee's passageway to his coal in "Central No. 5 property." Appellee testified that in April, 1918, he laid a track from the "Mottu property" on the west in an easterly direction through the old workings in "Central No. 5 property" to a solid block of coal on the east side thereof for the purpose of mining it; that the New Coronado Coal Company was at the time working in the "Coronado property" immediately south of No. 5 aforesaid; that the pillars were standing when he built his track; that he did not pull them; that they were pulled, which caused the roof of "No. 5" to cave in, cover his track, and obstruct his passageway to the solid body of coal on the east. Marvin Repass testified that he helped appellee lay the track; that it was 800 or 900 feet long; that the squeeze, which covered it up and shut appellee out from the solid body of coal, came after the track had been laid, and the caving of the roof came from the direction where the New Coronado Coal & Mining Company, or Malones, were mining; that none of the pillars were pulled by appellee or his employe. The two mine inspectors, Boyd and Shaw, testified that the pillars along the line between the two properties were standing in the spring of 1917, Boyd saying they were standing as late as July 7, 1917.

[4, 5] It is impossible to read the evidence without concluding that either appellants or appellee pulled the pillars in question. The evidence just detailed was substantial testimony from which the jury were warranted in concluding that appellants pulled the pillars which caused the squeeze that cut appellee off from his coal, and was sufficient in this particular to support the verdict.

(2) Because there is no evidence to show a wrongful conversion of the coal taken or a wrongful pulling of the pillars. The testimony offered by appellee with reference to the conversion of 1,497 tons of coal tended to show that it was converted after several futile attempts to get appellee to surrender his right thereto under lease from the owners of "Central No. 5 property," and that appellants continued the trespass until restrained by court order; and that offered with reference to wantonly pulling the pillars, that they were pulled with knowledge as to the location of the line between the two properties, and that the effect of pulling them would be to destroy appellee's entry, cover up his track of 800 or 900 feet, over which he was hauling coal from the east end of his mine, and to permanently cut him off from it and the pillar coal in the mine. This evidence was sufficient upon which to base an inference that the acts were wanton, wilful, malicious ones, and therefore enough legal, substantial evidence to support the verdict in this regard.

[6] It is next insisted that the court erred in permitting the complaint and other proceedings to be read to the jury in a suit filed November 17, 1917, by the Central Coal & Coke Company against C. A. Beggs and others to prevent them from taking coal off of the tract of land in question. This evidence was offered and admitted by the court for the sole purpose of showing that C. A. Beggs, foreman of the New Coronado Coal & Mining Company, knew the location of the dividing line between "Central No. 5 property" and the "Coronado property" at the time the pillars in said No. 5 were pulled. C. A. Beggs testified to the nature of the injunction suit and disposition made of it, thereby showing a knowledge of the contents of the complaint. We think the complaint and proceeding admissible for the purpose offered.

[7-8] It is next insisted that the court erred in giving appellee's instruction No. 1:

(1) Because the jury was directed to find against the New Coronado Coal Company for 1,497 tons of coal. This was the coal A. M. Malone and C. A. Beggs admitted taking from "Central No. 5 property" for the partnership and for which they offered to pay a reasonable royalty. The contention is made that the instruction is in conflict with the rule of law that a partnership cannot be sued as an entity and judgment rendered against it as such. The suit was not against the partnership as a legal entity, nor was judgment rendered against it as such. The suit was against the New Coronado Coal Company, a partnership composed of A. M. Malone and C. M. McKoin. Judgment was rendered against it as an association of persons. There being no personal service on C. M. McKoin, the other partner, the effect of the suit and judgment was to bind A. M. Malone personally and as a partner, as well as the partnership fund impounded by attachment and garnishment. We are unable to see how any prejudice resulted to A. M. Malone, the only partner served, by the direction given to the jury of which complaint is made.

(2) Because the instruction assumed without justification that there was testimony from which the jury could find that C. A. Beggs directed the employes of the partnership and of A. M. Malone to remove the pillars from appellee's mine. We do not think the instruction assumed that there were separate employes of Malone and the partnership, and that C. A. Beggs directed all of them to do the wrongful act. The instruction in effect told the jury that A. M. Malone was liable individually and as a partner if the foreman wrongfully directed the employes, meaning one set of employes, to pull the pillars which caused the roof in said mine No. 5 to fall. If there was any doubt as to whether the court meant one or two sets of employes, appellants should have made a specific objection challenging the instruction on account of ambiguity.

(3) Because the instruction was misleading in that it was impossible for the jury to determine from the wording which Malone was the servant and which the master. The failure to insert the initials "B. J." before Malone could not have misled the jury. The undisputed evidence showed that B. J. Malone was the superintendent or employe, and by another instruction he was exempted from liability, so there could not have been a misunderstanding that A. M. Malone was intended by the use of the word "master" in the instruction.

(4) Because there was no evidence to warrant the submission of the issues as to whether appellants wrongfully removed the pillars in question. We ruled otherwise in the discussion of the question whether there was sufficient legal evidence to support the verdict.

(5) Because the instruction permitted a recovery for coal wrongfully converted at its reasonable value at the mouth of the shaft without deducting 25 cents per ton provided for in his contract of sale thereof to the Central Coal & Coke Company. The deduction provided for was a means adopted by appellee to pay an indebtedness of $1,139.08 he owed the Central Company on a past transaction, so it would have been improper to deduct this amount from the damages assessed against appellants for willful conversion.

[10] It is also insisted that the court erred in giving appellee's instruction No. 2, by charging therein that the measure of damages was the profit that appellee would have netted on the unrecoverable coal lost by the wrongful removal of the pillars. The contention is made that the correct rule for the measure of damages was the value of the leasehold estate, if destroyed by a wanton act of appellants, and not the profit which appellee might have made. It seems allowable as a general rule to award profits as damages resulting from tortious acts, if ascertainable with reasonable certainty. 8 R. C. L. 506; 17 C. J. p. 735. In the instant case the proof showed that appellee lost 27,800 tons of coal, 1,389 tons more than he claimed, on account of the squeeze, which the jury found was occasioned by appellants' wanton act of pulling the pillars in "Central No. 5 property," which was contracted to be sold at $2.05 per ton on board cars, with expense of $1.70 per ton for mining and placing same on top at pit mouth; that the entire amount, with reasonable effort, could have been mined before the expiration of appellee's lease. Appellee's net profit would have been 35 cents on each ton claimed, or a total of $9,244.55, if placing the coal on top at pit mouth meant on board cars at pit, and there is nothing to show to the contrary. The jury awarded a much less amount as damages. The damages allowed were reasonably well established by the evidence.

[11] Lastly, it is contended that the court erred in not granting a new trial on account of the newly discovered evidence of L. E. Lake, who was a stockholder and manager of the Phoenix Coal & Mining Company in 1917, when, according to appellants' contention, the pillars were pulled and roof caused to fall by said company. C. A. Beggs, one of the appellants, must have been cognizant of Lake's interest in and management of the Phoenix Company, as he worked for the company as foreman for a long time and during the spring of 1917. Lake was not far away. No effort was made to get him or his evidence before the trial. The only excuse offered is that appellants had no idea what Lake would testify to until after the trial. Beggs' former connection with the company ought to have suggested that Lake, the former manager, could testify favorably for them. Sufficient diligence was not shown before the trial, and it cannot be said the court abused its discretion in refusing the motion for a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

G. H. HAMMOND CO. v. JOSEPH MERCANTILE CO. (No. 404.)(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 17, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 7, 1920.)1. Principal and agent §119(2)—Presumption as to authority to sell goods in own name stated.

Where agent is engaged in an independent business, authority to sell in his own name goods consigned and delivered to him for sale is presumed from the nature of the business, but such presumption does not extend to agent who is engaged exclusively in selling his principal's goods.

2. Factors §1—Nature of the business of a "factor," stated; "commission merchant."

A factor or commission merchant is one engaged in an independent calling, and who buys and sells on commission any personal property left with or consigned to him for sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Commission Merchant; Factor.]

3. Principal and agent §103(8)—Authority to sell "overs" as agent's own goods held not to apply to exchanged goods of principal.

That plaintiff packing company permitted its agent to sell "overs," the increase in weight of meat shipped to such agent resulting from salt put on it, or to sell his own goods on his individual account, did not justify or authorize his sale of meat of plaintiff for which he had exchanged "overs" without plaintiff's knowledge or consent.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; R. H. Dudley, Judge.

Action by the G. H. Hammond Company against the Joseph Mercantile Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The plaintiff, G. H. Hammond Company, alleges in its complaint that it is a Michigan corporation duly authorized to do business in the state of Arkansas; that on the 6th day of May, 1918, the defendant, Joseph Mercantile Company, a domestic corporation, took into its possession and converted to its own use 1,165 pounds of bacon extras, belonging to the plaintiff, and of the value of $308.10. The defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint. The facts are substantially as follows:

Ray Perkins of Paragould, Ark., entered into a written contract with the plaintiff for the sale of its meat, to be consigned to Perkins and kept by him in a storehouse in Paragould, Ark., and sold by him for the plaintiff. Perkins agreed to keep the goods in a suitable building and not mingle them with other merchandise, and to sell the same without expense to the plaintiff, except the commission he was to receive.

When dry salt meat was shipped to Perkins in carload lots, there would be some meat left over by reason of the meat being salted and sacked out. This would occur because Perkins only accounted to the plaintiff for the meat by weight. Perkins would put this left-over meat to one side in the house where he kept the plaintiff's meat, and was accustomed to sell it as his own. In May, 1918, he had a quantity of this dry salt meat, and asked the representatives of the defendant to purchase it from him. They told him that they could not use the dry salt extras, but that they could use some bacon extras if he had it. Perkins went back to the warehouse and exchanged the dry salt extras, which he claimed for bacon extras belonging to the plaintiff of equal value, and sold the bacon extras to the defendant as his own. The defendant paid Perkins for the bacon extras.

On cross-examination the president of the defendant company testified that he knew that Perkins was a broker for the plaintiff company, and that he had no right to sell the plaintiff's goods in his own name and receive payment therefor. He further stated, however, that he thought the goods he bought belonged to Perkins, and that he had frequently bought goods from Perkins which were called "overs," and which he understood belonged to Perkins. The bacon in question in this case was packed in the original boxes when it was delivered to the defendant. After it was delivered to the defendant, Perkins' warehouse burned down. The plaintiff did not know that Perkins claimed what he called the "overs" from carload lots, and that he sold the same on his individual account. The plaintiff demanded payment of the bacon extras from the defendant, and payment was refused by the defendant. Hence this lawsuit.

There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the case is here on appeal.

D. G. Beauchamp, of Paragould, for appellant.

Huddleston, Fuhr & Futrell, of Paragould, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is earnestly insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that the court erred in giving instruction No. 7, which is as follows:

"If the plaintiff authorized or knowingly permitted its factor, Perkins, to sell 'overs,' or any other of its goods, or his own goods, on his individual account as individual owner to customers, and said Perkins sold the bacon in question to defendant in that way, and the defendant, acting in good faith, and in ignorance of the rights of the plaintiff, and in the exercise of such care as an ordinary prudent person would use under the circumstances to ascertain whether said Perkins was selling his own goods or those of the plaintiff, and at the time believed Perkins to be the true owner, or authorized to sell in his own name, then you will find for the defendant."

We think counsel for the plaintiff is right in his contention. The court in giving the instruction seems to have proceeded upon the theory that Perkins was a factor or commission merchant. Such is not the case. A factor is generally defined to be an agent who has a business, as well as goods, or merchandise consigned and delivered to him by or for his principal for a compensation commonly called a commission. 19 Cyc. 115; 11 R. C. L. 753; Story on Agency, 8 Ed. § 33, and Story on Sales, § 91.

[1, 2] The presumption of an authority to sell in these cases is inferred from the nature of the business of the agent, and it falls when the case will not warrant the presumption of his being a common agent for the sale of property of that description. 2 Kent's Com. 14 Ed. *622. A factor or commission merchant then is one engaged in an independent calling, and is one who buys and sells on commission, and who may sell any personal property which is left with or consigned to him for sale.

In discussing the difference between a factor and a broker or agent, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"The difference between a factor or commission merchant and a broker is stated by all the books to be this: A factor may buy and sell in his own name, and he has the goods in his possession; while a broker, as such, cannot ordinarily buy or sell in his own name, and has no possession of the goods sold." Slack v. Tucker & Co., 23 Wall. (U. S.) 321, 23 L. Ed. 143.

In the case at bar Perkins was not in pursuit of an independent calling, and did not have the authority to sell meat for persons generally, but only had the authority to sell the products of the plaintiff on a commission. It is true he sold the "overs," as he called them, on his own individual account, but he did not have the authority to sell meat generally for persons consigning same to him or leaving it in his possession. He did not attempt to exercise such authority. He was the exclusive agent for the plaintiff and his course of business clearly constituted him as the plaintiff's broker or agent as contradistinguished from a factor or commission merchant. The president of the defendant company knew that Perkins was the broker or agent of the plaintiff, and that he had no right to sell the plaintiff's goods for himself. According to the evidence adduced in favor of the plaintiff, he did not authorize Perkins to sell "overs" or any of its goods on his own account.

[3] It is true that, according to the testimony of Ray Perkins, the manager of the plaintiff company knew that the quantity of meat shipped by it to Perkins would gain in weight on account of the salt put on it, and that he told Perkins that the company would be satisfied to receive the amount of meat it shipped to Perkins, thereby tacitly giving him the right to use what was called the "overs" on his own account. The fact, however, that the plaintiff company might permit Perkins to sell "overs" or his own goods on his individual account did not warrant the jury in finding for the defendant. The meat in question was not "overs," but was meat of the plaintiff for which Perkins had exchanged "overs" without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. The president of the defendant company admitted that he knew that Perkins was the broker or agent of the plaintiff, and that he had no right to sell the plaintiff's goods in his own name. Perkins was not a factor or commission merchant, and had no right to sell the products of the plaintiff in his own name. Therefore the court erred in assuming to the jury that Perkins was a factor, and in telling the jury to find for the defendant if it should further find that the plaintiff authorized or knowingly permitted its factor, Perkins, to sell "overs," or any of its goods, or his own goods on his individual account. Hence the instruction was erroneous, and necessarily prejudicial to the rights of the plaintiff.

For the error in giving instruction No. 7, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BREASHEARS v. ARNETT. (No. 5.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations \Leftarrow 706(6, 7)—Negligence of auto driver and contributory negligence of pedestrian held for jury.

In an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, evidence that the driver was exceeding reasonable speed and sounded no warning before striking plaintiff, who was crossing in the middle of a block, held to show that negligence and contributory negligence were issues of fact for the jury.

2. Damages \Leftarrow 132(7)—$1,250 for injury to breast and knee, probably permanent, held not excessive.

A judgment of $1,250 damages to a girl struck by an automobile, which resulted in serious injuries to her breast and knee, which latter were still continuing and would probably be permanent, resulting in her inability to do the hard work she had formerly been able to do, is not excessive.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County; A. B. Priddy, Judge.

Action by Maud Arnett against Clayton Breashears. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Floyd, of Plainview, for appellant.

Chambers & Wilson, of Danville, and Heartall Ragon, of Clarksville, for appellee.

WOOD, J. The appellee and her escort, Jack Walker, and Miss Eunice Holman and her escort, E. A. Mathis, all attended a moving picture show in the town of Plainview, Yell county, Ark., on the night of May 4, 1918. After the show was over appellee and her companion started across the street to a drug store for cold drinks. The street was 80 feet wide, and there were about 150 people on the street at the time and a number of automobiles. Appellee and her companions were crossing at about the middle of the block. There were public crossings, but there are no car lines on the street, and the people went across the street anywhere. Coming out of the picture show, the people went straight across the street.

Appellee and Walker were within about 10 feet of the curb on the opposite side of the street from the theater and going towards the drug store when the appellant, who was driving a Ford occupied by himself and several young ladies, ran upon the appellee and Walker. Walker saw that appellee was in direct track of the car and tried to shove her out of the way, but failed. Appellant struck the appellee, causing personal injuries for which she brought this action against the appellant to recover damages.

Appellee alleged that the appellant was negligent in running his car at an unusual rate of speed; that he did not have his car under proper control, and that he did not sound any alarm, warning appellee of the approach of his car. Appellant denied the allegations of the complaint as to negligence, and set up the defense of contributory negligence.

The appellee and her companions testified that the car was being driven by appellant at a greater speed than cars are ordinarily run upon the roads or streets. Appellant testified that he supposed he was going about 10 miles per hour. Several witnesses testified on behalf of the appellant to the same effect.

Walker weighed 193 pounds, and by the impact of the car he was thrown above the windshield. After the appellant hit appellee and Walker he stopped the car in about 75 feet. Appellant did not sound any alarm before he struck the appellee.

Appellee was 20 years of age and in perfect health. She did general farm and domestic work. Since her injury she has not had strength and health, and could not do work as before. When in health she had strength above the ordinary, and made as good "a hand as you could get on the farm." Appellee was knocked unconscious by the blow, and remained so for some time thereafter. She did not get out of bed for two weeks, and it was four weeks before she could get around. Her left knee, right side, chest, both elbows and knees and right hip were badly bruised. She was also injured in her breast. When ever she walked any distance her knee would swell and was painful.

The physician who attended the appellee testified that there were several scratched places and bruised spots too numerous to mention over her body; that the principal wounds were injury to the knee and a rib that was loose from its cartilage on the right side, which in the process of healing caused a knot on her breast. In the process of healing, from the inflammation, the kneecap had been thrown out, the fibers and tendons were enlarged, which left a thickened condition around the knee joint, and that it was impossible for him to tell how long an injury of this character would last. Some of them get well, while others are permanent injuries for a lifetime. The general rule is that a majority of them are permanent.

There was a jury trial, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of the appellee in the sum of $1,250. From that judgment is this appeal.

[1] All of the instructions given by the court were not abstracted either by the appellant or the appellee, but the instructions that were set forth in the briefs of counsel show that the issues of negligence and contributory negligence were submitted under correct declarations of law. The issues of negligence and contributory negligence were issues of fact under the evidence for the jury.

[2] In view of the character of the injuries sustained by the appellee as shown by the evidence, it cannot be said that the amount of the verdict and judgment is excessive. There is no prejudicial error.

The judgment is correct, and is therefore affirmed.

CROFTON v. STATE. (No. 1.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Homicide §254 — Second degree murder established by evidence.

Evidence held to support conviction of murder in the second degree.

2. Witnesses §380(5)—On being surprised at testimony of its witness, state could show his contrary statements before grand jury.

In murder trial in which accused claimed defense that he intervened to save his brother from attack of deceased, where state's witness, although in the main testifying favorably to the state, testified that deceased had a knife which he was using on accused's brother when accused fired the first shot, the state, being surprised at the latter testimony, was entitled to ask the witness if in testifying before the grand jury he had said anything about deceased's having a knife, under the rule allowing a party surprised at testimony of his own witness to show his prior contrary statements.

3. Homicide §203(3) — Dying declarations held admissible.

In murder trial, deceased's dying declarations held admissible under evidence that they were made after his expressing a belief that he would die.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Howard County; Jas. S. Steel, Judge.

Hudie Crofton was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Jno. D. Arbuckle, Atty. Gen., and Silas W. Rogers, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree on an indictment charging him with killing Frank Owens on February 20, 1917. The trial jury found defendant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment and fixed his punishment at five years in the state penitentiary. An appeal was duly prosecuted to this court, but there has been no appearance of counsel in his behalf.

There were very numerous exceptions saved with respect to rulings of the court in admitting testimony offered by the state, and also with respect to giving and refusing instructions.

[1] Appellant and Frank Owens were both young negro men, and the shooting occurred when they, with other negroes, were returning from a singing school at Tollett, in Howard county, on the night of February 20, 1917. Owens and Ebbie Crofton, a brother of appellant, quarreled about their attentions to a girl and became engaged in a fight, and while so engaged appellant ran up and began firing at Owens with a pistol. According to the testimony adduced by the state, appellant ran up to the place where Owens and Ebbie Crofton were scuffling and fired one shot at Owens, and Owens ran away, and appellant fired at him two or three times as he ran away. One of the shots took effect in Owens' back and pierced his body through and through, coming out in front near the nipple of one of his breasts.

There is some conflict in the testimony as to the row between Owens and Ebbie Crofton and its progress up to the time appellant ran up and fired the first shot. There was evidence to the effect that Owens was the aggressor in the difficulty, and that he had a knife in his hand and was endeavoring to use it on Ebbie Crofton. Appellant testified that they were returning from the singing school and walking through a certain pasture when he was told that his brother, Ebbie, and Frank Owens were engaged in a fight, and that Hence Burk, one of his companions, handed him a pistol, and that he ran up to the scene of the fight and, seeing his brother down on his all fours and Owens astride of him, he fired the pistol one time at Owens. He testified that after firing the first shot, Burk took the pistol and fired several times at Owens as he ran away. He testified that he was about 30 yards behind his brother and Owens when they were engaged in the fight, and that he heard his brother cry out asking some one to "Take him off! He is killing me."

The evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. That adduced by the state was sufficient to show that appellant's brother was not in great bodily harm at the time, and that appellant ran up to the scene of the fight and fired once at Owens while the fight was going on and again fired at him two or three times as he ran away. The jury could, under the testimony, have found appellant guilty of a lower degree of homicide; but the evidence was sufficient to warrant a conviction of murder in the second degree as charged in the indictment.

The assignments of error are, as before stated, very numerous, and it is unnecessary to discuss them all. The instructions of the court were full and complete and seem to have followed the usual form of instructions in such cases. We have not been able to discover in our examination of the transcript any error in the rulings of the court in regard to the giving and refusing of instructions.

[2] One of the rulings assigned as error is in permitting the state to ask one of its witnesses, R. D. Johnson, concerning his statement before the grand jury. Johnson was introduced as a witness and testified that he was present when the fight occurred between Frank Owens and Ebbie Crofton, and he stated that Owens had a knife and struck Ebbie on the head with it. He further testified that Owens ran off down the hill, and that appellant fired at him two or three times as he ran away. The prosecuting attorney was permitted, over the objections of appellant's counsel, to ask concerning his statements before the grand jury. He was asked if, in his testimony before the grand jury, in detailing the circumstances of the fight, whether he had said anything about Owens having a knife. The witness admitted that he had made no reference to a knife in his testimony before the grand jury. The state had the right on being surprised at the testimony of its own witness to show contrary statements before the grand jury, for the purpose of breaking down the damaging testimony of the witness and impeaching his credibility. This is so where a party gives damaging testimony to the side which introduced him on the witness stand. Dorian v. State, 217 S. W. 485. That was the case here. While the testimony of the witness was favorable to the state's contention in many respects, he made the damaging statement that Frank Owens had a knife at the time and was using it on Ebbie Crofton at the time appellant ran up and fired the first shot.

[3] Another assignment of error is in respect to the ruling of the court in allowing Georgiana Owens, the mother of Frank Owens, to testify as to the dying declarations of Owens. Owens lived about four months after he was shot and died from the effects of the wound, and at times he was hopeful of recovery, but afterwards entirely despaired of all hope and expressed his belief that he would die. His mother testified to certain statements made to her by deceased after he expressed to her his belief that he would die. We are of the opinion that, taking her testimony as a whole, there was enough to show that the statements were made at the approach of death and under the belief that death was impending. The testimony falls within rules of evidence often announced by this court. Evans v. State, 58 Ark. 47, 22 S. W. 1026.

We are unable to discover any prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PUMPHREY v. FURLOW. (No. 8.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Partnership §53—Evidence held insufficient to show partnership in purchase of land.

In a suit to recover money, which plaintiff alleged he was fraudulently induced to overpay to defendant for purchase price of land, and to have such amount declared a lien on the land, plaintiff alleging that defendant agreed to purchase the land at not exceeding $25 per acre and to let plaintiff have part of it for the amount paid, evidence held insufficient to show the existence of a partnership between plaintiff and defendant; there being no agreement to hold the land and sell it, nor to share in profit and loss.

2. Trusts §77—No resulting trust, where defendant sold land to plaintiff at increased price.

Where plaintiff alleged that defendant had agreed to purchase a certain tract of land at not exceeding $25 per acre and to sell part of it to him at the price paid, and it appeared that defendant purchased the land for $15 an acre and sold part of it to plaintiff for $25, which payment was subsequently made, a resulting trust did not arise in plaintiff's favor, for, to constitute such a trust, the purchase money must be paid by another, or secured by another, at the same time or previously to the purchase, and must be part of the transaction.

3. Joint adventures §5(2)—Evidence in suit between joint adventurers to obtain overpayment held to support decree for defendant.

In a suit to recover a payment alleged to have been fraudulently induced by defendant, based on an alleged contract whereby defendant was to purchase certain land at a price not exceeding $25 an acre and to sell part of it to plaintiff for the amount actually paid, conflicting evidence held to support a judgment for defendant.

Wood, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Little River Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by W. I. Pumphrey against Nathan Furlow. Decree of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Pumphrey brought this suit in equity against Nathan Furlow to recover the sum of $1,044.32, which he alleges he was fraudulently induced to overpay the defendant for the purchase price of a tract of land, and to have said amount declared a lien on the land. The defendant filed an answer, denying all the material allegations of the complaint.

According to the testimony of W. I. Pumphrey, he was a negro 64 years of age and had lived in Little River county, Ark., for 31 years, during which time he had been farming and teaching school. He lived near the defendant, Furlow, and had known him since the latter's boyhood. Furlow was a white man, and Pumphrey had the utmost confidence in him. In the summer of 1917, Pumphrey made an oral agreement with the defendant to buy a tract of land containing 174.71 acres. He went to see the defendant, and asked him what the land could be bought for. The defendant stated that he did not know the price, and after some discussion about the land agreed with Pumphrey that they would buy it together. Because Pumphrey was a negro, Furlow concluded the negotiations for the land with the owner, who lived at another place in Arkansas. It was agreed between the parties that Furlow should buy the land for any price he could get it for up to $25 per acre. Furlow was to take the contract in his own name, and subsequently to let Pumphrey have part of the land at what Furlow had agreed to pay for it. Furlow reported to Pumphrey that he had to pay the $25 an acre for the land, when as a matter of fact he had bought it for $15 an acre. A survey was made of the land, and it was agreed between them that Pumphrey should take 101.71 acres at $25 an acre. A written contract between the parties was entered into to that effect. It was understood that the defendant should keep the remainder of the land. Each party entered into possession of his part of the land. Furlow bought the land on a credit, and the amount allotted to Pumphrey at $25 an acre paid the whole purchase price, except a small amount, which Furlow paid in the beginning. Pumphrey paid for the land with two bank checks given Furlow during the fall of 1917. At the time the bank cashier offered to lend Furlow the money with which to pay for his part of the land, and they acted like they were fixing up a mortgage. Again Pumphrey stated that Furlow promised to sell his part of the land to him for just what it cost him.

Austin Hall, another negro, who had lived on Furlow's place for about 8 years, was a witness for the plaintiff. According to his testimony he had known both parties about 25 years and had worked for the defendant for about 8 years. In the latter part of the summer of that year he heard a conversation between the plaintiff and defendant about the purchase of some land near them. The defendant first asked the plaintiff to go and see the owners about the purchase of the land. The plaintiff suggested that he was a negro, and that it would be better for the defendant to go and make the purchase. The defendant said he was satisfied they could get it for $25 an acre, but that he would get it as cheap as he could. The plaintiff agreed that he would pay as much as $25 an acre for a part of the land. We quote from the record a part of the testimony of the witness A. Hall, as follows:

"Q. Then you understand that they were partners in buying the land and Furlow had authority to act for both? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you hear Pumphrey explain that in terms of that character that he would intrust him with handling the deal? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. They were both to pay the same price per acre for the land; was that the way? A. Well that has kinder slipped my memory. I know of the partnership, and that is about all I remember.

"W. I. Pumphrey: That is why you were called in the conversation. He said: 'I will let you have the land for the same price I pay for it.'

"Q. Do you remember any other discussion as to what the land would cost—that each of them was to pay the same price for it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And that was why you were called? A. Yes, sir; I said he was all right. We have been working together for 8 years, and I said I believe you are all right myself.

"Q. That is what you were called for as a witness when they were discussing that, and you vouched for both of them? A. Yes, sir."

The defendant, Furlow, was a witness for himself. He denied that he agreed to buy the land as cheap as he could and sell part of it to Pumphrey. According to his testimony, he was on a contract for the purchase of the land on September 10, 1917. After he had made the contract for the purchase of the land, he had it surveyed, and on October 6, 1917, he entered into a written contract to sell Pumphrey 101.71 acres for the price of $25 an acre. According to Furlow's testimony, Pumphrey urged him to buy the land, and told him that he would pay him as much as $25 per acre for 100 acres of it. Pumphrey wanted Furlow to buy the land, because he thought he could make a better trade for it. Furlow never agreed to let Pumphrey have any part of the land for what he paid for it. It was understood between them that Pumphrey was to give him $25 for the land. Furlow bought it for $15 an acre, and made the trade entirely on his own account. Subsequently, when he found out that Pumphrey was dissatisfied with the trade, he offered to take it off of his hands and to pay him a good profit. The lands began to rise in value shortly after Furlow purchased them.

E. C. Payne, the cashier of the bank through which Pumphrey paid for the land, denied that he and Furlow acted as if they were fixing up a mortgage on the land to secure Furlow's part of the purchase money. He stated positively that there was no effort on his part to do anything of that kind, and that he could not recall any conversation which tended to show that fact. He admitted that Furlow had suggested to him that he did not want Pumphrey to know what he had paid for the land.

J. E. Davis testified that he bought some timber from Pumphrey off of the part of the land which Furlow sold to Pumphrey. He said that Pumphrey told him that he did not know what trade Furlow had made for the purchase of the land. Other testimony will be stated or referred to in the opinion.

The chancellor found the issues in favor of the defendant, and dismissed the plaintiff's complaint for want of equity. The plaintiff has appealed.

A. D. Du Laney, A. P. Steel, and John J. Du Laney, all of Ashdown, for appellant.

S. C. Reynolds, of Ashdown, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above).

tiff and defendant with regard to the lands. There is nothing in the testimony to establish this fact. It was a mere conclusion on his part, suggested by the question asked him. The testimony of the parties to this suit shows conclusively that no partnership existed between them. According to Pumphrey's own testimony, Furlow was to buy the land, and was to let him have a part of it at the price he paid for it. There was no agreement to hold the land, and sell it, and share the profits and losses arising from the transaction. There was no community of interest whatever between them. In order to constitute a partnership, it is necessary that there should be something more than a joint ownership of the property. There was no agreement to buy the lands for the purpose of resale, sharing equally in the expenses and profits, as was the case in Beebe v. Oentine, 97 Ark. 390, 134 S. W. 936. Hence they were not partners in fact nor in law.

[2] Again, it was contended by counsel for the plaintiff that under the facts a resale trust arose in favor of the plaintiff. We cannot agree with counsel in this contention. In Red Bud Realty Co. v. South, 96 Ark. 281, 131 S. W. 340, it was held that a resulting trust did not arise where a trustee purchased property solely upon his own credit and subsequently paid for it with trust funds. In order to constitute a resulting trust, the purchase money must be paid by another, or secured by another at the same time or previously to the purchase, and must be a part of that transaction. The trust must arise by virtue of the purchase, and, as none was created at that time, none can arise afterwards. In order to create a resulting trust in favor of one who pays the purchase money for property bought in the name of another, the payment must be contemporaneous with the trust, and not afterwards. Here, according to Pumphrey's own testimony, the purchase money was paid by him some time after the contract of purchase was made. Hence no resulting trust arose in his favor.

[3] Finally it is insisted that Pumphrey and Furlow entered into an oral agreement whereby the latter was to buy the tract of land and let the former have a part of it at the price originally paid for it, and that this contract was executed by Furlow's purchasing the land, and at a later date entering into a written contract with Pumphrey to sell him a part of it at $25 per acre, when in truth and in fact Furlow had bought it for $15 per acre. Even if it be held that this entitled Pumphrey to an abatement of the purchase price, it cannot be said that the decree of the chancellor should be reversed; nor can it be said that the finding of the chancellor in favor of the defendant is against the preponderance of the evidence. The testimony of the parties to this suit is in direct and irreconcilable conflict. Pumphrey stated in post-tive terms that it was understood between him and Furlow that Furlow should buy the land and let him have a part of it at the original purchase price. On the other hand, Furlow is equally positive that no such agreement was made between him and Pumphrey. He stated that Pumphrey agreed to give him as much as $25 an acre for a part of the land in order to induce him to go and make a trade for the land. He admits that he bought the land for $15 an acre, but denies in most positive terms that he agreed to let Pumphrey have a part of it at that price. According to his testimony, it was understood in advance that Pumphrey was to pay him $25 an acre for the land, and that Pumphrey actually agreed to pay that price at the time their written contract was executed.

It is insisted by counsel for the plaintiff that the plaintiff's testimony is strongly corroborated by the witness A. Hall. We do not think so. In the first place, Hall admitted that he did not like Furlow, and, when his whole testimony is examined in the record, it shows that he simply answered "Yes" to direct questions propounded to him. On cross-examination he showed that he did not know much about the matter, or at least did not understand it. He admitted that the transaction had slipped his memory.

Again, it is insisted that the testimony of the plaintiff is corroborated by the cashier of the bank, because he admitted that Furlow had told him that he did not want Pumphrey to know what he had paid for the land. This does not tend to corroborate the plaintiff's testimony. It may be that Furlow did not want Pumphrey to know what he gave for the land, for fear that Pumphrey would not carry out his agreement to purchase a part of it for $25 an acre. It will be remembered that their agreement in the beginning was a verbal one. Then, too, according to Pumphrey, when he paid for his part of the land, the cashier of the bank and Furlow acted as if they were drawing up a mortgage in favor of the bank for Furlow's part of the purchase money. Both the cashier of the bank and Furlow denied that anything of this kind occurred.

Again, it is contended that the fact that Furlow withheld his contract from the record tended to corroborate the testimony of Pumphrey. We do not think so. There is nothing to indicate that it was withheld for that purpose. On the other hand, as soon as Pumphrey asked for the contract, it was delivered to him. The evidence of Furlow is corroborated to a certain extent by that of Davis, who bought some timber from Pumphrey on the part of the land allotted to him. Davis said that at the time he bought the timber Pumphrey told him that he did not know what Furlow had paid for the land. This tends to corroborate the testimony of Furlow.

It follows that the decree will be affirmed.

WOOD, J., dissents, holding with appellant on the last proposition, to wit, that appellant and appellee entered into an oral agreement whereby appellee was to buy the tract of land, and let appellant have a portion of it at the same price that appellee paid for it per acre. The finding of the trial court on this issue is clearly against the preponderance of the evidence.

McCORKLE v. H. K. COCHRAN CO.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.)

1. Frauds, statute of §159—Peremptory instruction on conflicting evidence, error.

Giving peremptory instruction for plaintiff in action on a contract required to be in writing is error, there being a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether it was oral or written.

2. Evidence §410—Parol evidence admissible to add to contract, where memorandum is not signed as required by statute of frauds.

A contract to sell goods, required by statute of frauds to be in writing signed by the party to be charged, rests in parol if he did not sign the memorandum of sale, and so no rule of evidence is violated by oral testimony of a term in addition to that in the writing.

3. Frauds, statute of §152(1)—Not required to be pleaded where plaintiff declares on written contract and defendant denies it.

The statute of frauds need be pleaded only when plaintiff attempts to recover on an oral contract, and so not where plaintiff declares on a written contract signed by defendant, and defendant denies that he entered into a written contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Francis County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by the H. K. Cochran Company against T. G. McCorkle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

W. J. Lanier, of Forrest City, for appellant.
Mann & Mann, of Forrest City, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Appellee, a domestic corporation, sued appellant in the court below to recover damages for breach of an alleged contract for the sale by appellee to appellant of a carload of oats, bran, chops, and meal. It is alleged in the complaint that the contract was in writing, dated January 14, 1919, and specified that there was to be a delivery of the carload of stuff on January 31, 1919. Appellant denied in his answer that he had executed a written contract for the purchase of the commodity as set forth in the complaint. There was a trial of the issues before a jury, and the court directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of appellee, which was done, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

Appellee's agent, Mr. Ownes, testified that he made the sale to appellant at the latter's place of business at Wheatley, Ark.; that appellant gave witness the order which witness reduced to writing and made a carbon copy thereof; and that appellant signed the original order, and witness delivered to appellant the carbon copy to which he subscribed the name of appellee. The original order with appellant's name signed to it was exhibited to the jury by the witness and was introduced in evidence. Appellant testified as a witness in his own behalf and denied that he signed the written order. He testified that the order was verbal, and that it was reduced to writing by Mr. Ownes as a memorandum of the sale, and that a carbon copy was delivered to him, but that he did not sign either the original or the carbon copy. He offered to testify that it was agreed between him and Mr. Ownes as a part of the oral contract of sale that he should have the right to cancel the order at any time on or before the date of delivery, January 31, 1919, and that he directed appellee before the date of delivery to cancel the order. The court excluded this testimony from the jury and, as before stated, gave a peremptory instruction in favor of appellee. We are of the opinion that the court erred in excluding the offered testimony, as well as in giving the peremptory instruction.

[1, 2] The main issue in the case was whether or not the contract was oral or written, and there was a sharp conflict in the testimony on that issue. Appellant testified positively that he did not sign the written order. If that was true, the written memorandum signed by appellee alone did not constitute a written contract and was within the statute of frauds. Lee v. Vaughan's Seed Store, 101 Ark. 68, 141 S. W. 496, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 352. Appellant not having bound himself by writing, the contract rested in parol, and no rule of evidence was violated by permitting oral testimony to be introduced establishing the additional agreement not set forth in the writing, to the effect that appellant should have the right to cancel the order before delivery.

[3] The point is made by counsel for appellee that the statute of frauds was not pleaded, but the answer to that contention is that the denial in appellant's answer was as broad as the allegation in the complaint. Appellee declared upon a written contract signed by appellant, and the latter denied that he entered into a written contract. It is unnecessary to plead the statute of frauds until appellee undertakes to recover upon an oral contract.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

LAVENDER et al. v. FINCH. (No. 6.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.)

1. Sales \S 316(1)—Statutory remedy of seller cannot be enforced where property has reached purchaser for value.

The statutory remedy in the nature of attachment authorized by Kirby's Dig. \S 4966, 4967, in favor of a vendor of chattels to enforce payment of the purchase money, is not a lien, and cannot be enforced where the property has passed into the hands of a purchaser for value, though with notice before purchase that the price has not been paid.

2. Sales \S 328—Whether company, in whose hands timber attached, purchased through or from purchaser held for jury.

In action by seller of timber, wherein defendant company brought cross-action for wrongful attachment under Kirby's Dig. \S 4966, 4967, where there was evidence on both sides on question whether individual defendant who purchased timber from plaintiff was acting for himself or as agent for defendant company, instruction submitting issue whether company purchased timber direct from individual defendant, so that plaintiff's statutory remedy was not enforceable against defendant company, should have been given.

3. Trial \S 252(19)—Where undisputed evidence negatives payment, instruction on issue of payment properly refused.

Where undisputed evidence showed timber had not been paid for by individual defendant, instruction that, if jury found timber attached in hands of corporate defendant was fully paid for by individual defendant as set forth in timber deed, plaintiff could not recover against corporate defendant, was properly refused.

4. Pleading \S 380—Evidence on point not in issue inadmissible.

Where there was no issue, in view of an individual defendant's express admission, as to amount of consideration he was to pay for timber purchased from plaintiff by corporate defendant either through or from the individual defendant, his testimony in explanation of plaintiff's timber deed to him, as to how consideration of $6,000 was arrived at, was inadmissible.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cleburne County; J. M. Shinn, Judge.

Action by Carl Finch against M. M. Lavender and others, doing business as the Holly Grove Lumber Company. From judgment for plaintiff against defendants Lavender and the company, they appeal. Judgment as to defendant Lavender affirmed, and as to defendant company reversed and cause remanded.

Lee & Moore, of Clarendon, for appellants.
Geo. J. Crump, of Harrison, for appellee.

WOOD, J. Carl Finch executed a timber deed to M. M. Lavender conveying to him all the timber except cedar upon 320 acres of land described in the deed situated in Cleburne county, Ark. The consideration was $6,000; $1,600 cash and the balance of $4,400 to be paid in semi-monthly payments of $450 beginning from the date when the timber operations on the land were started. Lavender was to have two years from the date of the deed for cutting and removing the timber. The conveyance was subject to a lien on the timber in favor of C. L. Moore for $750. The instrument contains the following provision:

"The payment of $450 semimonthly are computed on basis of manufacture of 150,000 feet of lumber per month. In the event that said M. M. Lavender should fail to manufacture said amount the monthly payments shall be reduced in proportion to the number of feet of lumber manufactured. In the event that more than 150,000 feet of lumber is manufactured monthly then in that event the semimonthly payments are to be increased in proportion to the amount so manufactured. The above conditions shall be of natural origin and not of willful neglect or negligence.

"Lien is hereby retained upon the timber hereinafter mentioned to secure the residue of said above-mentioned deferred payments."

The appellee instituted this action against M. M. Lavender, H. K. Wellborn, and James Walls, doing business as the Holly Grove Lumber Company, hereafter for convenience called the company. He set up the timber deed and alleged that the sum of $2,740 was due him thereunder; that the timber was sold to the company. He alleged that he had a specific lien on 100,000 feet of lumber in the possession of the company for the sum due him under the timber deed. He prayed for a specific attachment of the lumber for the balance due him.

Appellant Lavender answered denying that he was a partner in the company. He alleged that the company was composed of H. K. Wellborn, J. B. Wellborn, and J. A. Walls; that he had no interest in the company. He admitted the execution of the timber deed, and denied that the company knew anything about it. He alleged that they had no interest under the timber deed. Denied that the timber was purchased by him for the company. Alleged that it was purchased for himself. He denied that he was due the appellee any sum, and by way of cross-action he set up that the appellee had represented that there were at least 1,000,000 feet of merchantable timber on the land described in the timber deed; that these representations were designedly made to induce Lavender to purchase the timber; that he relied upon them; that such representations were false and were known to be false by the appellee at the time they were made.

Lavender alleged that there were only 470,652 feet of merchantable timber, and that he had more than paid the price of such timber in accordance with the terms of the timber deed. He stated that the payments required under the timber deed would amount to $2,823.93 and that he had paid appellee the sum of $3,097.47. He denied the allegations of appellee's petition for specific attachment. Alleged that the 100,000 feet of lumber was the property of the company; that he in good faith had sold the lumber to the company. He prayed that the writ of attachment be dissolved and for such other relief as he might be entitled to have.

The company answered denying that Lavender was a member of the company and denied the allegations of appellee's complaint as to it. It alleged substantially the same facts as were set forth in the separate answer of Lavender and denied the allegations of appellee's petition for specific attachment. It alleged that the lumber attached was purchased by it from Lavender and that the attachment was wrongfully issued. It set up that by reason thereof it had been damaged in the sum of $3,000, for which it prayed judgment.

The appellee answered the cross-complaint of Lavender and the company and denied specifically their allegations and prayed that they be dismissed and that he have judgment as asked in his original complaint.

The appellee testified that he executed the timber deed to Lavender; that Lavender told him that he was in the employ of the company; that he was its agent or partner; that he was letting the company have the timber that was cut from appellee's timber; that the company handled it exclusively; that in discussing the trade Lavender asked appellee about the amount of the timber, and appellee told him that it had been estimated at 1,250,000 feet. Appellee was not present when the estimate was made, but that was his information. Before the trade was consummated, appellee and Lavender agreed upon the price of the timber. Lavender went upon the land and made an estimate of the timber and came back and bought the timber of the appellee. Appellee did not represent to Lavender that the tract of land carried 1,000,000 feet of timber or more. Appellee was not an experienced lumberman, but Lavender was. They went back and forth across the land, and Lavender estimated it by the trees, and that is the basis upon which he bought it. Appellee was selling the timber for $6,000 on the tract of land consisting of 320 acres. He sold it as a lump trade, and Lavender thought that there was ample timber there to justify him in buying same and paying the sum of $6,000 for it.

Appellee further testified that Lavender had paid him under his contract $2,222.47, leaving a balance due him of approximately $2,937.50, including a lien on the property at Harrison, which appellee took in part payment of the purchase money.

W. R. Casey testified that he was an attorney, and that he was employed by the appellee to institute suit against Lavender; that the day before the suit was instituted he heard the conversation between the appellee and Lavender in which Lavender admitted that he owed appellee on the contract the difference between the payments, a statement of which he exhibited, and $6,000 the consideration named in the timber deed. He stated that he was sorry that he had not been able to pay, but the timber had not turned out as he had expected it to turn out. In the conversation Lavender told them that the timber was bought for the company; that he was acting merely as its agent; that he received a salary and some little commission; that was the reason that witness included the company as party defendant in the suit. Lavender said that most of the lumber attached came off of the land and belonged to the company. Upon that statement witness attached the lumber.

Lavender testified that he had bought the timber from appellee as evidenced by the timber deed; that he had cut and removed all the timber from the land embraced in that deed; that there were 470,272 feet; that he had paid appellee for this timber under the contract; that he did not owe him anything but in fact had overpaid him. He denied the conversation testified to by witness Casey. He stated that there was no one interested with him in the purchase of the timber from appellee. He denied that he had ever told or indicated to any one that he was the agent of the company. He stated that he told appellee and Casey that he was employed on a salary of $50 per month and a commission of 50 cents per thousand to buy and handle lumber for them. His contract with the company was in writing. The company was in no sense interested in the purchase of the timber from appellee. He and appellee made an estimate of the timber before the deed was executed. Appellee stated that he was sure that there was 1,000,000 feet. Witness thought there would be something like 1,000,000 feet, and told appellee that he could afford to purchase at $6 per thousand if there were 1,000,000 feet, and a contract was entered upon under the assumption that there was 1,000,000 feet. Witness made the payments as the contract provided. When the lumber was cut and brought to witness, he sold it to the company. It paid for it, and witness paid appellee. Witness was never at any time a partner in the company, in this timber deal or any other matter. The company did not authorize witness to buy any timber for it. Witness was only authorized to buy lumber for the company. Witness did not want the attachment brought against the company, as they did not have a thing in the world to do with the deal; that is the reason witness asked appellee and Casey not to attach. Witness did not know exactly how much they attached, but there must have been 150,000 feet. The company got the lumber and shipped it away.

There was testimony corroborating the testimony of Lavender as to the amount of the timber.

Toney Lewis testified that his firm, the Lewis Bros., contracted with Lavender to cut the timber on the land in controversy, and it proceeded to cut all the commercial timber on the tract; that Lavender paid for same with checks on Heber Springs bank.

H. K. Wellborn testified: That the company was composed of himself, Walls, and B. G. Wellborn. That Lavender was not a member of the firm and had never at any time been the agent of the company. The company bought a portion of the pine timber that came from appellee's land and paid for all the lumber it bought from Lavender; that the lumber that was attached was not all the lumber the company had bought and paid for. It paid Lavender $7,291.81 for the lumber. The company had nothing to do with the purchase of the tract of timber from the appellee. Did not know anything about it and was not interested in it. That the lumber attached was paid for by the company before the attachment was issued, and some of the lumber came from other parties. The company hired Lavender at $50 per month and gave him a commission on lumber bought. The company also gave him a commission on lumber sold, the same as they gave other people. The company put a $1,000 in the bank of Heber Springs with the understanding that when a load of lumber came to town Lavender was to buy it and give a check. The company told Lavender what he could pay for the lumber, and the $1,000 was placed in the bank for him to buy lumber with. If he did not have a statement at the bank showing the number of feet and from whom purchased, the bank would not pay the check. The jury returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find for the plaintiff against the defendant M. M. Lavender in the sum of $2,740 and sustain the attachment herein on the lumber."

The court rendered judgment against Lavender in favor of the appellee for that sum and sustained the attachment. The court also rendered judgment against the company and its bondsmen. From that judgment is this appeal.

The appellant company asked the court to instruct the jury in substance that, if the company purchased the lumber from Lavender and paid him for the same before the issuance of the writ of attachment, their verdict should be for the company, even though Lavender may not have paid the appellee for the timber and even though the company had actual notice that the purchase money had not been paid by Lavender.

[1] The court erred in refusing to grant this prayer for instruction. Appellee asked and obtained specific attachment of the timber under the provisions of chapter 101 of Kirby's Digest. In Neal v. Cone, 76 Ark. 273, 88 S. W. 952, we held:

"The statutory remedy authorized by Kirby's Digest, §§ 4966, 4967, in favor of a vendor of chattels, to enforce payment of the purchase money, is not a lien, and cannot be enforced where the property has passed into the hands of purchasers for value, even though they may have had notice before their purchase that the purchase money had not been paid."

See, also, McComb v. Judsonia St. Bank, 91 Ark. 218, 120 S. W. 844.

[2] The appellee caused the attachment to be issued on the theory that Lavender was a partner in the company or that he was the agent of the company to purchase the timber of the appellee. The court instructed the jury that the undisputed evidence showed that Lavender was not a partner in the company. There was testimony tending to prove that he was not the agent of the company for the purchase of the timber. There was evidence to warrant the finding, and therefore a submission of the issue to the jury as to whether or not the company purchased the timber direct from Lavender. Therefore the above prayer for instruction should have been granted.

The appellant company also asked the court to instruct the jury that, if they found that the timber attached was fully paid for by Lavender in the manner set forth in the timber deed, the appellee could not recover as against the company.

[3] As we construe the timber deed, the undisputed evidence shows that the timber had not been paid for by Lavender. Therefore there was no testimony to warrant the submission of that issue to the jury, and the court did not err in refusing to grant such prayer.

The company urges that there was a conflict in some of the instructions given by the court, which we find to be the case; but we deem it unnecessary to discuss these for the reason that the court is not likely to repeat this error on rehearing.

Appellant Lavender contends that by the terms of the timber deed he was to pay appellee $8 per thousand for all commercial timber except the cedar on the 320 acres of land described in the deed, and that the court erred in refusing to permit him to testify in explanation of the timber deed as to how the consideration of $6,000 was arrived at; but we do not find in the abstract of appellant where the court refused to permit testimony to this effect to be introduced by Lavender.

According to the abstract, no ruling of the court was elicited on that issue.

[4] Moreover, the appellee alleged that the sum of $6,000 was to be paid for the timber. Appellant Lavender does not deny that such was the consideration, but, on the contrary, he expressly admits that "he was induced to purchase said timber at and for the sum of $6,000." There was therefore no issue as to the amount of the consideration that Lavender was to pay for the timber. Even if Lavender had offered the testimony as above contended by him, the court would not have erred in excluding the same and thus restricting the parties to the issue raised by the pleadings.

The appellant Lavender, while admitting that he was to pay $6,000 for the timber, alleged that this consideration was agreed upon on account of the false representations of the appellee to the effect that there was 1,000,000 feet of timber in the tract. But there was no testimony to warrant the court in submitting an issue of deceit and fraud to the jury. Under the undisputed evidence, the court would have been justified in instructing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the appellee on this issue.

There was no error in the rulings of the court on the issues between the appellee and appellant Lavender. There was evidence to sustain the verdict as to appellant Lavender. The judgment as to him is therefore correct, and it will be affirmed.

As to the appellant company, the judgment will be reversed and the cause, for the error indicated, will be remanded for a new trial.

DAMRON v. BOWLEN. (No. 30.)

Deeds §211(1)—Evidence held to sustain finding of aged grantor's incapacity.

In suit by an aged woman, formerly incompetent and under guardianship, to cancel her deed to an 80-acre farm, evidence held to sustain the finding of the trial court in favor of plaintiff that she did not possess capacity to execute the deed.

Appeal from White Chancery Court; John E. Martineau, Chancellor.

Suit by Hattie M. Bowlen against Mollie L. Damron. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Brundidge & Neely, of Searcy, and Gardner K. Oliphint, of Little Rock, for appellant. Culbert L. Pearce, of Bald Knob, for appellee.

SMITH, J. This suit was instituted August 19, 1919, by appellee to cancel a deed which she had executed to appellant on October 26, 1918, and had delivered on the following day, to an 80-acre farm owned by her. The deed provided that appellee should remain in full and complete possession of the land during her life, and that she should receive as her own all rents and profits therefrom, and that she should have the exclusive control and management thereof. Appellee was past 70 years, and was childless. She had no blood relatives, except some nephews; but appellant and a Mrs. De Lille had both lived with appellee before they were married, and each of them called appellee mother, and she called each of them daughter. In May, 1918, appellee executed and delivered to Mrs. De Lille a deed to another 80-acre tract of land she owned, and appellant insists that there was no more consideration for that deed than there was for her own, and that the consideration in each case was love and affection, and she insists that the fact that no suit has been brought to cancel the De Lille deed should be strongly persuasive of the grantor's capacity to execute the two deeds. This litigation does not involve the De Lille deed; but it appears that Mrs. De Lille was an adopted daughter, and had lived in appellee's home for many years, while appellant was not an adopted daughter, and had lived in appellee's home only a few months altogether; in fact, for a period of about 15 years there was no communication between appellant and appellee. Appellee lived on the farm near Bald Knob, in White county, and appellant's home was at Bono, in Craighead county. Appellant came to appellee's home in response to a telegram, signed by appellee, asking her to do so, and appellee within a few days after appellant's arrival executed and delivered the deed here sought to be canceled.

It is not shown that any undue influence was exerted to obtain the deed, but the court found that appellee did not possess sufficient mental capacity to comprehend the effect of her action in executing the deed, and decreed its cancellation, and this appeal is from that decree.

Appellee testified that she was past 70, and that her health was feeble; that she was told that she had frequently called the name of appellant during a spell of illness she had had, but that she had no recollection of having done so, and that if she did this it was done in delirium because of the fever she had; and that she was sick when she executed the deed and did not realize or appreciate what she had done; and that, while she remembered something about the transaction, it was "kind of like a dream to her." Mrs. De Lille testified that appellant's husband went to town for a notary public, and that Mr. De Lille went with him; that the deed had been prepared before the notary came, and that the notary was there only a few minutes; and that appellee at the time was just getting over an attack of the influenza, from which she had been suffering.

A Dr. W. A. Clark testified that he had known appellee for 30 years, and that he had been her family physician for the 2 years immediately preceding the time of taking his deposition; that in November or December, 1917, appellee was adjudged insane by the probate court of White county, and he was appointed her guardian, and that he served as such until April or May, 1918, when he procured his discharge; that appellee was taken to a hospital in Memphis in August, 1917, and remained there for five months, during which time her condition, both mental and physical, was very bad; that after her return from the hospital her condition was improved, but that she had since had other serious illness. He expressed the opinion that appellee was incapable of transacting ordinary business affairs, and that "her mind is like a child's mind," but that she was in better physical condition in the last three months than she had been in for more than 2 years before.

A Dr. Cleveland testified that he had known appellee for 35 years, and for the large part of that time had been her physician, and he expressed the opinion that in recent years "she has very much deteriorated, both mentally and physically," and "in my opinion she was not capable of transacting important business" at the time of the execution of the deed.

J. S. Baker, a near neighbor who had known appellee intimately since 1880, testified that "her mind seemed kind of wavy," and a number of other neighbors detailed various incidents upon which they based the opinion that appellee's mentality had failed, and that she was not capable of understanding and transacting important business.

A tenant on the place named Sprouse, in response to the question whether appellee had sufficient mental capacity to execute the deed, expressed the opinion that, if she had mind enough to bring a suit to set her deed aside, she had mind enough to make the deed. Another tenant named Russell expressed the opinion that he had observed no change in appellee's mentality, and that she had the capacity to make the deed or other contract. He testified that no one could get along with appellee, and he had been unable to do so, and that she came into the field where he was plowing, and stated that he was trespassing and ordered him out of the field.

Other witnesses who had known appellee for varying lengths of time, and who had more or less association with her, expressed the opinion that she was sane. Some of these witnesses had had opportunity to see and observe appellee quite frequently, while others based opinions upon observation so slight as to carry but little weight.

The two physicians had special opportunities to observe appellee; but, even without their testimony, the evidence appears to be fairly balanced on the question of appellee's competency. The testimony of these physicians should, of course, be considered; in fact, their testimony is highly persuasive, and upon a consideration of the whole testimony we have concluded that the finding of the court below is not clearly against the preponderance of the evidence, and the decree is therefore affirmed.

HARROWER v. INSURANCE CO. OF NORTH AMERICA et al. (No. 19.)

1. Contracts \S 245(2)—Evidence \S 441(1)—Oral agreements and antecedent writings merge in subsequent written contract.

Oral agreements and antecedent writings forming a part of negotiations for a contract become merged in the subsequent written contract, and are incompetent for the purpose of enlarging the scope of such written contract.

2. Evidence \S 441(13)—Insurance \S 131(3)—Oral contract merged in written contract.

Where insurer and insured entered into an oral agreement for a policy covering a term of three years, "and then from year to year," etc., and the insurer delivered a policy for one year, which was accepted by insured and the premium paid, the policy executed and delivered constituted a contract between the parties, and the oral agreement was merged into it, and was incompetent as evidence to enlarge the scope of the written contract.

3. Frauds, statute of \S 45(1)—Contract to insure for a year, providing for issuance of other policies for three years, within statute.

An oral agreement, at the time a policy of insurance was issued for one year, that other policies should be issued from year to year for three years, was an agreement which was not to be performed within a year, and was within the statute of frauds (Kirby's Dig. \S 3654).

4. Frauds, statute of \S 150(1)—Statute properly raised by demurrer.

Question as to whether contract set out in petition was within statute of frauds was properly raised by demurrer.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County, Dardanelle District; A. B. Priddy, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lela H. Harrower against the Insurance Company of North America and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Crownover, of Dardanelle, for appellant.

Mehaffy, Donham & Mehaffy, of Little Rock, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellant instituted this action in the circuit court of Yell county, Dardanelle district, to recover on an alleged oral agreement between her and the two insurance companies sued, whereby the latter agreed to insure her property, consisting of a stock of merchandise and store fixtures, against loss or destruction by fire. The court sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and rendered judgment dismissing the complaint, from which an appeal has been prosecuted.

It is alleged in the complaint that appellant entered into a contract with the said companies, acting through their general agent at Dardanelle, on January 28, 1916, whereby it was agreed that the companies should insure her property "for the term of three years from that date, and then from year to year until such time as she might direct such contract should cease, provided defendants continued the business of writing fire insurance in said town of Dardanelle after said term of three years."

It is further alleged that, pursuant to said contract, the said companies issued and delivered to her a joint policy for the first year in part performance of the original agreement, and that she paid the premium for that policy and at that time directed the agent to write other policies "from year to year during the said three years and to come for the premium money when such policies were so written," and that the said companies, through their agent agreed to do so. It is also alleged that the property was destroyed by fire on October 8, 1918.

[1, 2] It is familiar law that prior oral agreements and antecedent writings forming a part of the negotiations for a contract become merged in the subsequent written contract and are incompetent as evidence for the purpose of enlarging the scope of such written contract. Graves v. Bodcaw Lumber Co., 129 Ark. 354, 196 S. W. 800. This applies to the alleged oral agreement set forth in the first part of the complaint, for according to the allegations of the complaint the agreement was for a policy covering the term of three years from that time "and then from year to year," etc., and that the companies issued and delivered a policy for one year, which was accepted by appellant and the premium paid. The policy issued and delivered constituted a contract between the parties and all antecedent negotiations and agreements were merged into it. Union National Bank, Oshkosh, v. German Ins. Co., 71 Fed. 473, 18 C. C. A. 203; Moore v. Insurance Co., 72 Iowa, 414, 34 N. W. 183; Commercial Accident Co. v. Bates, 176 Ill. 194, 52 N. E. 49;

[3] The last allegation with respect to the agreement between the parties is that at the time of the issuance of the policy the further agreement was that other policies should be "issued from year to year during the said three years," and this contract, according to the allegations, was not to be performed within a year from the making thereof and was within the statute of frauds. Kirby's Digest, § 3654. According to the allegations of the complaint, this contract was executory, and was not to take effect immediately, and was not a contract of insurance, but was one to insure or to issue a policy at a future date. A contract of insurance usually takes effect immediately, whereas a contract to insure or to issue a policy takes effect at a future date. The distinction between the two classes of contracts is made clear in the cases cited on the brief of counsel for appellees.

[4] The question as to the contract being within the statute of frauds was properly raised by demurrer. Izard v. Connecticut Fire Ins. Co., 128 Ark. 433, 194 S. W. 1032.

The court was therefore correct in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF FORREST CITY V. N. R. McFALL & CO. (No. 412)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 17, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 14, 1920.)

1. Banks and banking §143(5)—Dishonor of check held slander of business warranting general, without proof of special, damages.

Refusal of a bank to honor a merchants' or traders' check when sufficient funds are on deposit constitutes a slander of the merchant's or trader's business, and general damages are allowed as a matter of course, without proof of special damages.

2. Banks and banking §143(5)—Damages conclusively presumed from wrongful dishonor of check.

Where a merchants' or traders' check is wrongfully dishonored by the bank, damage is conclusively presumed, and is not rebuttable by proof.

3. Banks and banking §143(5)—Mitigation of damages for wrongful dishonor of check may be shown.

Although the presumption that a depositor is substantially damaged by wrongful dishonor of his check is conclusive, proof that no injury was sustained is nevertheless admissible in mitigation of damages.

McCulloch, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Francis County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by N. R. McFall & Co. against the First National Bank of Forrest City. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. J. Williams and Mann, Bussey & Mann, all of Forrest City, for appellant.

C. W. Norton, of Forrest City, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellee, a mercantile partnership composed of N. R. McFall and W. A. Scales, instituted suit against appellant, an incorporated bank, in the St. Francis circuit court, to recover damages on account of appellant's refusal to pay checks drawn by appellee on checking funds theretofore deposited by it in said bank. This is the second appeal in the case. The first appeal appeared here under the style of N. R. McFall et al. v. First National Bank of Forrest City, and is reported in 138 Ark. 370, 211 S. W. 919. The case was reversed on the first appeal and remanded for a new trial, because the trial court instructed the jury that it was incumbent upon appellee to prove actual damages to justify a recovery in excess of nominal damages. In reversing the case, this court laid down the rule that merchants' and traders' checks, wrongfully dishonored through mistake or otherwise by the bank upon which drawn, are entitled to recover substantial damages against the bank dishonoring them, without pleading or proof of special injury. In other words, the court announced the doctrine that the law presumed the wrongful dishonor of merchants' and traders' checks substantially damaged their credit, for which they could recover temperate or reasonable damages. This rule became the law of the case and served as the court's guide on the retrial of the cause.

The only difference between the testimony on the former and present appeals is that the present record reflects evidence adduced by appellant tending to show that the credit of appellee was not injured by the dishonor of the checks. Upon reversal and remand, the cause was submitted to a jury upon the pleadings, evidence, and instructions of the court, conforming to the rule announced in the former appeal, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for $500 against appellant in favor of appellee. From the judgment an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1, 2] It is insisted by appellant that the only effect of the rule announced in the former appeal was to place the burden upon appellant to show that appellee's credit was not injured, in order to exempt it from liability for substantial damages, and that, having made such affirmative showing, it was entitled to an instruction to the effect that the presumption of substantial damages, resulting from the wrongful dishonor of a merchant's or trader's check, could be overcome by evidence showing to the contrary. Two instructions, Nos. 2 and 3, requested by appellant and refused by the court, were to that effect. It is urged that the court committed reversible error in refusing to give them. One reason for the rule allowing a merchant or trader temperate or reasonable damages for the wrongful dishonor of his checks on mere proof of his character of business is because it is almost impossible to prove special injury or damage. It is just as impossible to prove that no injury resulted as to prove it did. For that reason, if no other, the doctrine contended for by appellant is not sound. The wrongful dishonor of a merchant's or trader's check is a slander on his business. The foundation of his business is the credit which is injured per se by the dishonor of his paper. So this character of case is akin to and comes within the category of slander suits in which general damages are allowed as a matter of course without proof of special damages. The necessary and natural consequence of the dishonor of a merchant's or trader's check is to substantially damage him, and the conclusive presumption indulged by the law that he is damaged is based upon such necessary or natural result. Conclusive presumptions of law are irrebuttable by proof. The court did not therefore err in refusing to give appellant's requests Nos. 2 and 3.

[3] Notwithstanding the law presumes a depositor is substantially damaged by the wrongful dishonor of his check and that he is entitled to temperate damages without proof of special damage, yet it is permissible to make such proof in mitigation of damages. The fact that such proof is admissible in behalf of a merchant or trader whose check had been wrongfully dishonored would suggest the right on the part of the bank dishonoring the check to affirmatively show that no injury to such depositor's credit resulted, in mitigation of damages, but it could only be used in mitigation of damages, because, if the rule were otherwise, the conclusive presumption of substantial damages, indulged by the law, might be rendered nugatory.

No error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

McCULLOCH, C. J., dissents.

RUDOLPH v. KELLY. (No. 23.)

1. Sales §323—Testimony properly excluded as not germane to issue.

In action to recover a touring car, claimed by defendant to have been purchased by him with a deed to certain land, testimony for plaintiff as to the value of the land, and that at the time the witness traded it to defendant for defendant's automobile, which defendant had been trying to induce plaintiff to accept in exchange for his car, defendant represented that he had the right to sell the car, etc., held properly excluded, as not germane to issue.

2. Pleading §36(2)—Plaintiff cannot claim no sale to defendant, while claiming a sale effected by false representations.

In action to recover automobile, claimed by defendant to have been bought by him with a deed, plaintiff will not be heard to say in one breath that he did not sell the car to defendant, and in the next breath that, if he did sell it, defendant made false representations.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clark County; George R. Haynie, Judge.

Action by Irvin H. Rudolph against J. E. Kelly. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McMillan & McMillan, of Arkadelphia, for appellant.

W. H. Mizell, of Arkadelphia, and D. D. Glover, of Malvern, for appellee.

WOOD, J. This action was brought by the appellant against the appellee to recover the possession of a Ford touring car. The appellant alleged that he was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession of the car; that it was worth $500; that the appellee upon demand of appellant refused to surrender the same. The appellee denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that he had been damaged by the wrongful bringing of the suit in the sum of $500, for which he asked judgment.

The facts, which the testimony on behalf of the appellee tended to show, are substantially as follows: Appellant was a dealer in automobiles. The appellee owned a Chevrolet car, and proposed to the appellant to trade him the same for a Ford. This the appellant refused. The appellee gave his Chevrolet and the sum of $50 to Charlie Allen for a 40-acre tract of land near Arkadelphia, Ark. While the appellee was negotiating for this land, the appellant told him that, if he could make the deal with Allen for the land, appellant would give the appellee the Ford car for the land. After the appellee had bought the land, he and his wife made the deed to the appellant. While appellee was negotiating for the land, the appellant told appellee that he was going away, and that appellee could make the deed and deliver it to appellant's agent, Thompson, who was authorized to receive it. The appellee delivered the deed to appellant's agent, who delivered to appellee the Ford car.

The facts, which the testimony on behalf of the appellant tended to show, are substantially as follows: When appellee proposed to trade appellant 40 acres of land for appellant's Ford car, appellant told appellee that he might make the trade if the land was all right. Appellee said it was a 40-acre tract of good land; that the timber had never been cut over, and he thought it was worth $400. Appellant let appellee have the car in controversy, to deliver appellee's Chevrolet, which appellee had traded for the land. Appellee never brought the car back. Appellant was to get a note secured by the land and a Ford car. Appellant had never seen the land at the time he agreed to take same in trade for the car. The appellant did not trade the car for the land. Appellee did not make the deed to the appellant before he (appellee) took possession of the car. Appellee had the car in his possession, which appellant had loaned him, and when appellant got back from Hot Springs he found that appellee had left the deed with appellant's agent, Thompson. Appellant denied that he had instructed his agent, Thompson, to deliver the car and accept the deed in his absence.

Appellant testified that the car in controversy was taken in on trade for a Dodge car from one Brewer; the understanding being that he, appellant, or Brewer, had the right to dispose of it for $500, the amount of the balance Brewer owed on the Dodge car. The effect of appellant's testimony was that he did not own the car in controversy at the time he loaned the same to the appellee; that it was only left with him by Brewer to secure appellant in the sum of $500, for the balance of the purchase money due him from Brewer for a Dodge car, which either he or Brewer had the right to sell; that appellant loaned the car in controversy to the appellee; that appellant was contemplating a trade of the car with the appellee for 40 acres of land, provided the appellee obtained the land, but that the trade between the appellant and appellee had not been consummated at the time appellant left for Hot Springs. The trade between appellant and appellee, according to appellant's version, was that he was to sell appellee the car for $500 and take the appellee's note for same secured by the land and the car.

The appellant offered to prove by Charlie Adams the value of the land which appellant sold to the appellee. The court refused to admit this testimony, to which ruling the appellant excepted. The appellant further offered to show by witness Allen that, at the time he traded the land to the appellee for the Chevrolet car, appellee represented that he had the right to sell the Chevrolet; that at that time one Dr. Moore held a $75 ownership note against the car which appellee traded to Allen for the land.

The court refused to allow this testimony, to which ruling the appellant duly excepted. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the appellee. From that judgment is this appeal.

[1] The court did not err in its rulings. The offered testimony was not germane to the issue between the appellant and the appellee. The offered testimony related to issues that were entirely collateral. The clear-cut issue between the appellant and the appellee, as set forth by the pleadings and the testimony of the parties, respectively, is whether or not the appellant had sold the automobile in controversy to the appellee for the tract of land conveyed by the appellee to appellant. Appellant set up in his complaint that he was the owner and entitled to immediate possession of the automobile. He grounded his ownership and right to possession on the following testimony:

"The trade was I was to get a note secured by the land and the Ford car. I loaned him the car to go make the trade with Mr. Allen and deliver the Chevrolet to Mr. Allen."

In his rebuttal testimony, the appellant again stated:

"The trade is like I stated it was in my original statement. I did not trade the car for the piece of land."

On the other hand, appellee denied that the appellant was the owner of the car, and testified in part:

"I traded my land for the car. I got the land from Charlie Allen. Traded Allen a Chevrolet car, and Allen made me a deed to the land. It was a fractional 40, but the same land traded to me by Allen was traded to Rudolph. We made an even trade, the land for the car."

[2] The appellant will not be heard to say, in one breath, "I did not sell the car," and in the next breath, "But, if I did sell it, the appellee made false representations which caused me to do so, and the appellee consequently had no title to the land which he gave me in consideration for the automobile." A party will not be allowed in this manner to play fast and loose in a lawsuit. The positions which appellant thus asks the court to allow him to assume in this litigation were wholly inconsistent with each other. Furthermore, even if the appellant had set up that there was a sale of the automobile, and that the consideration therefor had failed on account of the deceit and fraud of the appellee, there is no testimony whatever in the record to sustain such contention. There is no testimony to prove that if the sale was made, which was asserted by the appellee and denied by the appellant, the consideration failed because the appellee had no title to the land. On the contrary, the undisputed evidence shows that his title to the land was complete.

The issue, and the only issue, between the appellant and the appellee, was submitted to the jury under correct instructions. There was evidence to sustain the verdict.

Affirmed.

HUGHES v. GARDNER. (No. 20.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1097(1)—Declarations of law on first appeal controlling on second.

On a second appeal where the issues and facts are the same as on the first appeal, what was declared as the law on the first appeal must control.

2. Bills and notes \S 485—Note presumed genuine, and burden on defendant in absence of denial by affidavit.

Kirby's Dig. \S 3108, authorizing a writing purporting to have been executed by a party and referred to in and filed with a pleading, to be read as genuine against such party, unless he denies its genuineness by affidavit before trial, allows note sued on in absence of such affidavit, to be introduced without formal proof of execution and with presumption of its genuineness, casting on defendant the burden of proving it not genuine.

3. Bills and notes \S 537(2)—Genuineness of signature for jury on conflicting evidence.

Genuineness of defendant's signature to note sued on is for the jury, there being not only the presumption of genuineness under Kirby's Dig. \S 3108, because of defendant's failure to file affidavit of denial, but there being introduced for comparison a recorded mortgage purporting, and testified by plaintiff, to have been executed by defendant, though opposed to this is the testimony of defendant and others that the signature to the note is not hers.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Benton County; W. A. Dickson, Judge.

Action by John Gardner against Pearl Hughes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. N. Ivie, of Rogers, for appellant.

Rice & Rice, of Bentonville, for appellee.

WOOD, J. This action was brought by the appellee against the appellant. The action was grounded on a promissory note dated June 23, 1913, purporting to have been executed by E. R. Hughes and appellant, Pearl Hughes, to the appellee for the sum of $500.

In defense of the action appellant set up non est factum and coverture.

This is the second appeal in this case. Gardner v. Hughes, 136 Ark. 332, 206 S. W. 878.

[1] The issues here are the same as they were on the former appeal. Therefore, unless there has been some substantial change in the facts, what was declared as the law on the former appeal must control now under the familiar doctrine of the law of the case. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Enoch, 79 Ark. 475, 96 S. W. 393; Morgan Engineering Co. v. Cache River Drainage Dist., 122 Ark. 491, 184 S. W. 57; Carter v. Younger, 123 Ark. 266, 185 S. W. 435; U. S. Annuity & Life Ins. Co. v. Peak, 129 Ark. 50, 195 S. W. 392, 1 A. L. R. 1259.

On the former appeal the court directed a verdict in favor of Pearl Hughes. On the issue of non est factum, under the facts developed in the former appeal, we said:

"If the undisputed evidence showed that appellee did not sign the note, it was proper for the court to sustain her plea of non est factum by directed verdict. Under the state of pleadings, the note itself is introduced, and her signature is prima facie genuine. * * * Her subsequent denial thereof raised a question of disputed fact, which could only be determined by the jury."

Mrs. Hughes testified on the former trial as she did at the last trial that she did not sign the note. On the former appeal we held that her testimony did not overcome the prima facie genuineness of the note under the state of the pleadings, and that it was still a question for the jury as to whether the note was genuine.

On this issue, if there were no other testimony in the present record than that of Mrs. Hughes, this court under the rule of law of the case would be bound by its former announcement, even though such announcement was erroneous.

On the last trial, Mrs. Gould, the mother of Mrs. Hughes, testified that she was familiar with the latter's handwriting, and that the signature on the note in controversy was not that of Mrs. Hughes. E. G. Sharp, cashier of the Farmers' State Bank in Rogers, testified that he had in his possession checks signed by Mrs. Hughes and knew her signature, and that he did not believe that the signature on the note was that of Mrs. Hughes.

[2] Section 8108 of Kirby's Digest provides:

"Where a writing purporting to have been executed by one of the parties is referred to in, and filed with, a pleading, it may be read as genuine against such party, unless he denies its genuineness by affidavit before the trial is begun."

This is a rule for the production of evidence which relieves the plaintiff, who sues on a writing purporting to have been executed by the defendant, of the burden of proving the genuineness of the writing before its introduction as evidence where the defendant by affidavit has not denied the genuineness of the writing before the trial is begun. But in the absence of this statute the plaintiff would have the burden of showing the genuineness of the writing before he could introduce the same in evidence. The purpose of the statute, however, was only to permit the reading or introduction of the writing without formal proof of its execution and to make it prima facie genuine. Where the defendant has not complied with this statute, the plaintiff may introduce and read the writing on which his action is founded, and under the statute the presumption is that it is genuine. The burden is then cast upon the defendant, if he would defeat the action, to prove that the writing is not genuine.

In other words, a failure upon the part of the defendant to comply with the statute raises the inference or presumption of law that the writing on which he is sued and purporting to be signed by him is genuine, and, having failed to file the affidavit provided by the statute, the burden is cast on him to show that it is not genuine.

The rule applicable to such presumptions is announced in 16 Cyc. 1073, as follows:

"A presumption of law is a rule of law announcing a definite probative weight attached by jurisprudence to a proposition of logic. It is an assumption made by the law that a strong inference of fact is prima facie correct, and will, therefore, sustain the burden of evidence, until conflicting facts on the point are shown. When such evidence is introduced, the assumption of law is functus officio and drops out of sight. The inference of fact which has been assumed to be correct continues to have its logical weight in the case."

[3] Learned counsel for appellant contends that, under the above rule, the presumption that the note is genuine has been overcome by the testimony of appellant and her two corroborating witnesses that the signature is not appellant's. But we are not called to determine whether the testimony thus produced by appellant is sufficient to overcome the prima facie genuineness of the note raised by the failure of appellant to comply with the statute, for the reason that appellee did not rest upon the statutory presumption. Appellee introduced in evidence a mortgage which purported to be signed by appellant and duly acknowledged by her. This mortgage was recorded. Counsel for appellant objected to the introduction of the mortgage on the ground that it was not the basis of the suit and had not been filed with any pleading in the case, and was therefore not a paper that could be used in evidence for the purpose of comparing the signature thereon with the signature on the note to prove the genuineness of the latter. The court overruled the objection and permitted the appellee to introduce the mortgage.

Counsel for appellant says in his brief that the signing and execution of the mortgage was denied under oath, and that this mortgage was clearly inadmissible under the doctrine announced by this court in Miller v. Jones, Adm'r, 32 Ark. 337, where we held (quoting syllabus):

"Proof of handwriting may be made by comparison, by the jury, of the writing to be proven with other writings, admitted to be genuine, already in the case; but a comparison by writings not already in the case, is not admissible."

Now when the mortgage was offered and introduced in evidence appellant did not object to its introduction on the ground that it was not signed by her, but only on the ground that "it is not sued on in this case, and is not a paper belonging to or filed with any pleading in the suit." Besides, as we construe the record, abstracted by appellant, the execution of the mortgage by appellant was not disputed when appellee was seeking to prove that the signature to the note was made by the same person who signed the mortgage.

The record shows the following on the redirect examination of witness Sharp by the appellee:

Q. Now, I will ask you to take these two signatures and this signature to the mortgage introduced. The signature of Pearl Hughes to the mortgage and the signature on that note, and tell the jury whether they are the same.

Counsel for Defendant, W. N. Ivie: I object to that. In the first place, there is no contest or dispute about these two signatures.

The Court: You admit they are by the same party?

Counsel for Defendant, W. N. Ivie: We do not admit that they are the same party, but we deny signing either note or mortgage. It is not disputed.

The Court: If you do not dispute it, there is no use of going into it.

Counsel for Defendant, W. N. Ivie: We do not dispute it.

Counsel for Plaintiff, C. M. Rice: Let the record show it, then, that there is no dispute.

The Court: All right.

The above examination concluded the testimony on behalf of the appellee. The appellee testified, at the time the mortgage was introduced, that they (E. R. and Pearl Hughes) executed and delivered to him the mortgage to secure the note, and appellee's counsel then announced that the purpose of introducing the mortgage was to compare the signatures. Therefore the manifest purpose of the above examination of witness Sharp was to show, by comparison of the signature to the note which was in dispute, with the signature to the mortgage, the execution of which by appellant had been proved and was not in dispute, that appellant had signed the note as well as the mortgage. The court evidently so understood it, and obviously counsel for appellant so understood it. If counsel wished to object to the mortgage on the ground that appellant had not signed same, then was the time for him to speak and let the court know that he made this additional objection to the mortgage as evidence. True, the appellant testified that she "signed neither one of them." But even at that time appellant did not ask to have the mortgage excluded, on the ground that it had not been signed by her.

We conclude therefore that the court did not err in admitting the mortgage in evidence for the purpose indicated. This mortgage and the admission of appellant's counsel in open court in connection therewith, to the effect that there was no dispute that the signature to the note was by the same party who signed the mortgage, were most cogent facts before the jury on the last trial that they did not have before them on the first.

In the case of Miller v. Jones, supra, papers that were not in evidence and that had been excluded were handed to the jury for the comparison of signatures on papers that were in evidence in the case, and we held that—"It was error * * * to allow the papers not in the case to be handed to the jury for a comparison with those read in evidence."

That case has no application for the reason that here the mortgage was read in evidence and was a paper in the case.

Concerning the issue of coverture on the former appeal, we said:

"There a substantial proof in the case tending to show that the money was loaned to appellee on the statement that it was to be used for the purpose of going East to look after her separate property. If her signature was genuine, a question for the jury to determine, then the proof tended to show that appellee armed her husband with a negotiable instrument to raise money for her personal benefit and she would be bound by the statement of her agent, thus authorized to raise money for her, to the effect that money was wanted for her personal benefit. Appellee's denial that the money was borrowed for her personal benefit or that of her separate property raised a question of fact for the jury to determine."

On the issue of coverture the facts developed at the last trial are substantially the same as they were in the first trial. In all essential particulars there is no material difference. Hence what was said on this issue on the former appeal is controlling. Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Enoch, supra; Ins. Co. v. Peak, supra.

The court did not err in refusing to take the issue of non est factum and coverture from the jury. These issues were submitted under correct instructions.

Appellant, as one of the grounds of her motion for new trial, challenges the integrity of the verdict on account of alleged misconduct of one of the jurors as set forth in an affidavit attached to the motion. It could serve no useful purpose to set out and comment upon the contents of the affidavit. It suffices to say that we have considered the same and find that the trial court did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict because of alleged misconduct of one of the jurors.

There is no reversible error.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LIGHTLE v. SCHMIDT et al. (No. 25.)

lis pendens ¶25(1) — Purchaser in unenforceable parol contract made prior to notice of suit involving title held bound by notice.

Where suit for specific performance of a written contract was instituted by a buyer of land before the seller's deed to a third person pursuant to an earlier parol contract of sale was delivered, and before the third person had paid any part of the purchase money or had taken possession, the third person's contract was unenforceable, and he was therefore affected by the buyer's lis pendens filed under Kirby's Dig. § 5149.

Appeal from White Chancery Court; John E. Martineau, Chancellor.

Suit by J. E. Lightle against Sidney W. Schmidt, wherein J. S. Booth intervened. From decree dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

On the 18th day of May, 1919, J. E. Lightle brought suit in equity against Sidney W. Schmidt to enforce the specific performance of a written contract for the sale of a tract of land in White county, Ark., and a lis pendens notice was filed under the provisions of section 5149 of Kirby's Digest.

J. S. Booth filed an intervention and claimed to be an innocent purchaser for value of the land in controversy.

It appears from the record that the duly authorized agent of Sidney W. Schmidt entered into a written contract with J. E. Lightle to convey to him the land in controversy, and, it being conceded that the contract was binding upon Schmidt, it is not necessary to set it out in the statement of facts.

Another agent of Schmidt entered into a verbal contract with J. S. Booth for the sale of the land in controversy to him. A deed was forwarded to Schmidt for execution and was received and executed by Schmidt on May 17, 1919. Schmidt, after executing the deed, held it for a few days to see if his other agent would not get a greater price for the land. Schmidt was notified by telegram that J. E. Lightle, on the 19th of May, 1919, had filed a suit for specific performance of the contract for the sale of the land made with him. The parol contract between the agent of Schmidt and J. S. Booth for the sale of the land in controversy was made on May 15, 1919. Under its terms the cashier of a bank was directed to pay the purchase money when the deed and abstract of title was delivered to it. Booth did not enter into possession of the land and was notified of the suit by Lightle for a specific performance before the deed was delivered to the bank.

The complaint of the plaintiff was dismissed for want of equity, and the case is here on appeal.

Brundidge & Neelly, of Searcy, for appellant.

Miller & Yingling and Eugene Cypert, all of Searcy, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is conceded that the contract between Lightle and Schmidt was one that the former might enforce in a suit for specific performance if Booth was bound by the lis pendens notice filed when the suit was instituted. In Marshall v. Whatley, 136 Ga. 805, 72 S. E. 244, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552, it was held that a suit for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of real estate is within the rule as to lis pendens, and that one who acquires an interest in the property pending the suit from a party thereto is bound by the result of the suit. Several decisions from courts of last resort of other states are cited in support of the rule. The doctrine of lis pendens is founded on public policy and has been long adhered to as essential to the due administration of justice in order that an end may be put to litigation. Bailey v. Ford, 132 Ark. 208, 200 S. W. 797.

Counsel for Booth seek to uphold the decree upon the principles announced in Moulton v. Kolodzik, 97 Minn. 423, 107 N. W. 154, 7 Ann. Cas. 1090, and Parks v. Smoot, 105 Ky. 63, 48 S. W. 146, in which it is held that a person who enters into an executory contract for the purchase of land, prior to the institution of a suit involving the title thereto, acquires an interest in the land and may after such suit is brought pay the purchase money and receive a deed to the land unaffected by the rule of lis pendens. Those cases, however, have no application to the facts in the present case. In each of those cases the executory contract of sale was binding and enforceable in equity. It is true that in the latter case the contract of sale was a parol one, but the purchaser had entered into the possession of the land and was entitled to a specific performance of his contract. Here the suit by Lightle for specific performance was instituted before the deed to Booth was delivered and before Booth had paid any part of the purchase money. Neither had Booth entered into the possession of the land. Hence he was not entitled to a specific performance of his contract. Before the rights of parties completing a parol contract for the sale of lands pending litigation will be protected, it must appear that the interest under the executory agreement is capable of being enforced. Rooney v. Michael, 84 Ala. 585, 4 South. 421. In order that the interest acquired by Booth may be effectual against the rule of lis pendens, his contract must be enforceable. Gibler et al. v. Trimble, 14 Ohio, 323, and Clarkson v. Morgan's Devisees, 6 B. Mon. (Ky.) 441.

As we have already seen, the contract with Booth was not obligatory on the parties and could not have been enforced. Therefore he was affected by the lis pendens notice in the suit for specific performance by Lightle against Schmidt.

It follows that the chancery court erred in dismissing the complaint of the plaintiff for want of equity. For that error the decree must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles of equity and not inconsistent with this opinion.

MITCHELL v. REDUS. (No. 32.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.)

1. Specific performance §55—Contract held unenforceable on account of agreement to stifle prosecution.

Where plaintiff was placed in possession of defendant's property under promise to convey it to her either on condition she would not prosecute defendant for carnal abuse of her daughter, or sue him for damages, or else under a voluntary oral gift, a court of equity will not enforce specific performance, on account of the illegality.

2. Specific performance §47—Betterments on property given orally held too slight to support specific performance.

Repairs costing $2 or $3, made by plaintiff on the roof of property orally given her by defendant, were betterments too inconsequential to be classed as valuable and permanent to entitle her to specific performance of defendant's agreement to convey.

Appeal from Pulaski Chancery Court; John B. Martineau, Chancellor.

Suit by Luevina Mitchell against L. W. Redus. From decree dismissing the bill, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Weas, of North Little Rock, and Gardner K. Oliphint, of Little Rock, for appellant.
John M. Rose, of Little Rock, for appellee.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellant instituted suit against appellee, on the 28th day of July, 1919, in the Pulaski chancery court, to require him to execute her a deed to lots 7 and 8, block 6, Ratterree's addition to Argenta, Ark., in accordance with an alleged agreement to that effect between them. Appellee filed answer, denying that he had agreed to convey the lots to her. The cause was submitted to the court upon the pleadings and evidence, which resulted in a dismissal of appellant's bill for want of equity. From that decree, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

The undisputed evidence showed that appellee, a married negro man, employed a negro girl, 12 years of age, in May, 1915, daughter of appellant, to work in his rooming house in Argenta; that she remained in his employ a number of months, and during that time gave birth to a boy child, who bears the name of appellee.

The testimony of appellant tended to show that appellee assumed responsibility for the pregnancy of the girl, and voluntarily agreed to convey said property to appellant when he paid it out, and, in the meantime, to keep it in repair, if appellant would not prosecute him for carnal abuse or sue him for damages; that she agreed to the proposal, and, pursuant to the agreement, was placed in the possession of the property, where she has since continuously resided with her family, including the girl and child; that, during the occupancy, appellee paid the taxes, kept the property in repair, and made permanent improvements thereon, appellant expending $2 or $3 only, for repairs on the roof; that appellee never collected any rent from her or demanded any until a short time before the institution of the suit; that appellee then attempted to sell the property to a third party, and demanded possession thereof.

Appellee's testimony tended to show that he was not the father of the child; that he never assumed responsibility for it; that he never promised to convey the property to the appellant to prevent her from prosecuting or suing him; that he never placed her in possession thereof under a contract to convey it to her when he paid for it, but, on the contrary, placed her in possession under a contract of tenancy, which remained in force until the institution of this suit.

[1, 2] It is unnecessary to analyze and determine in whose favor the evidence preponderates in order to adjudge the issues involved in this appeal. Giving the evidence of appellant full credence, it shows either that she was placed in possession of the property under promise to convey it to her, on condition she would not prosecute appellee for carnal abuse or sue him for damages, or else under a voluntary oral gift. A court of equity will not enforce specific performance in either case. First: "Any contract, the consideration of which in whole or in part is to conceal a crime or to stifle a prosecution therefor, is illegal and void, though it may represent a just debt and security for its payment." Goodrum v. Merchants' & Planters' Bank, 102 Ark. 326, 144 S. W. 198, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 511. Appellant's evidence carries an admission that the consideration, in part, for the sale and seisin of the lots was to stifle a prosecution for carnal abuse. This necessarily rendered the contract void and nonenforceable as against public policy. Second: "A parol gift of land will not be enforced unless followed by possession and by valuable and substantial improvements made by the donee, or unless there are some other special facts which would render the failure to complete the donation peculiarly inequitable." Young v. Crawford, 82 Ark. 33, 100 S. W. 87. The evidence is entirely barren of special facts in relation to the property, or its occupancy which would render the failure to complete the donation peculiarly inequitable and unjust. Likewise, the betterments placed upon the property by appellant were too inconsequential to be classed as valuable and permanent.

No error appearing, the decree is affirmed.

HEMPSTEAD COUNTY v. WILSON. (No. 16.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 907(5)—Court must assume documentary evidence not in exceptions had force for successful party.

Where the testimony of a witness as set forth in the bill of exceptions shows that he testified from certain documentary evidence, and that it constituted a part of the evidence in the case, but it was not copied in the bill of exceptions, the Supreme Court must assume that such documentary evidence had some probative force in establishing the claim of plaintiff, who secured judgment.

2. Appeal and error \S 1082(2) — Objection to items of county clerk's fee bill cannot be first made on county's appeal from circuit court.

Where no objection as to the insufficiency of the specification of items of the fee bill of the county clerk was made in the circuit court on appeal from allowance of claim by county court, it is too late for the county to raise the question on its appeal from circuit court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hempstead County; George R. Haynie, Judge.

U. A. Gentry, of Hope, for appellant.
Steve Carrigan, of Hope, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, C. J. Appellee Wilson is county clerk of Hempstead county and filed a claim for fees against the county in the following form:

"Washington, Ark., April 28, 1919.

"County of Hempstead, to John L. Wilson, County Clerk, Dr.

"Services in and about County Court, Fee Book, pages 165 and 166, $133.05."

An affidavit in statutory form was attached to the claim. The county court allowed $99.15 of the claim, but refused to allow the balance, and appellee prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court, where, on a trial anew, the claim was allowed in full.

[1] It is contended that there was not sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment. Mr. O. C. Bailey, the clerk of the circuit court, was introduced as a witness, and testified concerning appellee's fee bill, and as to the method of making out circuit court fee bills. It appears from the testimony that the fees of appellee were based upon services performed with reference to the fee bills approved by the circuit court and filed with the county court for allowance. The testimony of Mr. Bailey, as set forth in the bill of exceptions, showed that he testified from the itemized circuit court fee bills, and they constituted a part of the evidence in the case; but they were not copied in the bill of exceptions. We must assume therefore that those fee bills had some probative force in establishing appellee's claim in connection with the testimony of Mr. Bailey.

It is also contended that appellee's claim was not presented in proper form, in that it was not itemized as required by statute, which provides that—

"The county court shall require an itemized account of any claims presented to them for allowance, sworn to as required by the preceding section, and may, in all cases require satisfactory evidence, in addition thereto, of the correctness of the account, and may examine the parties and witnesses on oath touching the same." Kirby's Digest, § 1454.

[2] Appellee's claim as filed did set forth the pages of the fee book in the office of the county clerk for the specification of the items. No objection as to the insufficiency of the specification of the items was made in the court below, and it is too late to raise that question here for the first time. If objection had been made on that point, the court could have permitted amendment.

We are of the opinion therefore that there are no grounds for a reversal of the judgment, and the same is affirmed.

PATTON et al. v. TAYLOR. (No. 13.)

1. Insane persons §71—Chancery court held to have jurisdiction to cancel curator's deed.

A court of chancery has jurisdiction of a suit to cancel a deed given by a curator under order of court, expunge it from the record, and to regain possession of land, the remedy at law either by motion to vacate or by certiorari not being effective to reach cancellation or to expunge the deed from the record, and therefore not being adequate and complete.

2. Insane persons §94(1)—Court may inquire into defendant's sanity for purpose of particular suit.

It is proper when a defendant not under guardianship develops evidence of insanity for the court to inquire into his mental condition for purposes of the particular suit in order to protect his interests by the appointment of a guardian or next friend to defend for him.

3. Insane persons §87—Power to sue and be sued stated.

An insane person not under guardianship may sue and be sued the same as a sane person.

4. Appeal and error §174—Former insanity of party cannot be first raised on appeal.

In a suit by a plaintiff formerly insane to cancel a curator's deed and certain judgments and orders, defendants, not having initiated an inquiry into plaintiff's sanity below, cannot, on appeal, insist that the suit should have been dismissed on account of the insanity of plaintiff below.

5. Insane persons §70—Probate court held not to have jurisdiction to sell realty of non-resident insane person.

Acts 1905, p. 198, §§ 1, 2, not authorizing appointment of guardian for nonresident insane person on sale of property in this state by local guardians, and section 3, limiting the jurisdiction of probate courts over the property of nonresidents to authority to appoint guardians and to sell upon proper bond, do not give a probate court jurisdiction over the person or property of a nonresident insane person so as to authorize a local guardian to make a valid conveyance of such insane person's realty.

6. Improvements §4(1)—Purchaser of land under void judicial proceedings not precluded from benefits of betterment statute.

A purchaser of land under a curator's deed given by order of court under void judicial proceedings is not thereby precluded from the benefits of the betterment statute, since occupants of land under color of title, who make improvements thereon in good faith believing themselves to be the owners thereof, are protected under such statute to the extent of the enhanced value of the lands by reason of their improvements.

7. Improvements §4(2)—Test of good faith under betterment statute stated.

To entitle an occupant of land to remuneration for his improvements under the betterment statute, the test of good faith is whether he made the improvements in the honest belief that he was the true proprietor, and in ignorance that any other person claimed a better right to the land.

8. Insane persons §71—Purchaser held entitled to value of improvements in suit by ward to cancel deed.

The purchaser of land under a curator's deed, given under void judicial proceedings, who make improvements upon the land, held entitled, in a suit by the ward to cancel the deed, to a lien on the land for its enhanced value by reason of the improvements made by him.

9. Improvements §4(5)—Under betterment statute, recovery may be had for enhanced value of land.

In allowing for improvements under the betterment statute, evidence should be considered as to the enhanced value of the land by reason of the improvements, and the cost of the improvements is merely a circumstance tending to establish such enhanced value.

Appeal from Benton Chancery Court; B. F. McMahan, Chancellor.

Suit by Amanda E. Taylor against J. W. Patton and others, to cancel a deed and certain orders and judgments. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and in part reversed and remanded, with directions.

Rice & Rice, of Bentonville, for appellants.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellee instituted suit against appellants in the Benton chancery court to cancel a deed from M. C. Patton, as curator, to J. W. Patton, of date September 9, 1916, conveying the following described real estate in Benton county, Ark., to wit: N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 21, and S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, section 16, all in township 20 N., range 32 W.—to expunge the record thereof and to cancel the orders and judgments of the Benton county probate court, ordering and confirming the sale of said land. On the 14th day of August, 1916, appellant, M. C. Patton, mother of appellee, applied to the Benton county probate court for appointment as guardian of appellee's estate, consisting of the lands aforesaid, without notice to and the presence of appellee before the court. Application for said appointment was made under section 1, Act 77, Acts of the General Assembly of 1905. Letters of guardianship were immediately issued, and on the same day appellant, M. C. Patton, applied for an order of sale of said land under section 2 of said act, and procured it without giving 30 days' notice in a newspaper published in said county, as provided in said section. Pursuant to said order, the land was sold at public sale, after 20 days' notice in a newspaper of general circulation in said county, to J. W. Patton, the highest bidder at said sale, for \$1,000, the full value of the land, according to the evidence. The sale was reported to, and confirmed by, the court. A deed was ordered, executed, approved, and delivered to the purchaser, J. W. Patton, who took possession of the land and began to make improvements thereon after the sale, and completed them after procuring and recording his deed. The improvements consisted of clearing, digging a well, building a house and barn, etc. At the time and prior to the appointment of M. O. Patton as guardian for appellee aforesaid appellee had been a resident of Oklahoma for eight or nine years, and was adjudicated insane, and confined in the asylum at Vinita in said state on the 1st day of July, 1916, where she remained until June, 1917, at which time she was discharged, as recovered. The chancery court canceled the deed, orders, and proceedings of the probate court in relation to the sale of the lands, decreed possession thereof to appellee, denied appellant, J. W. Patton, a lien on the land for his improvements, but permitted him to remove them in so far as it was possible without injury to the land. From that judgment and decree an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1] Appellants contend that the chancery court had no jurisdiction to try the cause, because appellee had a complete and adequate remedy at law, either by motion to vacate the orders and judgments of the probate court or by certiorari to quash them. The gist of the action was to cancel the deed, expunge same from the record, and regain possession of the land. The remedy at law, either by motion to vacate the judgment or by certiorari, would not have reached the cancellation of the deed or the expunging of same from the record, and therefore would not have been adequate and complete.

[2-4] It is next insisted that the court should have dismissed the cause, because not brought by guardian or next friend. This suit was filed on August 1, 1919, after appellee had been discharged from the Vinita asylum, as recovered. The certificate of the medical superintendent of that institution is as follows:

"I hereby certify that Amanda E. Taylor was received in this institution on the first day of July, 1916, from Ottawa county and discharged June, 1917, as recovered."

The evidence tended to show appellee was afflicted with periodical insanity, having lucid intervals. It is proper, when a defendant, not under guardianship, develops evidences of insanity for the court to inquire into his mental condition for purposes of the particular suit, in order to protect his interests by the appointment of a guardian or next friend to defend for him. Peters v. Townsend, 93 Ark. 103, 124 S. W. 255. Such inquiry might be appropriate to protect a sane defendant against the unauthorized suit of an insane person, but no such inquiry was suggested or demanded by appellants, and none was made on the court's own motion. An insane person, not under guardianship, can sue and be sued the same as a sane person. Peters v. Townsend, supra. Not having initiated such inquiry in the court below, appellants cannot now insist that the suit should have been dismissed on account of the insanity of appellee, the plaintiff below.

[5] It is next insisted that the probate court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of litigation, and that the proceedings therein are not subject to attack. The probate court of Benton county had no jurisdiction over the person or property of appellee, and could acquire none by the appointment of a local guardian. Sections 1 and 2, Act 77, Acts 1905, do not authorize the appointment of a guardian for a nonresident insane person, nor the sale of such an one's property in this state by local guardian. Those sections only apply to insane citizens of this state confined in institutions or asylums for insane, either in or out of the state. Section 3 of said act governs with reference to the sale of the property of nonresidents who are insane. That section limits the jurisdiction of the probate courts of this state over the property of nonresidents who are insane to authority to order the duly appointed guardian, or his agent under power of attorney, in the state of his residence, to sell said property and receive the proceeds therefor upon the execution of proper bond. The proceedings therefore, of the probate court of Benton county, in appointing a local guardian to sell the real estate in question, were without authority and void.

[6-9] Lastly, it is insisted that the court erred in denying appellant, J. W. Patton, remuneration for his improvements to the extent that they enhanced the value of the real estate. The mere fact that he purchased the land under void judicial proceedings cannot preclude him from the benefits of the betterment statute. Occupants of land under color of title, who make improvements thereon in good faith, believing themselves to be the owners thereof, are protected under that statute to the extent of the enhanced value of the lands by reason of their improvements. To entitle an occupant to remuneration for his improvements, the test of good faith is: Did he make them in the honest belief that he was the true proprietor and in ignorance that any other person claimed a better right to the land? Beard v. Dansby, 48 Ark. 183, 2 S. W. 701. Applying that test in this case, we think appellant, J. W. Patton, was entitled to a lien on the land for its enhanced value by reason of the improvements made by him. Practically all the improvements were after he obtained a deed to the land. All the parties connected with the transaction thought the proceedings to sell the land were legal. There is nothing from which collusion in the sale and purchase thereof can reasonably be inferred. The property sold for its full value. J. W. Patton was a young farmer, inexperienced in titles. The evidence with reference to the value of the improvements consisted largely of the cost thereof. It should have been directed to the enhanced value of the land by reason of the improvements. The cost thereof would only be a circumstance tending to establish the enhanced value of the property on account of the improvements.

For the error indicated; the decree is reversed, in so far as it denied appellant, J. W. Patton, a lien on the land for the enhanced value thereof because of the improvements he made thereon, and the cause remanded, with directions to proceed in accordance with this opinion. In all other respects, the decree is affirmed.

INTER-STATE BUSINESS MEN'S ACC. ASS'N v. SANDERSON. (No. 18.)

1. Insurance ¶665(5)—Insured held prevented from attending to business by disease.

In an action on a health policy evidence held to warrant the finding that insured was compelled by disease to refrain from performing every act of business, and was under the constant care of a physician, etc.

2. Insurance ¶525 — Insured may "remain continuously and strictly within the house" within policy, though he takes outdoor exercise.

Where a health policy provided benefits if the insured should by disease be compelled to "remain continuously and strictly within the house" under treatment of a regular physician, the fact that insured took air and exercise under direction of his physician will not preclude recovery, but insured cannot recover if the disease was one which required him to remain outside of the house rather than within it; the insurer having fixed the terms of the contract.

3. Insurance ¶668(11) — Whether insured confined to house within health policy held for jury.

In an action on a health policy, where the insured claimed the benefit prescribed for strict confinement in the house, the question whether he was so confined, it appearing that he made daily trips for medicinal waters, etc., held for the jury.

4. Trial ¶177 — Requested instruction not waived by request for peremptory instruction.

Though both parties requested peremptory instructions, yet where defendant requested another instruction, submitting the issues to the jury, it did not waive its right to such submission.

5. Trial ¶177 — Requested instruction on clauses of policy held to preserve right to submission, though peremptory instruction also requested.

In an action on a health policy where both the insured and insurer requested peremptory instructions, the insurer's requested instruction, submitting the two clauses of the policy under which the insured claimed benefits, was sufficient to preserve its right to submission of the issues to the jury; the clause being self-explanatory.

6. Evidence ¶589—Jury not required to accept uncontradicted testimony of party.

Where plaintiff was one of the principal witnesses in his own behalf, the jury are not, because of his interest, bound to accept his testimony.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Miller County; George R. Haynie, Judge.

Action by H. G. Sanderson against the Inter-State Business Men's Accident Association. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Arnold & Arnold, of Texarkana, for appellant.

M. E. Sanderson, of Texarkana, for appellee.

MCULLOCH, C. J. This is an action on a policy of insurance issued by appellant to appellee, insuring appellee "against loss of time by disease not due to accidental injury." The two clauses of the policy on which the action is founded read as follows:

"Loss by Disease.

"Section III.

"House confinement $50.00 first week and 29 succeeding weeks.

"The insurance provided shall cover only in the event that the disease shall compel the insured to remain continuously and strictly within the house for a period of or exceeding two full weeks and be under the constant treatment of a regular physician.

"Nonconfinement $15.00 first week and $20.00 for 8 weeks.

"The insurance provided shall cover only in the event the disease shall compel the insured to refrain from performing every act of business and be under the constant treatment of a regular physician."

Liability is asserted for the maximum amount ($175) allowed under the second clause, and for 25 weeks, or $1,250, under the first clause. Appellant conceded liability for the amount sought to be recovered under the second clause, and tendered the amount to appellee. On the trial of the issues before a jury the court gave a peremptory instruction in appellee's favor. The question now before us on this appeal is whether or not the testimony presented an issue which should have been submitted to the jury.

[1] The case was tried on the testimony of appellee himself and Dr. Phillips, who was appellee's physician. Appellant introduced no testimony at all. Appellee resided at Ashdown at the time he was stricken with the disease which caused the loss of time involved in this inquiry, and was engaged in farming and in the retail lumber business. He was manager of a lumber yard, and looked after the office work, as well as the outside business. He became ill in the early part of the year 1918 while the policy was in force, and on consulting Dr. Phillips it was found that he was suffering with nephritis. On March 13, 1918, the physician pronounced appellee's condition of health to be very serious, and thereafter appellant gave but little attention to business, and his condition of health continued to grow worse. The testimony tended to show that he was entirely unable to give attention to business, and that he merely went down to his place of business, from time to time, to attend to business to a very limited extent. The evidence was sufficient, we think, to justify the finding that appellee's disease was sufficient to cause him to "refrain from performing every act of business and be under the constant treatment of a regular physician," within the meaning of the second clause of the policy. However, appellant concedes liability on this branch of the case, and it is unnecessary to discuss the evidence at length so far as it tends to establish liability under that clause.

On July 5, 1918, Dr. Phillips, who had been attending appellee regularly up to that time, advised him that his condition had become so serious that he should give up all matters of business and pleasure and go to Marlin Wells, Tex., to receive the benefit of the water and climate of that place. The physician also advised appellee that the fresh air and sunshine of that climate, together with the water, would do more to build him up than anything else. At that time appellee had become very much weakened from the disease and was easily fatigued. To use the exact language of the physician, his testimony was that—

"The fresh air and sunshine to this patient were more beneficial than remaining in the house, and tended to arrest the disease from which he was suffering."

Pursuant to the physician's advice, appellee sold out his business and moved to Marlin, Tex., where he remained for a considerable time for the purpose of getting the benefit of the mineral water and the climate at that place. He was under the treatment of another physician while he was there, but his course of conduct and the progress of the disease is disclosed entirely by appellee's own testimony, as he did not introduce any other witness as to his stay at Marlin Wells.

Appellee stated in his testimony that he was confined to the house during his stay there, except that he made a daily trip to the post office to get his mail, and made trips a distance of four blocks, to the wells to get water twice a day, and that he occasionally would stop for a short time at one of the stores along the way and make a purchase. He testified that there was a large pavilion at the well, and that he would occasionally sit there for half an hour at a time, and that while at home he spent much of the time sitting out on the porch. On cross-examination of appellee it was drawn out that he had made two or three statements to appellant, and in response to the question whether or not that he had been "strictly and continuously confined within the house" he answered in the negative.

Each side asked for a peremptory instruction, and in addition to that appellant asked the court to give the following instruction:

"You are instructed that the policy sued on herein reads that plaintiff is entitled to recover only in two events:

"First. In the event the disease shall compel the insured to remain continuously and strictly within the house for a period of or exceeding two full weeks and be under the constant treatment of a regular physician, he is entitled to recover $50 for the first week and 29 succeeding weeks.

"Second. In the event the disease shall compel the insured to refrain from performing every act of business and be under the constant treatment of a regular physician, he is entitled to recover $15 for the first week and $20 per week for eight weeks, and you are instructed that the plaintiff is entitled to recover nothing herein except as provided for in said policy covering total disability, and for such time as he was only partially disabled on account of illness, he is entitled to recover nothing."

[2-4] It is contended by learned counsel for appellant in the first place that according to the undisputed evidence there can be no recovery under the first clause of the policy, for the reason that appellee's disease was not sufficient to compel him "to remain strictly and continuously within the house" within the meaning of the terms of the policy. It is argued that according to appellee's own testimony he was not continuously confined to his house by the disease, but that he left the house each day for the purpose of making trips to the well and certain other purposes. On the other hand, it is contended by appellee that according to the undisputed evidence he was confined to the house continuously within the meaning of the policy, and that the court was correct in giving a peremptory instruction. We are of the opinion that this branch of the case is ruled by the law as declared by this court in the case of Great Eastern Casualty Co. v. Robins, 111 Ark. 607, 164 S. W. 750, where we held, quoting from the syllabus, that—

"The term continuous confinement, within the meaning of an indemnity insurance policy, insuring plaintiff against sickness, does not mean that plaintiff must have been confined within the house every minute or hour, and the fact that he went out occasionally for the purpose of taking exercise and fresh air under the instructions of his physicians is not sufficient to prevent plaintiff from recovering in an action on the policy."

The court in that case had given an instruction in line with the law as declared above, and we approved that instruction, notwithstanding the fact that there was undisputed evidence to the effect that the insured, though confined to the house by disease, went out for a short time each day, under the directions of his physician, for the purpose of getting sunshine and fresh air. The language of the policy in that case was substantially the same as the language of the policy now before us, except the word "strictly" is used in this policy, but was not used in the policy in the other case. We do not think that the use of that word changes the effect of this clause of the policy. If the language of the policy in the other case was not to be literally construed so as to take the case without its operation because the insured had in fact been outside the walls of the house, we do not think the use of the word "strictly" in the policy now before us would call for a more literal application of the language used. It would be a very unreasonable construction to put on the policy, and would practically nullify the benefits paid for under the policy, to say that because a man was out of the house one time he was not insured against loss. If necessary daily trips to get water and for sunshine under the advice of a physician excluded the insured from the benefits under the policy, then it would follow that a single excursion from the house under any circumstances would have the same effect. The language should have reasonable interpretation to give the policy some effect rather than to nullify it.

On the other hand, it does not follow that if it is necessary for the insured to remain out of the house for the purpose of getting fresh air he can claim the benefits of the policy, because the insurer had the right to state the terms upon which its obligation was incurred, and they saw fit, in this instance, to insure only against such diseases as continuously confined to the house. If the disease required the insured to remain outside of the house, rather than to remain in the house, it does not come within the terms of the policy. But short trips away from the house for purposes necessary to bring beneficial results to the health of the insured does not take the case out of the operation of the language of the policy, which requires confinement to the house. Our conclusion is therefore that the testimony presented a question of fact for the determination of the jury as to whether or not appellee's disease and his state of health at the time required continuous confinement to the house, within the meaning of the policy, notwithstanding his short trips out for water and sunshine, and this issue should have been submitted to the jury. Both sides asked for a peremptory instruction, but appellant did not waive its right to insist on a submission of the issues to the jury, as it asked another instruction submitting the issues. St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Mulkey, 100 Ark. 71, 139 S. W. 643, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1339; Simms v. Everett, 113 Ark. 198, 168 S. W. 559, L. R. A. 1918C, 7, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 629; Supreme Tribe of Ben Hur v. Galley, 117 Ark. 145, 173 S. W. 838; St. L. I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Ingram, 118 Ark. 377, 176 S. W. 692.

[5] It is said by counsel for appellee that the additional instruction asked by appellant was not correct, and that therefore the case stood as if appellant had only asked for the peremptory instruction so as to bring it in the operation of the rule in Mulkey v. Railway, supra.

Instruction No. 2, requested by appellant, was a substantial copy of the two clauses of the policy, which were self-explanatory. The effect of the instruction, if given, would have been to submit to the jury the question of fact as to whether or not appellant's contention fell within the clause of the policy.

[6] It cannot be said that the testimony was undisputed, as there was no other testimony adduced in support of appellee's right of action under the first clause of the policy, and, appellee being an interested witness, the jury was not bound to accept his testimony. Skilern v. Baker, 82 Ark. 80, 100 S. W. 764, 118 Am. St. Rep. 52, 12 Ann. Cas. 243; Lilly v. Robinson Merc. Co., 106 Ark. 571, 153 S. W. 820; Harris v. Bush, Receiver, 129 Ark. 369, 196 S. W. 471. Besides, under appellee's own testimony, it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not the disease was sufficient to compel his continuous confinement to the house. If the jury accepted his testimony as true, different inferences might have been drawn from it with respect to the effect of the disease in confining him to the house, except as to necessary trips for the benefit of the water and sunshine.

For the error of the court in withdrawing the case from the jury by a peremptory instruction, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CITY OF DERMOTT et al. v. STINSON.
(No. 7.)

Rehearing Denied June 14, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §33 — Evidence held to show city must have known abutting owners were claiming common.

In property owner's suit to enjoin city's interference with a claimed common, evidence held to show that, so far as city was concerned, it did not recognize that abutting owners had any title to the common, but also that title was in dispute, showing city authorities must have known circumstances, and that abutting lot owners, plaintiff among them, were holding and claiming to own the property, and yet took no steps to oust them.

2. Adverse possession §31—Holding of common by abutting owners sufficient to give city notice of claims.

Where a common, on which certain lots abutted, was claimed by each abutting owner, and fenced so that lots extended across common to a street, character of inclosures and holdings was such as to give notice to members of city council that owners of abutting lots were claiming common adversely.

3. Adverse possession §50 — Contract between lot owner claiming part of common and city held a recognition of lot owner's rights.

So-called contract, executed by a lot owner abutting on a common and claiming to own part thereof, and by the city, concerning the building of sidewalks along the street on which the common abutted, held not a recognition by lot owner of title in city to land comprising common, being rather a recognition by city that lot owner was owner of his part of common, having right to possession.

4. Adverse possession §7(2)—Possession of common for statutory period gave title.

Where a lot owner occupied part of an abutting common from 1883 to 1918, when he was given notice by the city to remove his fence, holding adversely, openly, and continuously, he acquired title by such adverse possession for statutory period of 35 years.

5. Adverse possession §109—Lot owner with title to common by adverse possession held not estopped to assert it.

Lot owner abutting on common who acquired title to a portion thereof by 35 years' adverse possession held not estopped by accepting from the city an amount expended in the construction of a sidewalk along the street on which the common abutted, and by surrendering the contract concerning the sidewalk, from asserting title to his part of the common.

Appeal from Chicot Chancery Court; N. B. Scott, Special Chancellor.

Suit by H. O. Stinson against the City of Dermott and others. From decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. Dudley Crenshaw, of Dermott, for appellants.

Streett & Burnside, of Lake Village, for appellee.

WOOD, J. The city of Dermott, through its council, passed a resolution to open a certain common within the city limits.

The appellee instituted this action against the appellants to enjoin the opening of the common. He alleged that he is the owner of lots 3 and 4 of the original hamlet of Dermott, as platted by S. A. Duke, March 30, 1882, which plat was duly recorded in Chicot county. He alleged that he occupied these lots with an additional strip contiguous thereto, as his homestead, and that he and his predecessors in title had been in the continuous, open, and adverse possession of same for more than 35 years, claiming to own same. He alleged that the strip of land which adjoined his lots is a part of what was designated in the plat filed by Duke as a "common"; that about the year 1883 by common consent of the owners of the lots adjoining upon said common, the same was inclosed by the respective owners, thus extending their holdings the width of each of their said lots west to the public road, which afterwards was incorporated and became a part of the Main street of the city of Dermott; that until July 8, 1918, no legal steps had ever been taken to question the appellee's title or right to possession of said tract. But on the above date the city of Dermott caused notice to be served upon the appellee to vacate the property and that appellants are now threatening to enter upon and tear down the fence and commit other acts of waste and trespass to the irreparable damage of the appellee. Appellee prayed that the appellants be enjoined and that his title to the tract of land be quieted.

The appellants answered and denied the allegations of the appellee's complaint and pleaded that the appellee was estopped by an instrument which he and S. A. Duke, the original owner and dedicator of the lands then constituting the hamlet, now the city of Dermott, and others signed on March 30, 1882, and which was duly recorded on March 13, 1883. In that instrument it was recited, among other things, that the original plat filed by Duke was a correct plat of the hamlet of Dermott; that the streets, alleys, and commons as designated on that plat shall forever be common property for the use and benefit of the owners of property in Dermott and the public generally; that the streets, alleys, and commons should never be occupied or used for any other purpose except by the unanimous consent of every owner of real estate in the hamlet.

The appellee testified that he is the owner of lots 3 and 4 in block 4 of the original hamlet of Dermott abutting on the strip of land in controversy; that he had been in the possession of these lots since March 25, 1882, at which time he purchased the same from S. A. Duke and obtained a warranty deed, which he introduced; that he had been in possession of the strip of land in controversy immediately west of his lots and between them and Main street of the city of Dermott since his acquisition of title to the lots mentioned; that he and other parties joined with Duke, the original owner of the lots, in the deed and plat of original dedication to the hamlet of Dermott; that the fence at that date was where it is now; that, a short time after this instrument was signed by him and others, the signers thereof agreed to abrogate the deed of dedication and continue their fences out to the boundary of the public road as it then existed; that at the time of dedication and continuously thereafter the strip of land in controversy has remained inclosed; that the strip of property has been inclosed and held as a part of his property ever since that date; that no attempt had been made by the city to oust him from the possession of the strip in controversy until the summer of 1918; that he used the front of his place, the strip in controversy, for a pasture; that January 10, 1910, he accepted a so-called "contract" from the town of Dermott, which is as follows:

"This contract, made and entered into by and between the incorporated town of Dermott and H. C. Stinson, witnesseth:

"Whereas, the said H. C. Stinson has caused to be constructed along the west boundary line of that part of the common lying in front and west of lots 3 and 4 in block 4 in the original town of Dermott, owned by him, concrete sidewalk and has paid for the same;

"The said town of Dermott hereby agrees to and with the said H. C. Stinson that in the event the said H. C. Stinson should ever be divested of that part of the said common lying west of said lot by any act or consent of said town, then in that event it will repay to said H. C. Stinson any and all sums of money expended in the construction of sidewalk, without interest.

"And the said H. C. Stinson hereby agrees on his part that he will maintain said sidewalk and a reasonably good looking fence along said western boundary of said common where same is situated in front or west of his lots 3 and 4 in block 4."

Appellee testified with reference to this contract that, when he signed the agreement about the sidewalk, he did not recognize the town's right to the property; that he knew the town claimed it and he claimed it; that he took the money back as a condition of his surrender of the contract; that he thought as long as the town had used his money six or seven years he might use the money himself; that he received notice from the town to move his fence back, but did not remember whether it was before or after he accepted the money; that he did not move the fence when he accepted the money or when he received notice to move same; that he got out the injunction because he did not intend to give it up; that the north end of the common is occupied by a brick building, and so far as he can tell is standing where the original building stood in 1882 and 1883; that no portion of the common has been open to the public since 1883, and the city has not since that time until the matter of the sidewalks came up in 1910 sought to eject any of the owners from the strip of land dedicated as the common.

R. A. Buckner testified that he came to Dermott in 1884, and that at that time the common was occupied out to the street and he knew nothing of its existence for several years; that the appellee and other owners of lots abutting the strip in controversy were then and have since been in possession of same; that it was inclosed and had been occupied since 1884; that appellee claimed the common as his property; that he had never heard the title or right to possession of the common called in question until five or six years ago, when witness was employed as town attorney; at that time some of the council wished to take it, others did not; at that time appellee claimed the common abutting his lots as his own, and witness believed other property owners did likewise; that at the time the question of building the sidewalks was up before the council appellee claimed the property and talked to witness about making defense if the city ever attempted to assert title to the property. Different individuals, among them members of the city council, had talked about whether they ought to take possession of the common or not, but there was never any action taken by the council.

Other witnesses testified substantially corroborating the testimony of the above witnesses. One of the witnesses stated that so far as he knew no owner of property in that plat had ever recognized the right of the public in that land; that he had known the property since 1900; that when the town required the property owners, along the strip in controversy, to put down sidewalks, there was a question raised at the time as to the right of the town to require that sidewalks be put down. Witness asked whether if the property owners should put it down themselves if they could put it back on the line. The city authorities assured witness that there was no danger of the property owners losing their property, but for their protection the city would give them a 99-year lease. The town did not claim the title to the land when it offered them the 99-year lease. Witness only wanted it to settle any dispute that there might be as to the title.

Witness J. T. Crenshaw testified for the appellants that he had been a resident of Dermott since 1881; that he had been connected with the city government at various times as alderman, mayor, and recorder, since it was incorporated. The strip in controversy was dedicated to the hamlet of Dermott by Maj. Duke, who wanted to put out trees on it. Dermott was a small place then, and no one took any interest in it. While witness was a member of the council and had charge of the city business, "the common was recognized as belonging to the town, but the people along there recognized it as belonging to them." There were two opinions about it.

Witness did not know that the property owners claimed the common as their own. The people there had fenced it and lived there and were using it. The common was always recognized as city property. Witness could not say whether the owners of the lots abutting the common ever recognized it as city property or not. They recognized it as their own property and had it fenced in. There had always been a dispute about it. The city took active steps last year towards the assertion of its rights when they made one Belser move his house up when they found it to be on the parkway. Witness could think of no other assertion of right by the city.

Other witnesses, some of them owners of lots abutting the common, testified that they did not claim the common and that in conversation with other abutting owners the right of the city to the common was recognized.

Witness Rayborn had lived in Dermott since 1880, during which time he had held all of the offices of the city except treasurer. During his administration there were so many discussions concerning the common that he could not name any certain time only when the sidewalk was built; that while he was in office the town authorities were never notified that any of the owners of property abutting the common claimed the property in front of their lots as their own, but they all recognized that the town owned it; that he was mayor a long time, the last time in 1913; that in 1918 the appellee said to witness:

"This is where Delaney run the line between our property and the city property. He run it a little too close to my house, a little over the line, because the line is where the cedar trees are in front of where Petticord used to live, because Petticord set those cedar trees on the line."

Witness further testified that the abutting owners all had good fences on their lines and did not present claim to any of the city property until after the death of Duke; that while witness was connected with the council there was no action taken by the city to open the common, "because there was an agreement for the people to move when they were dissatisfied and wanted the common opened."

W. D. Trotter testified that he had lived in the community since 1874; that the common since the city was incorporated had been generally regarded as public property; that he had never heard of a controversy about the property until the one came up with Belser; that that part of the common had been inclosed all the time witness had resided in Dermott.

The above are substantially the facts upon which the trial court found that the appellee had been in open, continuous, and adverse possession for more than 35 years of the strip of land designated as the common; that appellee was not estopped from setting up title by limitation; and that he had acquired title to the property.

The court thereupon entered a decree perpetually enjoining the appellants from interfering with the appellee's possession. From that decree is this appeal.

The undisputed testimony shows that in 1882 S. A. Duke, the original owner of the land in controversy, owned a farm in Chicot county, Ark.; that he platted a part of the same into blocks and lots with streets and alleys and a strip of land designated as the public common, of which the land in controversy is a part; that he designated the lands thus platted as the hamlet of Dermott; that on March 25, 1882, he sold lots 3 and 4, block 4, of the hamlet of Dermott to the appellee. Of the lands thus platted he had sold other lots to A. E. Petticord and O. P. Freeman. On March 30, 1882, all of the then property owners of the lands which had been platted by Duke as the hamlet of Dermott signed the instrument set out in the statement, dedicating the streets, alleys, and common to the public of the hamlet of Dermott. That instrument recites that the common thus donated by Duke should never be "occupied, inclosed, or used for any other purpose except by the unanimous consent of every owner of real estate in the said hamlet."

The appellee testified that, a very short time after the plat was made and the instrument above mentioned was signed by him, the then owners of the property agreed among themselves to abrogate that contract and continue their fences out to the boundary of the public road as it then existed. He states that the parties interested at that time agreed to take what was designated as the common into their lots and hold them as a part of their property. All the other original signers of the instrument are dead. This testimony of the appellee is undisputed.

The testimony of the appellee is positive to the effect that there had never been a time since he took possession of the strip of land that it had not been inclosed and held by him as a part of his property. The evidence is undisputed that the possession of the strip known as the common was taken and held by the owners of the abutting lots, and a preponderance of the evidence shows that these abutting property owners were holding the common adversely to the city of Dermott. All except one of the owners of lots abutting the strip designated as the common testified corroborating the testimony of the appellee that they went into the possession and were holding as their own, and adversely to the city, the part of the strip abutting their lots, and the width of each lot to the public road which is now Main street of the city of Dermott.

The testimony of the appellee that the strip designated as the common was held adversely by the abutting lot owners is corroborated by witnesses who, it occurs to us, were in the best situation to know the facts and who gave the most direct and specific testimony concerning the adverse claim. For instance, J. T. Orenshaw, one of the oldest residents of the town and who had been officially connected with the city government ever since it became an incorporated town, testified that—

"The common was recognized as belonging to the town, but the people along there recognized it as belonging to them."

His testimony thus shows that, so far as the city was concerned, it claimed the property as its own, but, so far as the property owners were concerned, they were claiming it as their own property.

Likewise, the testimony of Rayborn, who was an old resident and had held all the offices of the city except treasurer, shows that there had been discussions concerning the common in the city council so many times during his administration that he could not name any certain time.

[1] The testimony of these witnesses proves clearly that so far as the city was concerned it did not recognize that the abutting property owners had any title to the common, but it also as clearly shows that the matter was in dispute. It clearly shows that the city fathers must have known the circumstances and have known that the abutting lot owners were holding and claiming to own the property, and yet took no steps to oust them from possession and to open the common to the public until notice was served upon them in 1918 to remove their fences.

[2] The testimony shows that the so-called "common" was not inclosed by the property owners by one common fence, but that each had the part claimed by him in a separate inclosure extending his lot its entire width to Main street of the city of Dermott. The character of these inclosures and holdings was such as to give notice to the members of the city council that the owners of abutting lots were claiming the strip designated as the common adversely.

tween the appellee and the city, designated as a "contract," concerning the building of sidewalks, is not, as we construe it, a recognition by the appellee of title in the city of Dermott to the land in controversy. On the contrary, this instrument appears to us to be rather a recognition by the city of Dermott that the appellee was the owner and had a right to the possession of the property.

[4] We conclude therefore that appellee's occupancy of the land from 1883 to 1918, when he was given notice to remove his fence, was of such a character as to be entirely inconsistent with the idea of mere permissible possession by the city of Dermott. A preponderance of the evidence, on the contrary, shows that it was adverse, open, and continuous for the statutory period, and that he therefore acquired title by adverse possession. Gee v. Hatley, 114 Ark. 384, 170 S. W. 72. The trial court was correct in so holding.

[5] We are also convinced that, after having acquired such title, appellee was not estopped by accepting from the city of Dermott the amount that had been expended in the construction of the sidewalk and surrendering the contract concerning same. If we are correct in our view that appellee had acquired title by adverse possession, then appellee's contract with Dermott concerning the sidewalk would not operate to divest him of the title and invest title in the city. Such was not the purport, nor the effect, of that "contract." Hudson v. Stillwell, 80 Ark. 575-578, 98 S. W. 856. See, also, Broad v. Beatty, 78 Ark. 110, 83 S. W. 389; Shirey v. Whitlow, 80 Ark. 444, 97 S. W. 444; Turquett v. McMurray, 110 Ark. 197, 161 S. W. 175; Hutt v. Smith, 118 Ark. 10, 175 S. W. 399.

The decree is correct.

Affirmed.

SPIVEY et al., School Directors, v. TAYLOR,
County Treasurer. (No. 24.)

1. Judgment \S 299(1), 342(1)—Courts lose control over judgment after lapse of term.

Courts of record lose control over their judgments after the lapse of the term, and, in the absence of a statute conferring such power, cannot at a subsequent term alter or vacate them.

2. Courts \S 185—Where objections to report of county treasurer, confirmed by judgment, were not disposed of during term, action was final, and objectors could appeal.

Where county court, on objections to county treasurer's report, did not set aside a judgment confirming the treasurer's accounts, but continued the cause until another day of the same term for further testimony, and the term lapsed without the petition having been heard, it was error for the circuit court to dismiss an appeal by the objectors; the judgment of the county court having become final at the close of the term.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Francis County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Objections by W. A. Spivey and others, as School Directors of a common school district, to the report of George P. Taylor, as County Treasurer. From a judgment of the circuit court dismissing their appeal from a judgment confirming the report, the School Directors appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The report of Geo. P. Taylor, as county treasurer, was approved by the county court, and at the same term W. A. Spivey and others, as school directors of a common school district in St. Francis county, filed objections to his report on the ground that it failed to show an amount of money which he had received belonging to said school district. The treasurer filed a reply, denying the allegations of the petition. The court continued the cause until another day of the same term for further testimony. The term lapsed without the petition having been heard, and without the order confirming the treasurer's settlement having been set aside. Spivey and the other school directors filed an affidavit for appeal to the circuit court within the six months prescribed by the statute. The county treasurer made a motion in the circuit court to dismiss the appeal, which motion was by the court granted. From the judgment rendered in the circuit court, Spivey and the other directors have duly prosecuted an appeal to this court.

J. W. Morrow and Henry G. Gatling, both of Forrest City, for appellants.

Mann, Bussey & Mann, of Forrest City, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). The court erred in dismissing the appeal. The county court allowed Spivey and the other directors of the common school district to file objections to the report of the county treasurer on the ground that he had failed to account in his report for certain money belonging to the school district. This was done at the same term at which the report had been filed and approved. Without opening the judgment confirming the report, the court continued the cause to a subsequent day of the same term for further testimony. The term lapsed without any further action having been taken by the county court. Spivey and the other school directors filed an affidavit for appeal to the circuit court within the time prescribed by the statute. The circuit court should have heard and determined their appeal.

[1] In Brandenburg et al. v. State, 24 Ark. 50, the court held that the county court acts judicially in adjusting the accounts of an internal improvement commissioner, and has no power to set aside its judgment after the lapse of the term. In Desha County v. Newman, 33 Ark. 788, it was held that as a general rule county courts, like circuit courts, have no power to set aside, vacate, or modify their judgment after the close of the term at which they are rendered, unless provision is made therefor by statute. The general rule is that courts of record lose control over their judgments after the lapse of the term, and in the absence of a statute conferring such power cannot, at a subsequent term, alter or vacate them. Malpas v. Lowenstine, 46 Ark. 552; Brady v. Hamlett, 33 Ark. 105; Kersh v. Lincoln County, 36 Ark. 589; Joyner v. Hall, 36 Ark. 513; Johnson v. Campbell, 52 Ark. 816, 12 S. W. 578; Terry v. Logue, 97 Ark. 314, 133 S. W. 1135; Corning v. Thompson, 113 Ark. 237, 168 S. W. 128.

[2] In the present case the county court did not set aside the judgment confirming the treasurer's accounts, and its judgment became final at the close of the term. Therefore Spivey and the other directors had the right to appeal from the judgment. If the court had desired to continue the cause until a subsequent term, without the judgment becoming final, the judgment should have been set aside, so as to keep the cause within the control of the court. This view of the law was recognized in Haley v. Thompson, 116 Ark. 354, 172 S. W. 880. There the proceedings were had under section 7174 of Kirby's Digest, providing, in substance, that, when any error shall be discovered in the settlement of any county officer with the county court, it shall be the duty of the court at any time within two years from the date of such settlement to reconsider and adjust the same. The court held that relief under this statute did not prevent the taxpayer from being made a party to the settlement of the county officer and having his settlement corrected upon appeal to the circuit court.

It follows that the court erred in dismissing the appeal of Spivey and the other school directors, and for that error the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

MONETTE ROAD IMPROVEMENT DIST.
v. DUDLEY, Circuit Judge. (No. 3.)(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 24, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 14, 1920.)1. Prohibition ¶10(1)—Lies to restrain proceedings without jurisdiction.

Where it appears that an inferior court is about to proceed in a matter over which it is entirely without jurisdiction under any state of facts which may be shown to exist, then the superior court, exercising supervisory control over the inferior court, may prevent such unauthorized proceedings by the issuance of a writ of prohibition.

2. Prohibition ¶3(5)—Lies where remedy by appeal is available, but inadequate.

Issuance of a writ of prohibition depends not on the absence, but upon the inadequacy, of the remedy by appeal.

3. Prohibition ¶17—Requirement that objection to jurisdiction be made to lower court is rule of discretion.

Objection in the lower court to its exercise of jurisdiction is not a jurisdictional fact upon which the power to issue the writ of prohibition depends, but is merely a rule of discretion, so that where obviously such objection would be futile, and would result in unnecessary or hurtful delay, it is not necessary.

4. Highways ¶121—Functions of officers as to assessments not judicial.

Under Road Laws 1919, vol. 1, p. 105, creating the Monette Road Improvement District, as amended at January, 1920, special session, the functions of the board of assessors in assessing benefits, and of the board of commissioners in adjusting them, on the complaint of the property owners, is not judicial in the ordinary sense, but is in the nature of a legislative power.

5. Certiorari ¶1—Limited to review of judicial or quasi judicial proceedings.

Certiorari is limited to review of judicial or quasi judicial proceedings.

6. Courts ¶52—Injunctive jurisdiction of circuit courts lost by establishment of chancery courts.

Under Const. art. 7, § 15, providing that "until the General Assembly shall . . . establish courts of chancery the circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in matters of equity," exercise of the power of the Legislature in establishing separate chancery courts swept away the circuit courts' jurisdiction in matters exclusively cognizable in courts of equity, which included jurisdiction to award injunctive relief; Kirby's Dig. § 3966, authorizing injunctive relief by the circuit court against illegal taxes and assessments being thereby superseded.

7. Highways ¶142—Certiorari does not lie to review assessments.

Since Road Laws 1919, vol. 1, p. 105, creating the Monette Road Improvement District, as amended at the January, 1920, special session, provides for no review of assessments by the circuit court on appeal, but, on the contrary, provides exclusively for relief in the chancery court, there is no authority for review by the circuit court on certiorari.

Wood and Hart, JJ., dissenting in part.

Application by Monette Road Improvement District for writ of prohibition directed to the Honorable R. H. Dudley, circuit judge. Writ awarded.

Sloan & Sloan, of Jonesboro, Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, of Little Rock, and A. P. Patton, of Jonesboro, for appellant.

J. F. Gautney and Lamb & Frierson, all of Jonesboro, for appellee.

MCULLOCH, C. J. Monette Road Improvement District is, as its name implies, a road improvement district formed for the purpose of improving certain roads, and was created by a special statute enacted by the General Assembly of 1919 (Act No. 68, Acts 1919, Regular Session, vol. 1, p. 105).

Application is made to this court on behalf of said district for a writ of prohibition directed to the Honorable R. H. Dudley as judge of the Second division of the circuit court of the Second judicial circuit to prevent the circuit court of Craighead county, Lake City district, from hearing and determining a certain proceeding brought up to that court on certiorari issued by said judge, and returnable to said circuit court, involving the validity of the acts of the commissioners of said district in assessing certain benefits and in attempting to construct the improvement.

It is alleged in the petition filed here that Alex McDonald and certain other persons filed their complaint in said circuit court, praying for a writ of certiorari directed to the commissioners of said district to bring up the assessment of benefits made by the commissioners and to quash the same, and to enjoin the commissioners of the district from proceeding with the construction; that the circuit court is entirely without jurisdiction in the premises, and that the petitioners appeared in court and moved to dismiss the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, but that the court overruled said motion, and proceeded to issue a writ of certiorari as prayed for by the plaintiffs in that cause, and made it returnable at the next term of that court, and that the judge also issued a restraining order to prevent the petitioner and the commissioners of the district from proceeding with the work of improvement. A copy of the complaint in the proceedings below and the other pleadings are exhibited with the petition.

The circuit judge appears here by counsel, and files a response in which he admits that he has issued the writ of certiorari, as alleged, returnable to the circuit court, but denies that the writ was heard or issued by the court, or that the petitioner herein had appeared before the court for the purpose of objecting to the issuance and hearing of the writ, and alleges, on the contrary, that the petition for a writ of certiorari was presented to the circuit judge at chambers in vacation, and was heard by him, and that the writ of certiorari, and also the temporary injunction, were issued by him in vacation, returnable to the circuit court to be heard by that court in term time. The judge also alleges in his response that the matters and things set forth in the complaint in the proceedings below are within the jurisdiction of the circuit court, and he denies that he exceeded his jurisdiction in granting the certiorari and injunction.

[1] The first question which arises for our decision is whether or not prohibition is the appropriate remedy and is available to the petitioner under the circumstances of this case. The facts, when reduced to the simplest form, as bearing on this particular question, are that the plaintiffs in the action instituted in the circuit court appeared before the circuit judge in vacation for the purpose of procuring the issuance of a writ of certiorari to bring up the proceedings of the board of commissioners of the improvement district, and to obtain an injunction to restrain further proceedings by the commissioners of the district, until the cause could be heard in the circuit court; that the commissioners, as the representatives of the district, appeared by counsel before the circuit judge at the hearing, and objected to the exercise of jurisdiction by the court; and that a writ of certiorari, and also of temporary injunction, was issued by the judge over the protest of the petitioner.

The scope of the writ of prohibition is too well known to be in doubt. In the recent case of Ferguson v. Martineau, Chancellor, 115 Ark. 317, 171 S. W. 472, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 421, this court quoted with approval the following statement of the law from a well-known text-writer on the subject:

"The writ of prohibition is that process by which a superior court prevents an inferior court or tribunal from usurping or exercising jurisdiction with which it has not been vested by law." Spelling on Injunctions and Extraordinary Remedies, § 1716; Shortt on Informations, Mandamus and Prohibition, p. 436.

The last-named text-writer, at the place indicated, laid down the rule as follows:

"The broad governing principle is that a prohibition lies where a subordinate tribunal has no jurisdiction at all to deal with the cause or matter before it; or where, in the progress of a cause within its jurisdiction, some point arises for decision which the inferior court is incompetent to determine. But a prohibition will not lie where the inferior court has jurisdiction to deal with the cause and with all matters necessarily arising therein, however erroneous its decision may be upon any point."

In the case of Finley v. Moose, 74 Ark. 217, 85 S. W. 238, 109 Am. St. Rep. 74, we stated the same rule with reference to the office of the writ of prohibition, with the following qualification:

"If the existence or nonexistence of jurisdiction depends on contested facts which the inferior tribunal is competent to inquire into and determine, a prohibition will not be granted; though the superior court may be of opinion that the questions of fact have been wrongly determined by the court below, and that their correct determination would have ousted the jurisdiction."

So it is thus settled that where it appears that an inferior court is about to proceed in a matter over which it is entirely without jurisdiction under any state of facts which may be shown to exist, then the superior court exercising supervisory control over the inferior court may prevent such unauthorized proceedings by the issuance of a writ of prohibition. The essential thing is that it must be shown that the inferior court is about to proceed beyond its jurisdiction, and that fact is said to be the jurisdictional one upon which the right of the supervisory court to issue the writ of prohibition depends.

[2] It is contended by counsel for the respondent that the remedy by prohibition not being an absolute one, but discretionary, the writ should be denied where there is a remedy by appeal or otherwise, even though the court sought to be restrained was about to proceed beyond its jurisdiction. They cite in support of their contention the case of Weaver v. Leatherman, 66 Ark. 211, 49 S. W. 977. This contention is based upon a misconception of the effect of the ruling in the case just cited. If the absence of the right of appeal was essential to the issuance of a writ of prohibition, then that remedy would be entirely unavailable in any case; for, under our Constitution, the right of appeal is granted in all judicial proceedings. The true test is, as stated in the case already cited, whether or not the court is proceeding beyond its jurisdiction, and when that state of facts is shown to exist the remedy by prohibition is the appropriate one. A litigant is not bound to submit to the exercise of jurisdiction not authorized by law, even though he has the right of appeal after the exercise of the jurisdiction has been consummated and has resulted in a judgment from which he can appeal. The remedy by appeal is afforded from an unjust judgment, whether it be void or merely erroneous (Pritchett v. Road Improvement District, 219 S. W. 21); but the remedy by prohibition is afforded as a protection against a wrongful attempt to exercise jurisdiction unauthorized by law. The two remedies are independent, and one may be invoked where the other cannot be, and prohibition may be invoked under circumstances where the remedy by appeal is available though inadequate.

Again, it is urged by counsel for respondent that this is an attempt to control the action of the circuit judge, and they invoke the doctrine that the remedy by prohibition is available only to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by a court and not by a judge. In the case of Reese v. Steel, 73 Ark. 66, 83 S. W. 335, 1136, we expressly left undecided the question whether or not prohibition was the appropriate remedy against judicial or quasi judicial action of a judge in vacation, and whether or not the remedy was confined to the control of judicial action by a court. Nor is that question involved in the present case. The action of the circuit judge has in the present case completely accomplished its purpose in the issuance of the writ, and the present effort of the petitioner is to control the action of the circuit court, and to prevent it from proceeding in a matter alleged to be entirely beyond its jurisdiction. It is true that in the petition filed here it is alleged that the court issued the writ and is about to hear and determine it, and that the court also issued an injunction, and it is shown by the respondent that this allegation is not true with respect to the issuance of the two writs; but the facts, as shown by the petition and the response thereto, are that the writ of certiorari is returnable to the circuit court, and that that court is about to proceed to an adjudication of the matters and things involved in that controversy. Now this entitles the petitioner to the remedy prayed for here, unless other grounds appear for the denial of the remedy.

[3] The response raises the question of the right of the petitioner to this remedy without first appearing before the circuit court and objecting to the exercise of jurisdiction. It is conceded that the petitioner appeared before the circuit judge and made objection to the exercise of jurisdiction and that the judge overruled the objection. It appears from the exhibits to the pleadings here that the circuit judge made a written order expressing his opinion that the circuit court had jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings, and in his response here the learned judge adheres to his conclusion that the circuit court has jurisdiction of the cause. But it is insisted that the petitioner must first appear before the court itself and make the protest there in term time, notwithstanding the ineffectual protest before the judge who granted the writ and who is the presiding judge of that court. This court in many decisions has adhered to the rule that as a matter of practice a writ of prohibition will not be issued, unless objection to the exercise of jurisdiction is made to the court in which the proceedings are pending. Reese v. Steel, supra.

The court has never had occasion to state the exceptions to that rule, or to declare whether or not there are in fact any exceptions. It has been decided here, however, that the form of the exception is immaterial, and that any sort of plea to the jurisdiction of the court will justify the issuance of a writ of prohibition. State ex rel. Butler v. Williams, 48 Ark. 227, 2 S. W. 843.

In Ruling Case Law, vol. 27, the following is stated to be the rule of procedure established by the authorities:

"As a general rule, a writ of prohibition will not be issued to an inferior court unless the attention of the court whose proceedings it is sought to arrest has been called to the alleged lack of jurisdiction, the foundation of the rule being the respect and consideration due to the lower court and the expediency of preventing unnecessary litigation. This requirement is made by rule of court in some jurisdictions. The objection in the lower court cannot be said to be jurisdictional, and the higher court may and will proceed without such objection in proper cases. The rule is one of discretion only, and is not in any sense rigid or arbitrary. Thus no objection in the court sought to be prohibited need be made where the proceeding is ex parte and there was no opportunity to object; where the applicant was prevented by artifice or fraud from making objection; where the lack of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of the proceedings; where the intention of the inferior court to act beyond its jurisdiction is made apparent in any way, and it is obvious from the whole proceedings that such an application would be futile; or where the necessary delay would be highly injurious to the interests of the applicant. The matter of judicial courtesy should yield to substantial personal rights of litigants, such as a sacrifice to their liberty."

Numerous authorities are cited in support of the rules thus stated.

Particular attention is called to that part of the foregoing statement of the law to the effect that the objection to the exercise of jurisdiction by the lower court is not a jurisdictional fact upon which the power to issue a writ of prohibition depends, but is merely a rule of discretion. This, we think, is the correct view of the matter; and it will necessarily follow, under this rule, that where it is obvious that an objection made to the court itself would be futile, and would result in unnecessary or hurtful delay, this ought to and does form an exception to the general rule of discretion that, before a writ of prohibition can be asked for, objection to the exercise of that jurisdiction must be made to the court. This exception is well sustained by the authorities. See case note to St. Marys v. Woods, 21 Ann. Cas. 168; City of Charleston v. Littlepage, 73 W. Va. 156, 80 S. E. 131, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 353; State ex rel. v. Aloe, 152 Mo. 466, 54 S. W. 493, 47 L. R. A. 393; State ex rel. v. Bright, 224 Mo. 514, 123 S. W. 1057, 135 Am. St. Rep. 552, 20 Ann. Cas. 955; Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192.

In the case of State ex rel. v. Bright, supra, the Supreme Court of Missouri, after having noticed the fact that it was not shown that any exceptions had been made to the lower court, said that the appearance of the judge in that court, joining with the parties to the litigation in affirming the right of the court to proceed with the case, that this rendered it unnecessary for the petitioner to appear before the court for the purpose of challenging the jurisdiction. This rule was, in effect, applied by our court in the case of Russell v. Jacoway, 83 Ark. 191. In that case an election contest over the removal of the county seat was involved, and the circuit judge granted in vacation a writ of certiorari to bring up the proceedings in the county court for review, and the adverse parties appeared before the circuit judge and opposed the application for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It was not shown that there was any objection made in the circuit court, but this court granted the writ of prohibition and vacated the writ issued by the circuit judge. We think that this rule is founded on sound reason, for it only affects the discretion of the court, and is, at most, only a rule of practice. Why then should the petitioner be required to go before the circuit court to make an objection to the exercise of jurisdiction where it is morally certain that the objection would be unavailing? Since the circuit judge has deliberately overruled an objection to the jurisdiction, and comes into this court now maintaining that the court over which he presides and before which this cause will come on for hearing, unless restrained, has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, there is no ground for assuming that he will change his mind and sustain the objection to the jurisdiction when the circuit court convenes. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the petitioners are entitled to a writ of prohibition if, as a matter of fact, the circuit court is about to proceed beyond its jurisdiction, and that is the next question to which we will address ourselves.

The statute creating the district contains a provision in section 14 that the "construction cost of the improvements of the road herein called for, not including interest on borrowed money, shall not exceed in cost thirty per cent. of the values of all lands and real estate and real property in the district, as shown by the last county assessment"; and the question was brought to this court for decision whether or not this applied to the last county assessment preceding the passage of the statute, or to any county assessment made prior to the assessment of benefits, and we decided that it applied to the assessment preceding the passage of the statute. Watson v. Boydston, 216 S. W. 721. It was shown in that case that the cost of the construction would exceed 30 per cent. of the values of lands according to the county assessment, and the General Assembly at the special session in January, 1920, enacted an amendatory statute raising the limitation to 40 per cent. of the assessed value of the property, instead of 30 per cent., and amending the statute creating the district in other respects. The statute, as a whole, describes the boundaries of the district, the route of the roads to be improved, names the commissioners and the authority to construct the improvement, to borrow money and collect assessments on the benefits accruing to the lands, and provides for a board of assessors to value the anticipated benefits, and the filing of the list of assessments with the county clerk, and the publication of notice of the time and place of the meeting of the commissioners for the purpose of hearing complaints against said assessments.

Section 13 provides that—

"any party who may have complained in writing of any of said assessment of benefits or damages, and who feels aggrieved by the action of the commissioners after the hearing herein provided for; any other person whomsoever who may have any objections to any assessment of benefits or damages, or to any other proceedings under this act or action of the commissioners, shall file his complaint thereof in the chancery court having jurisdiction within ten days after the hearing by the commissioners herein provided for, and any party not complaining within that time shall be deemed to have waived any objections that he may have to any of said assessment of benefits or damages, and shall not be heard to complain in law or equity thereafter."

The complaint in the proceedings sought to be prohibited alleges, in substance, that the assessment of benefits had been made and filed with the county clerk, and notice thereof given, and that all of the plaintiffs in that proceeding had appeared before the board of commissioners herein named, and objected to the alleged assessments on the ground that no valid assessment had been made as provided by the statute; that the assessment list was "a mere jumble of words and figures and to a great extent meaningless," and that it is unintelligible. It is further alleged that the plans adopted by the commissioners contemplate two sets of improvements, one a drainage system and the other the construction of the roads, which would require two separate assessments. Various other matters are alleged in the way of threatened proceedings by the board of commissioners not authorized by the statute. The prayer of the complaint was that the plans adopted by the commissioners and the assessment list be brought to the circuit court on certiorari, and that on final hearing the same should be quashed. The prayer of the complaint was also that the contract for the construction of the improvement and the sale of bonds be enjoined.

It is manifest, therefore, from the language of the complaint that injunctive relief is sought against the proceedings undertaken by the commissioners of the district, and relief against the assessment list alleged to be inaccurate and unintelligible is sought. The injunction granted by the judge in vacation was temporary, and appears to have been intended only as an incident to the relief sought in the complaint to preserve the status quo until the cause could be finally heard. If the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause on the facts stated and grant the relief sought, it could temporarily stay proceedings by injunction as an incident to the exercise of its jurisdiction. The real question in the case is whether or not the circuit court had jurisdiction to grant the relief sought in the complaint.

[4] The functions of the board of assessors in assessing benefits and the board of commissioners in adjusting them on complaint of the property owners is not judicial in the ordinary sense, but it is in the nature of a legislative power. Pine Bluff Water & Light Co. v. City of Pine Bluff, 62 Ark. 193, 35 S. W. 227; Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Izard County Highway Improvement District, 220 S. W. 452.

[5, 6] Boards created as special tribunals for certain purposes may, and sometimes do, act in a judicial or quasi judicial capacity, and when so acting their proceedings may be reviewed on certiorari (State ex rel. v. Railroad Commission, 109 Ark. 100, 158 S. W. 1076; Hall v. Bledsoe, 128 Ark. 125, 189 S. W. 1041); but in the matter now before us the commissioners do not act in such capacity. The acts of the commissioners not being of a judicial or quasi judicial nature, they are not subject to review on certiorari, which is limited to review of judicial or quasi judicial proceedings. Pine Bluff Water & Light Co. v. City of Pine Bluff, supra; State ex rel. v. Railroad Commission, 109 Ark. 100, 158 S. W. 1076. Injunctive relief is purely a matter of equitable jurisdiction, which, under the Constitution of this state, falls within the jurisdiction of separate chancery courts as now established. Article 7, § 15, of the Constitution, provides that "until the General Assembly shall deem it expedient to establish courts of chancery the circuit courts shall have jurisdiction in matters of equity." We are of the opinion that the power of the Legislature in establishing separate chancery courts therefore swept away the jurisdiction of the circuit court in matters exclusively cognizable in courts of equity.

Counsel for respondents rely upon the statute (Kirby's Digest, § 3966), which provides that "the judge of the circuit court may grant injunctions and restraining orders in all cases of illegal or unauthorized taxes and assessments by county, city or other local tribunals, boards or officers." This statute, however, antedated the adoption of the Constitution of 1874, and the establishment of separate chancery courts pursuant thereto, and it is not effective now, for the purpose of retaining in the circuit court matters exclusively cognizable in equity, for the jurisdiction transferred to courts of chancery in the establishment thereof was such jurisdiction as the courts of chancery properly exercise at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. German National Bank v. Moore, 116 Ark. 490, 173 S. W. 401. This transfer of equity jurisdiction to separate chancery courts was complete, and left no vestige of that jurisdiction in the circuit courts. Such was the interpretation given by this court in the case of Merwin v. Fussell, 93 Ark. 336, 124 S. W. 1021, where we said:

"And under these provisions of the Constitution and the statute a citizen and taxpayer has the right to obtain from a court of equity an injunction against the collection of an illegal or unauthorized tax."

See, also, Moody v. Lowrimore, 74 Ark. 421, 86 S. W. 400; Harrison v. Norton, 104 Ark. 16, 148 S. W. 497.

[7] The framers of the statute creating this improvement district might have provided, as has been done in many similar statutes, for appeals from the board of commissioners to the county court and thence to the circuit court, which would have given the circuit court the jurisdiction to review the assessments. But that was not done in the framing of this statute, which provides for proceedings in a court of equity, to be begun within a specified time. It clearly falls legitimately within the ordinary equity jurisdiction, because the assessments constitute a lien on real estate. We are of the opinion, therefore, that since the statute provides for no review of assessments by the circuit court on appeal, and, on the contrary, provides exclusively for relief in the chancery court, there is no authority for review by the circuit court on certiorari.

Counsel also rely on the decision in Pritchett v. Road Improvement District, supra, as sustaining their contention, but in that case it was void orders and judgments of the county court which were reviewed by the circuit court on certiorari.

In the case of Merchants' Bank v. Fitzgerald, 61 Ark. 607, 33 S. W. 1064, Mr. Justice Battle, speaking for the court, concisely defined the office of the writ of certiorari, as follows:

"(1) Where the tribunal to which it is issued has exceeded its jurisdiction; (2) where the party applying for it had the right of appeal, but lost it through no fault of his own; and (3) in cases where it has superintending control over a tribunal which has proceeded illegally, and no other mode has been provided for directly reviewing its proceedings."

This being true, the circuit court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter set forth in the complaint filed in the proceedings below. The court being without jurisdiction prohibition is the appropriate remedy to stop further proceedings. The writ of prohibition is therefore awarded in accordance with the prayer of the petitioner to prevent the circuit court from further proceeding in the matters under consideration.

WOOD, J. (dissenting). The authorities are practically unanimous in holding that the high prerogative writ and extraordinary remedy of prohibition "is to be used with great caution and forbearance, for the furtherance of justice, and to secure order and regularity in judicial proceedings, and should be issued only in cases of extreme necessity." 22 R. O. L. p. 5, § 4, and cases there cited.

There is no necessity, as we see it, for the issuance of the writ in this case; and, besides, the issuance at this juncture is wholly premature. The circuit court has had no opportunity to determine whether it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter set forth in the complaint of McDonald et al. Every court has the power to determine in limine whether it has the jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the controversies brought before it. To deprive the circuit court in advance of the opportunity and right to decide whether it will entertain jurisdiction is tantamount to an assumption of original jurisdiction by this court, which is contrary to article 7, § 4, of the Constitution.

It has been the doctrine of this court since 1842 that no prohibition lies from this court to an inferior court until a suggestion of its want of jurisdiction, properly verified, has first been presented to the inferior court. There has been no deviation from this rule until the present case. Williams, Ex Parte, 4 Ark. 537, 38 Am. Dec. 46; Blackburn, Ex Parte, 5 Ark. 21; McMeechen, Ex Parte, 12 Ark. 70; City of Little Rock, Ex Parte, 26 Ark. 52; State ex rel. Butler v. Williams, 48 Ark. 227, 2 S. W. 843; Reese v. Steel, 73 Ark. 66, 83 S. W. 335, 1136.

In Williams, Ex Parte, supra, this court said:

"The rule was, at common law, that no prohibition lay to an inferior court, in a cause arising out of their jurisdiction, until that matter had been pleaded in the inferior court, and the plea refused. * * * It must appear, in the suggestion [to the Supreme Court], that the plea was verified, and tendered in person, during the sitting of the inferior court."

The rule is announced in the same language in all the other cases.

This doctrine, we believe, is in accord with the great weight of authority. In an exhaustive note to State v. Superior Court, 111 Am. St. Rep. 925-965, Judge Freeman says:

"Whether any special rule of court has been promulgated on this subject or not, undoubtedly the practice generally prevailing in the United States is not to take any action until it appears that the subordinate tribunal has in some appropriate method had its attention called to its supposed absence or excess of jurisdiction, and has nevertheless, indicated its purpose to proceed, or it in some other manner sufficiently appears that an application to that court must prove unavailing."

Among the numerous cases cited by the eminent author and annotator in support of the text are cases from our own court. Further on in the note to the case the exception recognized in the majority opinion is referred to, and some cases from other courts are cited to support it, but none from Arkansas.

Of course, the opinion of even as learned a law writer as Judge Freeman as to the effect of our former decisions is not binding on this court. But certainly his opinion is entitled to the utmost respect. If he is correct, and we believe he is, in classifying our cases in line with those holding that the writ of prohibition will not lie unless the inferior court has first had its attention directed to the matter, and if, indeed, such has been the established rule of practice in this state for three-fourths of a century, and if it is in accord with the practice generally prevailing in the United States, then why change the rule, or ingraft upon it an exception which virtually nullifies it. Stare decisis should preclude any departure or innovation here. Without stare decisis, "it would be difficult, if not impossible, to build up and preserve any valuable system of jurisprudence." Amour Hunt, Ex Parte, 10 Ark. 284.

Controversies should not be opened every time a new judge takes his seat. Coates v. State, 50 Ark. 333, 7 S. W. 305.

"It is better to let matters of practice remain settled than to disturb them." Miller v. Fraley, 21 Ark. 38.

"Public policy requires that decisions of courts of last resort, which have been followed and acted upon, shall be adhered to, unless great injury and injustice would result." Rhea v. State, 104 Ark. 162, 147 S. W. 463.

The case of Russell et al. v. Jacoway, Judge, 33 Ark. 191, is not in conflict with the other decisions of this court. In that case the issue we have here was not raised. There was no suggestion in the Supreme Court to the effect that no objection had first been made in the inferior court to the exercise of jurisdiction, and that the circuit court had not been given an opportunity to determine that question. On the contrary, the opinion in Russell et al. v. Jacoway, Judge, supra, shows that the Supreme Court disposes of the case on the theory that the plea objecting to the jurisdiction of the inferior court had been first properly presented to that court and refused. The court said: "For the circuit court to assume to determine, in the first instance," etc. Again: "But by the circuit court's assumption of jurisdiction in the case,

But the majority of the court, while recognizing the rule as above announced by the former decisions of this court, nevertheless hold that there is an exception to the rule where the circuit judge, before whom the cause must be heard when the court subsequently convenes, has in vacation overruled an objection to his jurisdiction to proceed in the matter then pending before him, and which must be heard by the court later, and where, as in this case, in this formal response to the application for writ of prohibition, he still maintains that the circuit court has jurisdiction. This holding is not correct, for the reason that the circuit judge in vacation and the circuit court are entirely different functionaries. The orders when made by the circuit judge in vacation are not final, but subject to review and change by the circuit court itself when it subsequently convenes, whereas the orders of the circuit court when final are subject to review and correction by the Supreme Court.

Application was made to the circuit judge in vacation for writ of certiorari to bring up and to quash the assessment of benefits made by the commissioners and to restrain them from further proceeding with the improvement. Conceiving that he had jurisdiction to issue the writ of certiorari reviewable by the circuit court, and in the meantime to issue a restraining order, the circuit judge proceeded to exercise such jurisdiction. He issued the writ of certiorari in April returnable to the ensuing September term of the court, and in the meantime restrained further proceedings by the commissioners of the district. Now, who can say that the circuit court when it convened at the September term would not, upon a plea to its jurisdiction, after a consideration of such plea, have held that it had no jurisdiction of the matters presented in the application for certiorari? Who can say that the circuit court, after a careful consideration, would not have quashed the writ issued by the judge in vacation? Who can say that the circuit court would not have refused to quash the assessments of benefits made by the commissioners, and that the court would have interfered in any manner with the further progress of the work of the improvement district? What prophetic ken has this court of what would be the decision of the circuit court of Craighead county several months in advance of the time when that decision was to be rendered? Who has the omniscience to foretell that the circuit court, although presided over by the same judge, would not entertain different views, and decide that it had no jurisdiction?

To show the inaccuracy of the position of the majority and the unsoundness of its logic, let us suppose that before the September term of the court convenes the Hon. R. H. Dudley, the respondent herein, and the judge who issued the writ of certiorari and the temporary restraining order, dies, or that he is unavoidably detained by illness or other cause, all of which contingencies are contemplated by article 7, § 21, of our Constitution. Suppose that under this constitutional provision a different judge has been elected to preside over the court, and that such judge entertains entirely different views from his predecessor, and that his views are in harmony with the appellant's contention herein; could it then be said that the circuit court had had an opportunity to decide the issue of its jurisdiction, and had decided that issue adversely to appellant's contention? Could it then be said that there was any excuse, much less necessity, for the writ of prohibition? Could it then be decided by this court that the lower court had determined that it had jurisdiction when in fact no opportunity had been given that court to pass upon the question, and when, if the matter had been presented to it, it would itself have decided that it had no jurisdiction?

It occurs to us that the only answer to the above questions demonstrates the fallacy of ingrafting the exception, now proposed and adopted by the majority, upon the rule heretofore announced and so long adhered to by this court. A rule of practice that would not stand the test and apply to any and all cases that might arise under article 7, § 21, of our Constitution, is unsound (besides being unconstitutional), and should not be approved by this court.

The rule announced in Williams, Ex Parte, supra, is a sound one. It preserves the proper consideration and deference for the opinions and judgment of the inferior tribunal.

Under the so-called exception no allowance is made for a possible, or even probable, change of viewpoint upon the part of the judge himself who reviews in term time his own vacation orders. This is manifestly unjust and unfair to the inferior tribunal, which should at least be given the opportunity to first decide upon the question of whether it has jurisdiction to proceed. We are convinced that there is no exception to the rule in this state, and that the majority opinion, therefore, results in overruling the cases heretofore mentioned; and that the issuance of the writ, under the circumstances here detailed, is an exercise of original jurisdiction by this court not contemplated by our Constitution.

For the above reasons Mr. Justice HART and I dissent from that part of the opinion which holds that the writ of prohibition will lie.

UNION COTTON CO. v. BONDURANT.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 25, 1920.)

1. Damages ⇨40(2)—Speculative profits not recoverable.

Loss of profits remote, uncertain, contingent, speculative, and conjectural is not allowed as a basis for damages from breach of contract.

2. Damages ⇨23—Profits reasonably certain and within parties' contemplation are recoverable.

Where breach of contract is involved, loss of profits is a proper element of damages where they can be shown, if not with absolute, then with reasonable certainty, and when it may reasonably be considered parties had such loss in contemplation.

3. Damages ⇨40(2)—Profits from operation of cotton gin sufficiently certain to be recoverable.

Anticipated profits, from operation of cotton gin leased for a year, during the ginning season of from 60 to 90 days, held sufficiently ascertainable to be recoverable by lessee in his action for lessor's breach of contract by failing to put gin in proper repair.

4. Damages ⇨208(7)—Whether plaintiff failed to minimize damages held for jury.

In action by lessee of cotton gin for breach by lessor through having failed to put gin in proper repair, whether plaintiff lessee failed to minimize his damages by himself making any necessary repairs held for jury.

5. Attachment ⇨197—Judgment for sale of several lots improper in absence of showing sale of all necessary.

Under rule that no more of defendant's realty should be sold in satisfaction of debt than necessary for purpose, attachment on seven separate lots of defendant designated by numbers should not have been sustained and lots directed to be sold in satisfaction of judgment in absence of showing either by return of officer who levied attachment or by other evidence that lots should or must all be sold together.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fulton County.

Action by C. T. Bondurant against the Union Cotton Company. From judgment for plaintiff for the recovery of damages, and from judgment sustaining attachment on defendant's property and adjudging sale of it to satisfy the money judgment, defendant appeals. Judgment for recovery of damages affirmed, judgment sustaining attachment reversed, and cause remanded.

Robbins & Robbins, of Mayfield, for appellant.

W. J. Webb, of Mayfield, for appellee.

HURT, J. In this action there has been an appeal from two judgments of the circuit court, one by which the appellee, C. T.

Bondurant, was adjudged to recover from appellant, Union Cotton Company, the sum of $1,200, and the other was a judgment which sustained the attachment upon the property of the appellant and adjudged a sale of it to satisfy the judgment.

The appellee, C. T. Bondurant, brought this action against the appellant, Union Cotton Company, averring that the latter had broken a contract between him and it by which he had leased from it a cotton gin and appurtenances for a term beginning July 1, 1916, and ending June 30, 1917, and for which he had agreed to pay it the sum of $1,200. The negotiations between the parties had commenced by parol, but were completed by an exchange of letters, and culminated in the making of a contract which was reduced to writing and subscribed by each of the parties. The writing contained a clause as follows:

"The Union Cotton Company agrees to put the cotton gin machinery and scales in good working condition, said work to be inspected and accepted by C. T. Bondurant as soon as repairs are completed, not later than August 1, 1916."

The written memorial of the contract was prepared in duplicate and subscribed by appellant and forwarded by mail to appellee, who in turn subscribed the copies, and, retaining one, returned the other to appellant, and about the same time forwarded to it three negotiable promissory notes by which he promised to pay the rental in three equal installments, October 1st, January 1st, and April 1st following. The appellant accepted the notes, and before either of them became due assigned them to another. While it is insisted by appellant upon this appeal that the contract, by reason of a letter from appellee which accompanied the return of the written contract to appellant and the reply thereto by appellant, was that the appellee should make any repairs necessary after the 1st of August, and after repairs had been made by appellant, previous to that time, and at his own cost. This contention does not appear in the pleadings, which admit the contract touching the duty of putting machinery of the gin and the scales in good working condition to be as stated in the above-quoted clause of the writing subscribed by both parties, and besides neither party appears to have ever accepted the construction placed upon this clause of the writing by the other in the letters referred to, but to have proceeded under the contract as written and subscribed.

The breach of the contract upon which appellee relied for the recovery of damages was the alleged failure by appellant to put the machinery of the gin, which was greatly in need of repair, into good working condition, either before August 1st or at any time thereafter, and hence that, under the terms of the contract, the repairs had never been in such a state of completion as to require him to accept them as having put the plant in a good working condition, and that on that account he had never done so, and that, although appellant had in the first days of July placed workmen in repairing the plant, it had never so repaired it as to put it in good working condition, and that he had so notified the agent of appellant in charge of the work that he would not accept the repairs as made as putting the plant in the condition required by the contract, and thereafter appellant never complied with its covenant to make the necessary repairs, and appellee did not know that the plant was not in good working condition until he undertook to operate it after the ginning season for 1916 had commenced, when he found that the plant was entirely unfit for ginning purposes and not in working condition, and this was at so late a period in the season that he was not able to secure or provide himself with other means of ginning during that season, nor to have repaired the appellant's gin, if he had desired to do so, and because of that fact he lost profits which he could and would have made in ginning cotton during the season which amounted, as he claimed, to the sum of $1,800. Upon the other hand the appellant denied that it failed before August 1st, to put the plant in good working condition, and claimed affirmatively that it did put the machinery of the gin and the scales in such condition and had them in such condition by the 14th day of July, at which time the appellee accepted the plant as having been put in the condition required by the contract. The appellant denied all the averments of damages made by the appellee, and also set up a counterclaim for damages, based upon the stipulation in the contract that appellee, at the end of the term of the lease, would return the property to appellant in as good condition as he received it, ordinary wear and damages from fire excepted, and then, in violation of the stipulation, he had negligently permitted it to become greatly injured and damaged in the sum of $1,000. The affirmative allegations of appellant's answer was by agreement, controverted upon the record.

The issues raised by the pleadings were determined by the jury under instructions which submitted the theory of each party to it, and resulted in a finding for appellee in the sum of $1,200 and a judgment of the court accordingly.

The Union Cotton Company appeals from the judgment, and urges that the court erred in overruling its motion for a directed verdict at the close of the evidence for appellee and at the close of all the evidence upon two grounds. The first of the grounds relied upon is that the damages sought, and for which the appellee recovered a judgment, were on account of the loss of profits, which character of recovery is not allowed, because the evidence of such recovery is uncertain, contingent, and speculative. It may be conceded that the only element of damage which appellee, by his petition, sought to recover, was the profits which he could and would have realized from the ginning of cotton during the ginning season, within the terms of the lease, if the plant had been put into good working condition by appellant, and which he lost by the failure of appellant to comply with its contract in that respect. He also averred that, when the contract was made for the lease of the property, appellant knew his purpose in procuring the lease was to operate the gin during the following season for ginning cotton. He testified upon the trial to having given appellant such information of his intention during the negotiations, and this testimony was not objected to nor the truth of the statement denied in any evidence. The court instructed the jury that, if it was contemplated by the parties when the contract was made that appellee was leasing the property for the purpose of operating the gin and realizing profits therefrom, and appellant failed to put the plant in reasonably good working condition before August 1st, and appellee was thereby deprived of the use of it for ginning purposes during the season of the fall of 1916 and the winter of 1917, and was thereby prevented from the ginning of cotton which he could and would have ginned but for such failure on the part of appellant, to find for appellee such a sum as would reasonably compensate for the loss of the profits, if any, which he could and would have realized from the ginning of cotton, less the expense incident to it. The appellant, as a ground for its motion for a directed verdict, as well as of objection to the instruction given, insists that damages are not recoverable on account of the loss of profits.

[1,2] It is true that the loss of profits which are remote, uncertain, contingent, speculative, and conjectural is not allowable as a basis for damages. Formerly damages on account of loss of profits were not allowable at all, but the principle now governing the subject is that the right to recover damages on account of loss of profits is determinable by the same principles as the recovery of other damages are. Where a breach of a contract is involved, loss of profits is a proper element of damages, where they can be shown, not with absolute, but with a reasonable, degree of certainty, and when it may be reasonably considered that when the contract was made the parties had in contemplation the loss of profits as an element for damages which would naturally grow out of a violation of the contract. The loss of anticipated profits which can be legally ascertained—that is, which do not lack certainty on account of being too remote, conjectural, and speculative—may be recovered. Elizabethtown & Paducah R. Co. v. Pottinger, 10 Bush, 188; Blood v. Herring, etc., 61 S. W. 273, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1725; Bates Machine Co. v. Norton Iron Works, 113 Ky. 372, 68 S. W. 423, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 931; *Pugh v. [3] In the instant case the gin was leased for one year. Unless a contrary purpose appears, it could not be assumed that one would take a lease upon a cotton gin for any other purpose than to operate it. The contract here provided that the lessor should, as one of the conditions of the lease, put it into good condition for operation, and from which it was obliged to have inferred that it was the purpose and intention of the appellee in securing the lease to operate the gin for what it would realize to him. Aside from these considerations, the appellee alleges and proves that appellant was made acquainted with the fact that his purpose in entering into the contract was to secure the gin for the purpose of operating it. In such state of case it seems that the parties must have had in contemplation, when the contract was made, that the profits which the appellee anticipated would be made from the operation of the gin would be an element of the damages if the contract was violated so that he was prevented from operating the gin and realizing the profits. The anticipated profits are capable of ascertainment with a reasonable degree of certainty. The evidence without dispute shows that the ginning season, during the term of the lease, was from 60 to 90 days. The plant, if in good working condition, would gin not less than 30 bales of cotton per day. The profit for ginning a bale of cotton, over and above the expenses of so doing, was not less than $2.50. During the period of the lease the appellee proves that he was compelled to decline to gin not less than 500 bales of cotton because of the lack of ginning facilities arising from the appellant's failure to put the gin in good working condition. Hence it appears that the court did not err in overruling the motion for a directed verdict, nor did it err in the measure of damages recoverable which was submitted to the jury by the instruction given.

Another ground upon which it is insisted that the motion for a directed verdict should have been sustained was that the contract provided that the appellee should make any repairs necessary for the operation of the gin the necessity of which might appear after the 1st of August, and that, when he undertook to operate the gin, it was his duty to have made the repairs necessary to have put it in good working condition, the cost of which, it is insisted, would not have exceeded the sum of $100, and that appellee wholly failed to undertake in any way to minimize the damages which he suffered from the failure of appellant to perform its contract with him, which the appellant insists was conclusively shown by the proof. The appellant rests his contention in this respect upon the contents of the letter which appellee wrote to appellant and which accompanied the return of the written contract subscribed by him, and in this letter the appellee stated that he would pass on and give his opinion at the time the appellant had completed all repairs necessary to put the plant in good working condition, and if there were some things left to be done after the appellant's servant had left who was to do the necessary repairs, appellee was willing to do it with an experienced man of his own, but would expect the appellant to pay for the work as it had agreed to put the plant in good running condition. This proposition, if it may be so called, or addition to the contract, was distinctly rejected by the appellant in the letter which it wrote to appellee in reply. Instead of it being conceded that the evidence shows that appellant put the plant in good working condition before August 1st, and that it was accepted as such by the appellee, the evidence shows preponderatingly that the plant was not put in good working condition by appellant, nor did appellee accept it as being in such condition from the repairs made. The evidence shows without any contradiction that, when appellee did undertake to operate the gin, it was utterly unfit to be operated, and was in such condition that appellee and his witnesses deposed that it was then too late in the season to undertake to put it in working condition for that season, and the expense which would have been necessary to have put it in good working condition does not appear to have been less than the sum of $100, because when it was put in condition the following year, without any material change in its condition, the cost amounted to $300 to $400. It will further be observed that the failure to put the plant in a working condition of which appellee complains was not on account of something which happened to the machinery after the 1st of August, or some injury to it which might arise from its operation or otherwise, but the complaint which he makes is of the failure of the appellant to perform the covenant in its contract to put the plant in working condition before the 1st of August as a condition of the contract between them. Hence the evidence does not show such a state of case as would justify a peremptory direction to the jury to find a verdict for appellant.

[4] We do not consider nor pass upon the question as to what instruction, if any, would have been proper to have been given to the jury touching the appellee's duty to minimize the damages which he was about to suffer, as no such instruction was offered by the appellant, nor any instruction which required the court to give one upon that subject, as appears from the bill of exceptions. The issue which appellant made and upon which it squarely based its defense was that it had put the plant in good working condition before the 1st of August, and that appellee had so accepted the repairs then made, and had accepted the plant as in the condition required by the contract, and for that reason could not complain of the unfit condition of the plant after that time, and the court, in substance, so instructed the jury, submitting to it the issue as to whether the appellant did put the plant in the condition required by the contract before the 1st of August, and whether the appellee accepted it as such, and upon that issue the jury evidently found for the appellee.

[5] The judgment by which the attachment was sustained and seven separate lots, designating them by numbers, are directed to be sold in satisfaction of the judgment for damages, must be reversed. The return of the officer who levied the attachment issued in the action does not indicate that the lots are the property upon which he levied the attachment, and there is no evidence or pleading of any kind in the record to support the judgment to the effect that the lots should all be sold together, or the necessity for so doing. While the description of a parcel of real estate as a town lot might be sufficient upon which to rest a judgment that it was indivisible, it could not be conceded that seven separate lots constitute one indivisible parcel of real estate, without evidence to that effect, or at least a showing that they are contiguous. The rule providing that no more of a defendant's real estate should be sold in satisfaction of a debt than is necessary for that purpose should be adhered to, unless it is shown that the property is not susceptible of practical division.

The judgment for the recovery of damages is therefore affirmed, but the judgment sustaining the attachment is reversed, and the cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

SOVEREIGN CAMP, WOODMEN OF THE WORLD, v. THOMAS.

1. Insurance \S 819(2)—Evidence held to show insured suffered from indigestion before death.

In widow's action on husband's policy issued by benefit society, evidence held to show that husband for three or four years before his death had been suffering with attacks of indigestion, some so serious as to leave him apprehensive for his life, also showing he knew attacks were from indigestion or serious disorder of digestive system.

2. Insurance \S 723(5)—Misrepresentations of insured as to freedom from indigestion may prevent recovery.

Under Ky. St. \S 639, providing statements in application for life insurance shall be deemed representations, and shall not prevent recovery unless material or fraudulent, where applicant for certificate of insurance in a benefit society, with knowledge he was subject to indigestion, or at least that he had symptoms of serious disturbance in digestive system, stated he had never had diseases or symptoms of colic, gall stones, or indigestion, or other diseases of digestive system, his widow cannot recover on certificate.

3. Insurance \S 818(2)—Evidence that application would not have been accepted if applicant had stated truth admissible.

In action on certificate issued by benefit society, defense being that in his application insured misrepresented he had never had diseases of digestive organs, or symptoms thereof, evidence that according to usual course of life insurance business application would not have been accepted or policy issued, if insured had stated the truth, is admissible for defendant society.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Grayson County.

Suit by Susie Thomas against the Sovereign Camp, Woodmen of the World. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions for new trial.

Robt. L. Page and L. D. Greene, both of Louisville, and Allen Cabbage, of Leitchfield, for appellant.

Haynes Carter, of Elizabethtown, for appellee.

CARROLL, O. J. This is a suit by Susie Thomas, the widow and beneficiary of A. W. Thomas, to recover from the appellant, Woodmen of the World, the amount of a policy for $1,000 issued to A. W. Thomas. Upon refusal to pay the policy, Mrs. Thomas brought this suit, and, after a trial in the circuit court, there was a judgment in her favor for the amount of the policy, and the company appeals.

The grounds upon which her right to recover upon the policy were contested are of such a nature as to require an extended statement of the facts.

On December 27, 1916, A. W. Thomas made application to the local camp of Woodmen, at Leitchfield, Ky., to become a member, entitled to participate in its insurance scheme, and at the time of his application he was asked the following questions and made the following answers thereto:

"Have you now or ever had any disease of the following named organs, or any of the following named diseases or symptoms: * * * Colic, gall stones, * * * indigestion, * * * or any other disease of the digestive system?" Answer: "No." "Have you consulted or been attended by a physician for any disease or injury during the past five years?" Answer: "No."

His application was accepted, and on January 13, 1917, a certificate of insurance for $1,000 was delivered to him. On the next day he died from an attack of acute indigestion, and payment of the policy was resisted upon the ground that the answers made by Thomas to these questions were material and false. A reversal is asked, upon the ground that the court erred in refusing to direct the jury to find for the Woodmen of the World, that the verdict was flagrantly against the evidence, for error committed in rejecting competent evidence, and in the instructions of the jury.

On behalf of the Woodmen, T. F. Willis testified that he had known Thomas about two years just preceding his death, during which time he had lived at Leitchfield; that he had heard him on three different occasions speak about "spells" he had.

"Q. What did he say the spells were? A. The last morning he talked to me, the day he died, he said the doctors claimed it was acute indigestion. Q. Did he say where he suffered, what hurt or pained him, or describe his suffering? A. Yes; he told me all about it. Q. What did he tell you? A. He said it was in his stomach. Q. Did he say whether or not the spell was slight or severe, or what description did he give? A. He said it was severe, and went on to tell me he believed, if he hadn't trusted in God, it was severe enough it would have killed him, you know. Q. When did you say was the first time you had a conversation with him, that he told you something about his condition of health? A. It was some three or four months, the first conversation. Q. Three or four months before his death? A. Yes, sir. Q. Tell the jury what he told you in that conversation with reference to his condition of health, or any spell. A. He said, 'I had a spell when I was living at the fair grounds, and thought I was going to pass away.' Then he told about the first time. Q. What sort of spell did he say that was? A. He pronounced it then, he thought it was something like bilious colic. Q. He characterized it as some sort of stomach trouble, did he? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he say on that occasion whether he suffered much or little, whether it was serious or slight? A. Yes; he said it was serious."

W. B. Hill had several conversations with Thomas and gave evidence to the same effect as that of Willis.

Dr. J. R. Perry testified that he was a practicing physician, and had attended in a medical capacity A. W. Thomas.

"Q. Did he ever consult you personally, or did you ever attend him as a physician? A. Yes. Q. State as near as you can the time or times that you have attended him. A. I really can't say the number of visits I attended him at his home, but it was in November, and December, 1912, to the best of my knowledge. Q. He consulted you, and did you attend him during these two months you speak of more than once? A. Yes. Q. What was the trouble complained of by Mr. Thomas at the time or times you visited him? A. Gastritis. Q. What is gastritis? A. An inflammation of the stomach. G. Doctor, I will get you to state whether or not you so advised him at the time of his ailment. A. Yes. Q. At the time you speak of treating him in 1912, did he tell you what was the matter with him, or did you tell him what you thought was the matter with him? A. I told him. Q. Did you find that he had any disease of the digestive system? A. Yes. Q. What was that? A. Gastritis. Q. Did you find this trouble of Thomas' temporary or chronic? A. I would not have called it chronic at the beginning, the first time I saw the attack."

Dr. S. H. Armes testified that, about five or ten days before the death of Thomas, he was called to see him once only, and found him suffering with severe pains in the region of his stomach; that the symptoms indicated that he was suffering with a case of indigestion.

"Q. Did you advise him of his ailment, what you thought was his trouble? A. I think so; the best I remember, I did. Q. What percentage, in your judgment, of the people suffer at times temporarily from what the laity call 'indigestion'? A. I don't know what per cent., but quite a number of people. Q. Wouldn't you suggest the vast majority? A. Yes; I think the majority. Q. The fact is, 'indigestion' is a term used to cover a number of disorders and illnesses? A. Yes, sir."

W. L. Bosarth testified that he knew Thomas when he lived at the fair grounds near Leitchfield and lived close to him.

"Q. Did he ever, during the period he lived there close to you, describe or tell you of any impaired physical condition he had? A. Yes, sir; he told me that he had a stomach trouble, and there were certain things he couldn't eat, on account of the fact that they hurt him. Q. Did he tell you what those things produced as a rule, if he ate them? A. Well, I couldn't say now that he did. He just said he couldn't eat them on that account. Q. Did he tell you at that time what they did to him, how they affected him? A. Well, as well as I remember, he said they kind of cramped him, or something of the kind, that they hurt his stomach; it hurt him so he didn't eat them at all, just left them off. Q. On how many occasions did he tell you that? A. I couldn't say; he was there at my house some several times. Q. Did he during that time, or at any time, tell you of being out on his business trips and being overtaken with some trouble of that sort? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did he say to you he suffered much or little pain? A. Yes; he said sometimes he thought he wasn't going to make it at all. Q. Now, then, did the condition he described to you at that time occur during the last two or three years of his life or not? A. Yes, sir; I don't remember just the last time he said about it, but it wasn't any great while before his death. Q. Within the last year or— A. Yes; within the last year."

Dr. J. H. Hicks said that he did not treat Thomas during his life, but was called in when he died.

"Q. What was the cause of the death? A. Acute indigestion. Q. Was it complicated with any other disease, acute or chronic? A. Not that I know of."

Dr. J. M. Berry testified that he examined Thomas when he applied for the insurance; that he asked him all the questions in the application, and wrote down the answers that Thomas made; that there was nothing in his personal appearance that would indicate that he was suffering from any form of disease or indigestion; that he appeared to be in fine health, and in making out the application, and reporting to the Woodmen, he relied entirely upon the answers made by Thomas in his application; that he was called to his house the day he died, shortly afterwards, and from information gathered from the family his conclusion was that his death was caused from acute indigestion. Asked:

"Q. Is indigestion material to the risk in an insurance application on a man's life? A. Well, I don't know, sir, that it is; I can't say that it is. Q. Assuming that Mr. Thomas had reported to you, at the time you secured this personal history from him, that he had spells of indigestion at various times? A. I would have stated on the application blank, to let the company—the chief physician—pass upon it; because people sometimes suffer from very slight indigestion, from overeating. Q. Did you, or not, have anything to do with the acceptance or rejection of this application for insurance? A. No, sir. Q. If Mr. Thomas, in making to you this personal history, had said to you in the course of that history that he had indigestion, would you in that event have inquired as to the number of spells he had, as to whether or not they were light or serious. A.

Yes, sir. Q. Would you have made a complete and detailed inquiry into his condition? A. Certainly I would. Q. If, in answer to this question, Doctor, 'Have you consulted or been attended by a physician for any disease or injury during the past five years?' had Mr. Thomas answered that question, 'Yes,' would you have gone into detail and made inquiry? A. Certainly, I would have wanted to know what it was he had been suffering with, and had a physician for, and the doctor, and how long the spell lasted, and how many days he was sick, so the chief physician could have formed a diagnosis. Q. As I understand the term, 'indigestion' is rather a lay term—that is, a term used by those who are not members of the medical profession—and it is rather a general expression covering a number of things that might or might not be diseases? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did you report in that proof of death as the cause of death? A. Acute indigestion. Q. Upon what information did you make up this death certificate? A. By seeing him there in bed, and my casual examination, and what the parties in there said. Q. Who were the parties? A. I can't call their names. I don't remember; there were several up there. His wife was there."

Dr. Charles A. Edelen testified that he was a medical examiner for several insurance companies.

"Q. Are you acquainted with the character of risk ordinarily assumed by the companies in the usual course of their business of life insurance? A. I am."

He was then asked and made these answers:

"Q. In the usual course of business in all insurance companies, would or not the insurance company accept a risk, a person who had prior to that application for insurance suffered from acute indigestion, gastritis, or disease of the digestive system? A. Any physician would hardly accept any application or recommend any application for insurance who had frequent attacks of acute indigestion or gall stone colic—which is mostly the case in those conditions; that is a gall stone colic. No physician would recommend an applicant of that kind for insurance in any of the old-line companies. They might do this; they might put it up to the company, which would in all cases be declined or referred back to the medical examiner; and in cases of gall stone colic, should the gall stone be removed, afterwards they might be recommended for life insurance, but under no circumstances would we accept a man who had frequent attacks of gall stone colic, or bilious attacks, or acute indigestion as they call it. Q. In the usual course of business, what would a company do if an applicant simply stated that he had some indigestion? A. If the applicant would say to the medical examiner that he has a slight case of indigestion, the examiner would recommend him to the insurance company; the insurance company would then take it up with the medical examiner, and have him make thorough examination, and find out to his own satisfaction that it was not gall stone colic. Q. Assuming that this applicant had had, about three months prior to his application for in-insurance, a very severe attack of indigestion, and just prior to that time, something like six months, had had an attack of gastritis, what would have been the policy of the company in a case of that sort, assuming that the applicant stated that in his application for insurance? A. He would have been declined."

Dr. F. W. Samuels, who was examiner for several insurance companies, was asked:

"Q. Please state whether or not you consider diseases of the digestive organs, including indigestion, or acute attacks of indigestion, or colic, material to the risk. A. I do. Q. In the usual course of business, would an insurance company accept as a risk an applicant who had had an acute attack of indigestion, a month or two, or perhaps a shorter time, prior to the making of his application for insurance? A. An attack of acute indigestion would not make one an unfit applicant for risk, because acute indigestion means nothing. Q. Suppose, now, a man had several attacks, and had been suffering from indigestion, what would have been the policy of the insurance company in the usual course of business? A. To defer the risk until it could be found what was the matter with him. Q. Suppose a man made an application for insurance, and he stated he had indigestion, or acute indigestion, or a disease of the digestive organs, what would the company do? A. A disease, you know, is quite different matter. Acute indigestion is purely a symptom; disease means a different thing. Any disease of the digestive tract would cause him to be at once turned down as far as any regular company is concerned, for good and forever. Q. Suppose a man, in answer to this question, 'Have you now or ever had any disease of the following named organs, or any of the following named diseases, or symptoms: Colic, or gall stone, indigestion, or other disease of the digestive system?' had answered, 'Yes'? A. Then he would be turned down or deferred indefinitely. Q. In the usual course of business, what would insurance companies do with such an applicant? A. They are declined as a rule at the home office, even though the examiner here should recommend them, they would take no stock in his statement whatever, just decline him; at least, those I have anything to do with would. Q. Would any information of the insurance company to the effect that a person had had an attack of acute indigestion have caused the company to make a complete investigation as to the duration and frequency of the attacks before issuing a policy. A. Certainly it would; they would hold as suspicious all those things such as symptoms you have enumerated. As I say, they would hold the case suspicious until his condition is proven innocent and not malignant. Q. Would your insurance company consider those diseases as material as any other disease the person might have? A. Colic is not disease, you know; it is only a symptom."

Dr. M. Phelps testified that he knew Mr. Thomas, who told him about two weeks before he died of having a bad attack of indigestion the night before.

"Q. Did he tell you it was indigestion from which he was suffering? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is indigestion a fatal disease? A. Well, not necessarily, until it is an acute attack. Q. Are you an examiner for any insurance company? A. Yes, sir. Q. If a person states in his application for insurance that he has been suffering from indigestion, or a disease of the digestive system, what is the usual and ordinary course taken by a physician in reporting on such applicants? A. Well, if there is any gastritis or dyspepsia to amount to anything, I think he would be turned down. Q. As a matter of fact, gastritis is a disease, is it not? A. Surely, yes. Q. Now, indigestion is not a disease, is it? A. Gastritis and indigestion is the same thing."

Mrs. Susie Thomas said that Mr. Thomas was only sick about an hour before he died; that a few days before he had a similar attack; that his health had been generally good, except that he was sick in 1912, when Dr. Berry waited on him. Other witnesses testified to the same effect as Mrs. Thomas concerning the general good health of Thomas.

[1] This evidence shows beyond question that Mr. Thomas for three or four years before his death had been suffering with severe spells of indigestion, some of them so serious as to leave him apprehensive that they would result in his death, and it is also very clear that he knew that these attacks were caused from indigestion or some serious disorder of the digestive system. We say this because Thomas was an intelligent well-informed man, who had been selling for several years a patent medicine that he was in the habit of using to obtain relief from the attacks he suffered with. It is also undisputed that within five years before his death he had been treated by a physician for gastritis, which is a form of indigestion, and was advised by him of the nature of his ailment. The evidence that Mr. Thomas knew that the attacks he suffered with were caused by indigestion is conclusive; but it is earnestly insisted that he did not recognize his ailment as a disease, and never considered that his digestive organs were diseased, and, this being so, the answers made by Thomas to the questions before referred to were not false.

Much emphasis is put upon the fact that in these questions he was asked if he now or ever had "any disease," or "diseases," such as indigestion, or any other "disease of the digestive system"; that the question as to whether he had been attended by a physician also contained the word "disease"; that accordingly it must be made to appear, in order to defeat the recovery on the policy on the ground that these answers were false, that Thomas had a "disease" or a "diseased" condition of the digestive system. It will be observed, however, that the first question is not confined to "diseases," but includes "symptoms"; the question being, Had he ever had any of the following named "diseases" or "symptoms"? and it cannot be doubted that Thomas, even if it could be said that he did not know that the indigestion from which he suffered was a "disease," must have known that he had "symptoms" sufficient to satisfy any person of reasonable intelligence that he had either diseases or symptoms of indigestion.

It is further argued that the evidence shows—and it does—that indigestion is a common ailment, and one that a large majority of people are subject to; that it is not regarded as a disease by people generally, but merely as a disordered condition of the stomach, due to some indiscretion in eating food that does not agree with the person; and if Thomas had only occasional attacks of mild indigestion, or these attacks only caused the slight indisposition that usually comes from indigestion, as commonly understood, there would be great force in the argument of counsel that he never had any diseased condition of the digestive system within the fair meaning of the question to which he answered "No." But the evidence shows conclusively that Mr. Thomas, for three or four years before his death, had frequently suffered greatly from these attacks; that some of them were so serious as to cause him to fear that he might not survive another attack. It is therefore made plain that the indigestion that he was subject to was not that harmless type that is so common; it was of an aggravated, dangerous form, and Mr. Thomas, being, as the evidence shows, a man of intelligence, must have known the serious nature of these attacks.

There is also ample evidence in the record that, if in his application he had answered correctly the question propounded as to his health, and that he had been treated by a physician within five years, and that he was subject to these attacks about which he so freely spoke to other people, the company would have made a thorough investigation for the purpose of determining whether it would be advisable to accept his application. And the evidence of the medical examiners permitted to go to the jury, as well as that improperly excluded, also makes it very clear that, if the company had been put in possession of this information by the answers of Thomas in his application, it would either have rejected him at once or have made a thorough investigation, and, if the facts developed the conditions that appear in this record, would have rejected his application.

"All statements or descriptions in any application for a policy of insurance shall be deemed and held representations and not warranties; nor shall any misrepresentations, unless material or fraudulent, prevent a recovery on the policy."

And under this statute it has been frequently written that false answers in an application will not avoid the policy contract, unless they are material or fraudulent. Giving to this statute its fair meaning and the construction that has been consistently applied, there seems, in the light of the evidence, no escape from the conclusion that the answers of Thomas, in his application, were material and false.

Counsel for Mrs. Thomas rely on the cases of U. S. Casualty Co. v. Campbell, 148 Ky. 554, 146 S. W. 1121, Columbia Life Insurance Co. v. Tousey, 152 Ky. 447, 153 S. W. 767, Yeoman of America v. Rott, 145 Ky. 604, 140 S. W. 1018, and National Protective Legion v. Allphin, 141 Ky. 777, 133 S. W. 788, as supporting the contention that the answers of Thomas were not so false or material as to affect the validity of the insurance contract; but the facts in these cases, and many others like them, are so different from the facts in this case that they cannot be regarded as controlling authority on the propositions asserted by counsel. On the contrary, this court, in many cases, has consistently held, under facts such as appear in this record, that there could be no recovery on the contract. Provident Savings Life Assurance Co. v. Dees, 120 Ky. 285, 86 S. W. 522, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 670; Provident Savings Life Assurance Co. v. Wayne's Adm'r, 131 Ky. 84, 98 S. W. 1049, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 160; Illinois Life Insurance Co. v. De Lang, 124 Ky. 569, 99 S. W. 616, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 753; Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. v. Schmidt, 93 S. W. 1055, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 255; Brisou v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 115 S. W. 785; Supreme Lodge of Knights of Pythias v. Bradley, 141 Ky. 334, 132 S. W. 547; Blenke v. Citizens' Life Insurance Co., 145 Ky. 332, 140 S. W. 561; Knights of Maccabees v. Shields, 156 Ky. 270, 160 S. W. 1048, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 853; Royal Neighbors of America v. Spore, 160 Ky. 572, 169 S. W. 984.

[3] Upon the whole case, after a very thorough consideration we have reached the conclusion that the verdict of the jury was flagrantly against the evidence and contrary to the instructions of the court. We are also of the opinion that on another trial the court should permit all the evidence offered by the company tending to show that according to the usual course of life insurance business the application would not have been accepted, or the policy issued, if the truth had been stated in the answer or answers made by the insured, and if upon another trial the evidence is substantially the same as appears in this record, the court should direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial not inconsistent with this opinion.

WILKERSON v. CITY OF LEXINGTON et al. CHINN v. SAME. DAVIS
v. SAME.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 4, 1920.)

1. Municipal corporations \S 918(1) — Two-thirds vote on bond issue held to meet requirement for creating indebtedness exceeding annual income.

Under Const. \S 157, declaring that no municipality may become indebted in any year beyond the income and revenue for such year without the assent of two-thirds of the voters at an election to be held for that purpose, where a municipal bond issue in a city of the second class with a population of more than 40,000 has received the assent of more than two-thirds of those voting on the question, the requirements of the Constitution are met.

2. Municipal corporations \S 865(3)—Proposed bond issue held not to exceed constitutional limit in second-class city.

Where a city of the second class having a population of more than 15,000 has a floating indebtedness of $108,761.46, provided for in the 1920 levy and an additional indebtedness of $1,464,336.52, and also a bond issue of $75,000, the total value of the taxable property being $33,140,954, a proposed indebtedness of $1,200,000 does not exceed 10 per cent. of the total value of the taxable property as limited in Const. \S 158.

3. Municipal corporations \S 107(3) — Mayor pro tem. may sign ordinances with same effect as regularly elected mayor.

Under Ky. St. \S 3235c, subsec. 13, providing that each resolution, measure, or ordinance shall be signed by the mayor or by two commissioners, an ordinance may be signed by a mayor pro tem. alone, notwithstanding that such mayor pro tem. is a commissioner, and it need not, in addition, be signed by another commissioner to be valid.

4. Municipal corporations \S 918(3) — Sheriff need not advertise municipal bond election.

Where a city ordinance ordering an election on a bond issue was regularly passed by the board of commissioners, under Ky. St. \S 3069, and 3235c, subsec. 12, and regularly advertised by publication for two weeks, such election was properly advertised, notwithstanding that the sheriff did not advertise it as required by the orders of the county court; there being no statute requiring the sheriff to advertise such election.

5. Municipal corporations \S 269(1)—Second-class city may extend streets and construct under or over railroad tracks.

Ky. St. \S 3094, conferring on the general council of city of the second class, and on the board of commissioners where the commission form of government has been adopted under section 3235c, subsec. 12, exclusive control and power over the streets, roadways, etc., and to establish, open, alter, widen, and extend them, a city of the second class, through its board of commissioners, has power to extend the streets of the city and to construct subways under, or viaducts over, railroad tracks within the city, wherever it is necessary for the safety and convenience of the public, as well as consequent power to levy taxes and incur indebtedness for such improvements.

6. Municipal corporations \S 268—Second-class city held to have power to purchase site and construct auditorium.

Under Ky. St. \S 3058, subsec. 16, conferring the power to purchase, rent, or lease, within the limits of the city or elsewhere, any real or personal property for the use of the city, and to control and improve it, a city of the second class acting under the commission form of government may purchase a site for and erect a municipal auditorium, in which the citizens may exercise their right of assembling and discussing public affairs, and such power carries with it the power to incur indebtedness and levy taxes for such purpose.

Appeals from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Consolidated suits by H. Freeman Wilkerson, by A. Coleman Chinn, and by John B. Davis against the City of Lexington and others to enjoin certain bond issues. A demurrer to the answer was overruled in each case, and judgments rendered, denying an injunction and dismissing the petition, and petitioners appeal. Affirmed in each case.

Wallace Muir, of Lexington, for appellants.

Wm. H. Townsend, Harry B. Miller, and James A. Wilmore, all of Lexington, for appellees.

CLAY, C. These three appeals have been consolidated and will be considered in one opinion.

The suit of H. Freeman Wilkerson against the city of Lexington and its officers was brought for the purpose of enjoining a bond issue of $500,000 to provide funds for the purchase of a site or sites, and erection thereon of a building or buildings, to be used as a city hall and auditorium, and for other public purposes. The suit by A. Coleman Chinn was to enjoin a bond issue of $300,000 to provide funds for the purpose of defraying the expenses and cost of extending Vine street, from Limestone street to Hanover avenue, and Short street, from Wilson street to Russell avenue, and to construct a subway at the intersection of West High street with the railroad of the Southern Railway System. The suit by John B. Davis was to enjoin a bond issue of $400,000 for school purposes. In each case the city filed a comprehensive answer, setting forth all the steps leading up to each issue, and giving a complete financial statement of the city, showing in detail all the indebtedness theretofore existing, the amount of indebtedness proposed to be incurred, together with the prior tax rate and the rate that would have to be levied in order to provide a sinking fund and pay the proposed indebtedness. In each case the demurrer to the answer was overruled, and a judgment was rendered, denying the prayer for an injunction, and dismissing the petition.

Lexington is a city of the second class, with a population of more than 40,000, and has adopted the commission form of government. Cities of the second class are given authority to issue bonds by section 3069, Kentucky Statutes, which is as follows:

"The general council shall not expend any money in excess of the amount annually levied, collected or appropriated for any special object: Provided, if, in any year, the general council shall deem it necessary to incur any indebtedness, the payment of which cannot be met without exceeding the income and revenue provided for the city for that particular year, it shall, by ordinance, order an election by the qualified electors of the city to be held, to determine whether such indebtedness shall be incurred. Such ordinance shall specify the amount of indebtedness proposed to be incurred, the purpose or purposes of the same, and the amount of money necessary to be raised annually by taxation for an interest and sinking fund, as herein provided. Such ordinance shall be published for at least two weeks just preceding the election in the official newspaper in and for such city, or by posting written or printed copies thereof at three or more public places in such city, if there be no such official newspaper. Upon filing by the city of a certified copy of an ordinance ordering such an election with the county clerk of the county in which such city is located, thirty days prior to any regular election, it shall be the duty of the county clerk to cause to be printed upon the ballots, to be used in the city precincts of such county at such election, the question of the issuance of bonds by said city as proposed by such ordinance. The expenses thereof shall be paid as other election expenses are paid. The election shall be held in the manner provided by general law for submitting public measures to a vote of the people, and shall be held at the same time and place, and in the same manner, and by the same officers as the regular election of that year. The votes on said question shall be canvassed and certified by the election officers in the same manner as votes cast in the regular election. It shall be the duty of the county board of election commissioners to canvass the returns of the election on said question, and certify the result thereof at the same time and in the same manner as the returns of the regular election.

"If, upon a canvass of the votes cast at such election, it appears that two-thirds of all the qualified voters of said city, voting on said question, shall have voted in favor of incurring such indebtedness, the general council may incur such indebtedness and issue bonds of the city in evidence thereof, and it shall be the duty of the general council to pass an ordinance providing for the mode of creating such indebtedness and of paying the same. But such indebtedness shall not, in any event, exceed the limit provided in the Constitution for cities of the second class. In such ordinances provision shall be made for the levy and collection of an annual tax upon all real and personal property subject to taxation within such city, sufficient to pay the interest on such indebtedness as it falls due, and also to constitute a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof, within a period of not more than forty years from the time of contracting the same. It shall be the duty of the general council in each year thereafter, at the time at which other taxes are levied and collected, to levy and collect a tax sufficient for such purpose, in addition to the taxes by this chapter authorized to be levied. Such tax, when collected, shall be kept in the treasury as a separate fund, to be inviolably appropriated to the payment of the principal and interest of such indebtedness. Any member of the general council who shall knowingly vote for any appropriation of money, or for the making of any contract in violation of this act, or any officer of the city who shall knowingly do any act to impose upon the city any pecuniary liability in excess of the authority in this act limited, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, or imprisonment in the county jail not less than one month nor more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

On September 2, 1919, there was introduced Ordinance No. 1611—

"providing for submitting to the qualified voters of the city of Lexington the proposition of incurring an indebtedness of $500,000, and issuing bonds of the city therefor, to provide funds for the purpose of the purchase of a site, or sites, and the erection of a building, or buildings thereon, for the purpose of being used as a city hall, an auditorium or for other public purposes."

This ordinance, in its completed form, remained on file for the period of one week. On September 9, 1919, it was passed by the unanimous vote of the commissioners, and was approved by W. H. McCorkle, the vice mayor; the regular mayor being so ill that he was unable to attend to business. It was then published in the official newspaper. The ordinance specified the amount of indebtedness proposed to be incurred, the purpose of same, and the amount of money necessary to be raised annually by taxation for an interest and sinking fund. It further provided for the issuing of bonds and the taking of the sense of the voters thereon at the regular election on November 4, 1919. On October 17, 1919, the ordinance was published in the Lexington Leader, the official newspaper of the city, and in each issue of the paper from said date to November 3, 1919, inclusive. A certified copy of the ordinance was delivered to the county clerk of Fayette county 30 days prior to the election. On motion of the city an order was entered by the Fayette county court on September 23, 1919, ordering and directing the sheriff of said county to open a poll at each voting precinct in the city at the regular election to be held on November 4, 1919, for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the voters of said city on the issuing of said bonds, and to advertise said election for at least 15 days in some daily newspaper of the city, and also by printed handbills posted in one or more conspicuous places at each precinct of the city and at the courthouse door. The question was placed on the ballot in proper form and duly submitted at the November election. The vote in the affirmative was 2,416, while the vote in the negative was only 851. On December 8, 1919, the board of commissioners enacted Ordinance No. 1643, providing for the incurring of the indebtedness and the issuing of the bonds. This ordinance further provided for the levy and collection of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, and provide a sinking fund for their retirement as they became due. This ordinance remained on file for one week for public inspection before its final passage. It was then passed by the unanimous vote of the board of commissioners, was approved by the mayor, was published in the official newspaper, and took effect on December 15, 1919.

On August 29, 1919, there was introduced Ordinance No. 1606—

"providing for submitting to the qualified voters of the city of Lexington the proposition of incurring an indebtedness of $300,000, and issuing bonds of the city therefor, to provide funds for the purpose of defraying the expenses and costs of extending Vine street from Limestone street to Hanover avenue, and Short street from Wilson street to Russell avenue, and construct a subway at the intersection of West High street with the railroad of the Southern Railway System."

The ordinance in its completed form remained on file one week for public inspection, and was passed by unanimous vote of the commissioners on September 5, 1919. It was then approved by the vice mayor, the mayor being too ill to attend to business, and was published in the Lexington Leader, the official newspaper of the city. This ordinance also specified the amount of indebtedness proposed to be incurred, the purpose of same, and the amount of money necessary to be raised annually by taxation for interest and sinking fund. It further provided for taking the sense of the voters thereon at the regular election to be held in November. Thereafter the same steps were taken with reference to this ordinance as were taken with reference to Ordinance No. 1611. The question of incurring the indebtedness and issuing the bonds was submitted in proper form to the voters at the regular November election. The vote in the affirmative was 2,525, while the vote in the negative was 904. On December 8, 1919, there was introduced Ordinance No. 1642, authorizing the issue of the bonds. This ordinance remained on file for one week for public inspection in its completed form, and was passed by unanimous vote of the commissioners on December 5, 1919. It was then approved by the mayor and published in the official newspaper as required by law. This ordinance levied an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest and principal as the bonds became due.

On August 28, 1919, the board of education of the city of Lexington passed a resolution setting forth the necessity of issuing bonds in the sum of $400,000 for the purchase of sites, the erection and equipment of new school buildings, and for the improvement of the buildings already in use, and asked the board of commissioners to adopt the necessary ordinances for the purpose of submitting to the qualified voters of the city of Lexington at the regular election to be held on November 4, 1919, the question of incurring said indebtedness and issuing said bonds. Pursuant to the resolution of the board of education, there was introduced on August 29, 1919, Ordinance No. 1608—

"providing for submitting to the qualified voters of the city of Lexington the question of incurring an indebtedness of $400,000 and issuing bonds of the city therefor, bearing five per centum interest per annum, payable semi-annually, to provide funds for the proper accommodation of the schools of said city, to acquire sites for school buildings, to erect a new junior high school building for white children, a high school building for negro children, and to improve, remodel and make additions to other public schools in said city and to enlarge the sites thereof."

This ordinance remained on file in its completed form for one week, and was passed by the unanimous vote of the commissioners on September 5, 1919. It was then approved by the vice mayor, the mayor being ill and unable to attend to business, and was published in the official newspaper as required by law. This ordinance specified the amount of indebtedness proposed to be incurred, the purpose of same, and the amount of money necessary to be raised annually by taxation for an interest and sinking fund. It also provided for taking the sense of the voters thereon at the regular election to be held on November 4, 1919. The question was duly submitted to the voters at that election. The vote in favor of the proposition was 8,003, and the vote against the proposition, 1,778. On December 8, 1919, there was introduced Ordinance No. 1,641, authorizing the issue of the bonds and providing for the levy of an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest thereon and the principal thereof as the bonds became due. This ordinance in its completed form remained on file for one week for public inspection. It was passed on December 15, 1919, by the unanimous vote of the commissioners. It was then approved by the mayor and published in the official newspaper as required by law.

statement that each of the bond issues received the assent of more than two-thirds of those voting on the question, and under the repeated decisions of this court this was all that was necessary in order to meet the requirement of section 157 of the Constitution, declaring that no municipality shall become indebted in any year beyond the income and revenue for such year, without the assent of two-thirds of the voters at an election to be held for that purpose. Logan, etc., v. Gilbert, 151 Ky. 659, 152 S. W. 778; Fowler v. City of Oakdale, 158 Ky. 603, 166 S. W. 195; City of Marion v. Haynes, 157 Ky. 687, 164 S. W. 79.

[2] 2. Section 158 of the Constitution provides in substance that a city of the second class, having a population of more than 15,000, cannot incur an indebtedness, including existing indebtedness, in excess of 10 per centum of the value of the taxable property therein, to be estimated by the assessment next before the last assessment previous to the incurring of the indebtedness. Aside from a floating indebtedness of $108,761.46, which was provided for in the 1920 levy, the entire indebtedness of the city is $1,464,336.52. The proposed indebtedness herein involved is $1,200,000 in addition to a bond issue of $75,000 for a memorial building, the validity of which is not now before us. According to the 1918 assessment, which is controlling in these cases, the total value of the taxable property in the city was $33,140,954. It is therefore apparent that the indebtedness proposed to be incurred, together with the existing indebtedness of the city, will not exceed 10 per centum of that amount.

"The mayor shall preside at meetings of the board. He shall have no veto power. But each resolution, measure or ordinance shall be signed by him, or by two commissioners, and recorded before it shall take effect.

"The board of commissioners shall, at the beginning of its term of office elect, by a majority of all its members, one commissioner to act as mayor pro tem.; and the commissioner so chosen shall be invested with all the powers and shall perform all the duties of the mayor, in the event of his absence from the city or his inability to attend to the duties of his office."

In view of the requirement that each resolution, measure, or ordinance shall be signed by the mayor, or by two commissioners, it is insisted that it was essential to the validity of the ordinances signed by the mayor pro tem. that they should have been signed by another commissioner. With this contention we cannot agree. The statute invests the mayor pro tem. with all the powers of the mayor, if the latter is absent from the city or unable to attend to the duties of his office. Hence, when the mayor pro tem. approves an ordinance, he does so, not as a commissioner, but as mayor, and his approval has the same effect as the approval of the ordinance by the mayor himself. It is admitted that at a regular meeting of the board of commissioners held on January 7, 1918, W. H. McCorkle, a commissioner, was duly and regularly elected vice mayor, or mayor pro tem., for the years 1918 and 1919. It further appears that at the time he approved the ordinances in question the mayor was suffering from a serious illness, which prevented him from attending to the duties of his office, and from which he subsequently died. Under these circumstances, McCorkle, as vice mayor, or mayor pro tem., had the right to approve the ordinances, and the approval of another commissioner was not necessary.

[4] 4. Another contention is that the election was invalid, because the sheriff did not advertise the election, as required by the orders of the county court. There is no statute requiring the sheriff to advertise the election. The power to order the election is conferred upon the general council, or the board of commissioners, where the commission form of government has been adopted. Section 3069 and subsection 12, section 3235c, Kentucky Statutes. The only advertisement required is the publication of the ordinance itself for at least two weeks just preceding the election in the official newspaper, or by posting written or printed copies thereof at three or more public places in the city, if there be no such official newspaper. Section 3069, Kentucky Statutes. The ordinances ordering the elections in question were each published in the official newspaper from October 17th to November 3d, inclusive, or for a period of more than two weeks just preceding the election. That being true, the elections were properly advertised, and the failure of the sheriff to advertise them in nowise affected their validity.

[5] 5. Section 3094, Kentucky Statutes, confers upon the general council of cities of the second class, and hence upon the board of commissioners where the commission form of government has been adopted (subsection 12, section 3235c, Kentucky Statutes)—

"exclusive control and power over the streets, roadways, sidewalks, alleys, landings, wharves, public grounds and highways of the city; to establish, open, alter, widen, extend, close, grade, pave, repave, clean and keep in repair the same."

In view of the broad authority thus conferred, it cannot be doubted that the board of commissioners has the power to extend the streets of the city, and to construct subways under, or viaducts over, railroad tracts within the city, wherever it deems it necessary for the safety and convenience of the public, as well as the consequent power to levy taxes and incur indebtedness for such improvements. 19 R. O. L. p. 782; Argen-

[6] G. Subsection 16, section 3058, Kentucky Statutes, confers upon the general council of cities of the second class, and hence upon the board of commissioners where the commission form of government has been adopted, the power—"to purchase, rent or lease, within the limits of the city or elsewhere, any real or personal property for the use of the city, and to control, manage, improve, sell, lease or otherwise dispose of the same, for such purposes and considerations as they may deem proper for the public welfare."

Clearly the power to purchase and improve real estate for such purposes and considerations as the board of commissioners may deem proper for the public welfare is very broad and comprehensive, and carried with it full authority to purchase a site and erect thereon a suitable building to house the municipal offices, and for use as a commodious and convenient auditorium in which the citizens may exercise their right of assembling and discussing public affairs, and this power carries with it as a necessary incident the further power to incur indebtedness and levy taxes for such purpose. Whelock v. City of Lowell, 196 Mass. 220, 81 N. E. 977, 124 Am. St. Rep. 543, 12 Ann. Cas. 1109; Bates v. Bassett, 60 Vt. 530, 15 Atl. 200, 1 L. R. A. 166; Greeley v. People, 60 Ill. 19; Bell v. Rep. 243; 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 30.

On the whole, we perceive no reason why the chancellor's ruling in each case should not be sustained.

Judgment affirmed in each case.

SHADRACK v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF MADISONVILLE GRADED COMMON SCHOOL DIST.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 4, 1920.)

Schools and school districts \Leftrightarrow 46—School districts embracing Madisonville subject to act for consolidation of government.

The white graded school district embracing Madisonville and some contiguous territory, and the colored common school district, embracing the same, and certain other territory, held subject to act 1920 relative to school districts embracing cities of the fourth class and any contiguous territory, whereby, though the white and colored schools may be separately maintained, they are to be under the supervision and government of one board of education; such districts not being within any exception of section 18.

From Circuit Court, Hopkins County.

Suit for injunction by J. S. Shadrack against the Board of Trustees of the Madisonville Graded Common School District. Injunction refused, and plaintiff moves in Court of Appeals to grant the injunction. Motion sustained.

H. F. S. Bailey, of Madisonville, for plaintiff.

Laffoon & Waddill, of Madisonville, for defendants.

CARROLL, C. J. Madisonville is a city of the fourth class, and many years ago there was established, under the general law found in sections 4464-4500 of the Kentucky Statutes, a white graded school district, embracing all of the city, as well as some contiguous outlying territory, and from that time until now there has been conducted, under the general law, a white graded common school district under the control of a board of trustees. Many years ago there was also created a colored common school district, embracing the city of Madisonville and contiguous outlying territory, exceeding the limits of the white graded school district. This colored common school district has for some years been under the control of the board of education of Hopkins county, conducted under the general laws of the state in the same manner as other common school districts.

It will thus be seen that these two districts, all embracing the same territory, except to the extent that the colored district outside of the city takes in more territory than the white district, have been and are being conducted under the general laws of the state by separate boards; the white school being supported by a tax on the property of the white people within the graded school district, supplemented by state aid, and the colored school being supported by a tax on the property of the colored people within the colored district, supplemented by state aid, as well as funds appropriated for the use of the school by the county board of education.

In 1920 the Legislature passed an act (Acts 1920, c. 14), the title of which reads:

"An act defining boundaries for school districts embracing cities of the fourth class, and providing systems of schools in such districts, and creating boards of education for such districts, providing for election thereof, defining their powers and duties, and repealing all laws in conflict therewith."

The first section of this act provides that:

"Each city of the fourth class in this state, together with the territory now within its limits, including any territory which has heretofore been added for school purposes outside the limits of said city and any territory which may be in the future included by any change in the limits of such cities, or such territory as may be added in the manner as hereinafter set out in section 31, shall be and constitute a single school district, and the supervision and government of common schools and common school property therein shall be vested in a board of six trustees to be called and known as the board of education of —, Kentucky.

* * * Such board of education shall be a body corporate and shall have power, by and in said name, to sue and be sued, contract and be contracted with, purchase, receive, hold and sell property, issue its bonds, and do all things necessary to accomplish the purpose for the attainment of which said school district is organized, and succeed to all the property, property rights and privileges of whatever kind or nature granted and belonging to any previous corporation, board of education, or school district in said city or in which said city was embraced, or officers thereof authorized or empowered by any enactment of the General Assembly of the state to do anything in reference to the public education provided that all pending suits to which any such previous corporation, board of education, or school district or officers thereof, as a party may be prosecuted to an end in the name of such party. The titles to property previously granted to such city by the United States or this state for common school purposes and the title to all school lands and other property of every kind shall be vested in the board of education created by this act."

Section 2 provides in part that:

"Every such board of education shall have general and supervising control, government and management of the public schools, including kindergartens, night and normal schools, vocational and high schools as hereinafter provided, and public school property in such city, with the right to use said property to promote public education in such ways as it may deem necessary and proper; shall exercise generally all powers in the administration of the public school system therein, appoint such officers, agents and employees as it may deem necessary and proper and fix their compensation and term of office."

Sections 3 to 17, inclusive, and sections 19 to 31, inclusive, relate to matters not pertinent in the consideration of the questions raised in this case. Section 18 reads:

"The board of education shall provide, maintain and support separate schools and provide for the education of all colored children who are bona fide residents of said district and entitled to free tuition in the common schools. Said colored schools or children shall be entitled to the same benefits, be governed and controlled by the same rules and regulations and be subject to the same restrictions as the school herein provided for white children: Provided, however, that where any city of the fourth class has heretofore organized a system of free graded schools for the education of both white and colored children of said cities under and by virtue of the charter of cities of the fourth class, and managed and controlled by the board of education, and has, by ordinance, passed by its general council, separated said systems of graded free schools into graded, free, white common school for the white people of said district and into a graded, free, colored common school for the colored people of said district; or where such separate schools have existed under the general laws of the state of Kentucky or special acts under separate boards, or where the board of council of any district embracing a fourth class city shall, by ordinance, provide for a separate system of schools under this law under different boards said schools shall be governed and controlled—the white schools by a white board of education, and the colored school by a colored board of education, to be elected on separate ballots as provided under section seven of this act. But where such provision is not made by ordinance of the board of council, or where such separate boards have not heretofore existed, both of said systems of schools shall be under one board of education. In cities or districts coming under the provisions of this act, where two boards of education, white and colored, have been maintained, the board of council of the city embraced in such districts may by ordinance abolish one of said boards and by its ordinance provide for one board of education, to be elected and qualified as is herein provided, and in that event there shall be but one board of education in such district."

Section 32 reads:

"The general school laws of this state and all laws and parts of laws applicable to the general system of public schools in cities of the fourth class not inconsistent herewith shall be and remain in full force and effect in such city or district, and all laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

This act of 1920, by virtue of an emergency clause, went into effect on March 13, 1920, and on May 12, 1920, the plaintiff, Shadrack, brought this suit in the Hopkins circuit court against the defendants, the board of trustees of the Madisonville graded common school district, alleging in his petition that he was a citizen and taxpayer in the city of Madisonville; that the Madisonville graded common school district was established by a vote of the white voters of the city, and thereafter enlarged so as to take in contiguous outlying territory; that the city did not establish or maintain a graded school or any school under the provisions of its charter, either for white or colored people; that the colored school is in a colored district embracing the city and contiguous territory larger than the white district, and is a common school district under the control of the county board of education; that there are in the white district 865 children within school years and in the colored district 412 colored children within school years; that the value of the taxable property of the colored people in the colored district is $71,693, and the value of the taxable property of the white people in the white district is $2,434,867; that the white school district has erected, by means of a bonded indebtedness, a school building, which bonded indebtedness is yet unpaid. He further averred that the trustees of the white school are refusing to recognize or act under the act of 1920, and are ignoring the provisions of this act by levying and collecting taxes and conducting the white school in the same manner that it was conducted before the act of 1920 went into effect. He prayed that they be compelled, by injunction, to recognize the validity of the act of 1920, and proceed thereunder.

The lower court refused to grant the injunction prayed for, upon the ground that the act of 1920 was not applicable to either of these districts, and the case comes before me on a motion to grant the injunction refused by the judge of the lower court. It was the manifest purpose of the act of 1920 to place the school system, both white and colored in cities of the fourth class, under the control of the board of education provided for in section 1 of the act. The result of this change would be to put the white graded school, now under the control of the board of trustees, under the control of the new board of education, and to put the colored common school now under the control of the county board of education under the control of the new board of education.

If these two school districts were made into one, as provided in the act of 1920, the further result would be that all the taxes collected in the district would be appropriated to the maintenance of both the white and colored schools in proportion to the number of white and colored school children, except that the tax levy for the purpose of paying the bonded indebtedness of the white graded school district would be appropriated to that purpose. In the cities of the first, second, and third class, the scheme set forth in the act of 1920 has been in operation for some years, and it was the purpose of the Legislature in this new act to place the school systems in cities of the fourth class on the same general basis as the school system in the cities of first, second, and third class.

With the wisdom of this legislation we have nothing to do, although we might say in passing that the plan proposed to be applied to cities of the fourth class has worked well in cities of the first, second, and third class, in which the number of colored school children as compared to the number of white school children, and the value of the property owned by the colored people in proportion to the value of that owned by the white people, is about the same as it is in the city of Madisonville.

It is insisted by counsel for defendants that, as the lines of the districts outside of the city do not coincide, it would create much confusion if the two districts were combined into one and put in charge of one board; but we do not regard as serious the circumstance that the lines of the colored district outside of the city take in more territory than is embraced in the white school district, because the lines of the colored district outside of the city can be reduced to correspond with the lines of the white district, or the lines of the white district can be extended to coincide with the lines of the colored district, and either one of these plans may be under the act and should be adopted.

This brings me to a consideration of the question whether the act of 1920 is applicable to the conditions existing in the city of Madisonville. The act, with the exception of section 18, which is somewhat obscure, seems to afford a practicable and workable scheme under which colored and white schools may be separately maintained, yet be under the control and management of one board, although it is likely that when certain sections or provisions of the act are attempted to be applied to states of fact that may come upon, difference of opinion as to their meaning may arise. But this is a condition that comes up frequently and must be dealt with as it appears. It seems to have been the purpose of section 18 to except from the operation of this act certain cities of the fourth class in which the conditions described in the section exist, or rather to leave it optional with certain cities to accept the provisions of the act, or to continue schools under the system in force before this act was adopted.

We doubt very much if it would be competent for the Legislature, in an act dealing with any class of cities, or the conditions existing in any class, to arbitrarily except from the operation of the act some cities in the class dealt with, although it has been held that it may be left to the people in the cities of a class to put in effect or not, as they think proper, the legislation applicable to all the cities of the class. An example of this kind of legislation is found in the act providing for a commission form of government. This act was upheld in Bryan v. Voss, 143 Ky. 422, 136 S. W. 884, the court saying in effect that it was permissible for the Legislature to enact a law applicable to a class of cities, but leave to each city in the class the option of determining for itself whether it would adopt the act or continue to manage its affairs under the laws in force previous to the adoption of the act.

Under the authority of this case, it seems that it would be competent for the Legislature to enact a law applicable to all the cities in a named class, giving to each city, however, the right to elect for itself whether it would or would not adopt the provisions of the act, and this apparently is what was attempted to be done in section 18. It is provided in this section:

"That where any city of the fourth class has heretofore organized a system of free graded schools for the education of both white and colored children of said cities under and by virtue of the charter of cities of the fourth class, and managed and controlled by the board of education, and has, by ordinance, passed by its general council, separated said system of graded free schools into graded, free, white common school for the white people of said district and into a graded, free, colored common school for the colored people of said district; * * * said schools shall be governed and controlled—the white schools by a white board of education, and the colored school by a colored board of education, to be elected on separate ballots as provided under section 7 of this act."

It is manifest that this exception does not apply to Madisonville, because neither the white nor colored schools in that city were organized under or have operated under the charter of the city or ordinances adopted by the board of council. The third exception mentioned in the section exists:

"Where the board of council of any district embracing a fourth class city shall, by ordinance, provide for a separate system of schools under this law under different boards."

But this exception is plainly not applicable, because the board of council of the city of Madisonville has never undertaken by ordinance or otherwise to organize, regulate, or control either the white or colored schools.

The third exception in this section relates to "such separate schools [as] have existed under the general laws of the state of Kentucky or special acts under separate boards." But this exception is not applicable because, as shown in other parts of section 18, it contemplates the existence of separate schools under separate boards, either of which boards the council might abolish and make provision for one board to have charge of both schools. We think this exception must be limited to separate schools operating under boards appointed by the council or elected under ordinances, and that it can have no application to a state of case such as that existing in the city of Madisonville, where the council had nothing whatever to do with the creation of the boards, or any control over them, or the schools in their charge.

I am therefore of the opinion that the act of 1920 is applicable to these districts, and that the board of trustees of the white graded school must operate under it. Therefore the motion to grant the injunction refused by Judge Henderson is sustained. The whole court, except Judge CLARKE, who was absent, considered this matter with me, and concur in what has been written and the conclusion reached.

WHITE SEWING MACH. CO. v. SMITH et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 4, 1920.)

1. Contracts ~~§~~94(5)—Persons signing contract cannot rely blindly upon the statements of the other party.

Persons signing contract cannot rely upon the statements of the other party as to its contents and, failing to read the papers, void the contract, unless representations of the other party were not only untrue, but made under such circumstances as would be reasonably calculated to deceive one while exercising ordinary care for his own protection.

2. Evidence ~~§~~442(1)—Parol evidence admissible when written contract is incomplete.

Where agreement is one and entire, and a part only is reduced to writing, resort to parol evidence may be had to prove the residue, providing the writing only purports to express part of the contract, or is expressed in such incomplete terms as renders parol evidence necessary to explain what is per se unintelligible, and such evidence is not inconsistent with the terms of the writing.

3. Reformation of instruments ~~§~~45(1)—Mistake to be established by clear and convincing evidence.

To entitle one to a reformation of a written instrument upon the ground of mistake, the mistake must be established by clear and convincing evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Martin County.

Action by the White Sewing Machine Company against C. Smith and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff moves for an appeal. Motion for appeal sustained, appeal granted, and judgment reversed.

Vaughan & Howes, of Paintsville, for appellant.

QUIN, J. By its petition in this action appellant sought judgment in the sum of $190.50, as the balance due on 10 sewing machines sold to the appellee Smith. The other appellees were made parties by reason of the execution by them of a bond to appellant, to the effect that Smith would perform the obligations of his contract incident to the purchase of these machines.

After denying the allegations of the petition, it was alleged in the answer as amended: (a) That the machines were purchased on the representation they were superior in workmanship, material, and quality to another make of machine; (b) the writing sued on was intended as an order merely, and not as a contract, and he did not know the contents thereof at the time he signed the paper; he was almost blind, could not read, and relied on the statement of the agent as to its contents, which were misrepresented to him; (c) the machines were purchased under a verbal agreement subsequently entered into, by the terms of which he was given the privilege of returning the machines if they failed to give satisfaction. Under this agreement the shipment was billed to Kermit, W. Va. There was a verdict for $9.50 by a jury in favor of appellee, being the full amount of his counterclaim, less the amount sued for. By the counterclaim Smith asked judgment in the sum of $200, which he says he would have made had the machines been as represented.

The proof as to the alleged verbal contract is not convincing, nor is the fact that the consignment was delivered at Kermit instead of Peach Orchard, as provided in the contract, satisfactorily explained by appellant. The allegation as to the condition of appellee's eyes is not borne out by the testimony. Smith admits he can read. He says the agent misread what he calls the "fine print" in the contract. Just what this consists of is not made clear by the record; the contract is not filed; a typewritten copy only appears; and the so-called fine print is not indicated. The contract is very simple, with no warranties or representations and contains the following clause:

"This order is given subject to approval of White Sewing Machine Co., and if accepted or filled in full or in part, to be settled for at the prices and terms above set forth. There is no understanding or agreement of any nature whatsoever between your company and the undersigned as to these machines except such as is embraced in this order which contains all the terms and conditions upon which the same is given."

The alleged misrepresentation is not made clear in Smith's testimony. If misleading, it must have been in its exclusions rather than its contents. Smith says the contract under which the machines were shipped was made at a subsequent date.

[1] As said by the Supreme Court in Upton v. Tribilcock, 91 U. S. 45, 23 L. E. 203:

"It will not do for a man to enter into a contract, and, when called upon to respond to its obligations, to say that he did not read it when he signed it, or did not know what it contained. If this were permitted, contracts would not be worth the paper on which they are written. But such is not the law. A contractor must stand by the words of his contract; and, if he will not read what he signs, he alone is responsible for his omission."

The court, however, recognizes that a different rule prevails when the party was misled as to the nature of the paper, and signed it under circumstances amounting to fraud and deceit. The same rule has been affirmed in many decisions of this court. For example in United Talking Machine Co. v. Metcalfe, 174 Ky. 132, 191 S. W. 883, we said:

"One sui juris and in possession of his faculties, contracting at arm's length, and who is able to read and write, is not permitted by the law to rely exclusively upon the statements of the other contracting party as to the contents of a writing which the former signs. There must be something said or done by the party charged with the fraud which would be reasonably calculated to disarm or deceive one of ordinary prudence and to prevent him from using such diligence as an ordinarily prudent man would use in the execution of a contract under the same or similar circumstances. When, therefore, the law speaks of misrepresentations by the party charged with the fraud, it means that the representations must have been, not only untrue, but also made under such circumstances as would be reasonably calculated to deceive one while exercising ordinary care for his own protection."

To same effect, see Western Mfg. Co. v. Cotton & Long, 126 Ky. 749, 104 S. W. 758, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1130, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 427; Rice v. Pulliam, 141 Ky. 10, 131 S. W. 1053; J. I. Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Mattingly, 142 Ky. 581, 134 S. W. 1131; Crawford & Gatlin v. M. Livingston & Co., 153 Ky. 58, 154 S. W. 407, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 640; Castleman-Blakemore Co. v. Pickrell & Craig Co., 163 Ky. 750, 174 S. W. 749; Fairbanks-Morse Co. v. Manning & Combs, 164 Ky. 478, 175 S. W. 1000; United Talking Machine Co. v. Metcalf, 164 Ky. 258, 175 S. W. 357.

[2] Where the agreement is one and entire and a part only is reduced to writing, resort to parol evidence may be had to prove the residue. This rule, however, is restricted in its application to cases where the writing only purports to express part of the contract, or is expressed in such incomplete terms as renders parol evidence necessary to explain what is per se unintelligible, and said evidence is not inconsistent with the terms of the writing. Parol contemporaneous evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument. Greenleaf on Evidence, § 275.

[3] Smith asks that, in the event the writing referred to is held to be the contract, it be reformed so as to express the agreement according to his version. To entitle one to this relief the evidence by which the alleged mistake is sought to be established must be clear and convincing. There is no such evidence here.

Appellees failed by their testimony to manifest such fraud or misrepresentation on the part of appellant's agents as to relieve them of liability. The same conclusion would result were we to accept Smith's theory of the later verbal agreement. His proof wholly fails him here. There is no evidence of any defective workmanship or materials. A few of those who purchased the machines had some trouble in sewing heavy goods, and they complained of the thread breaking. Each complaint was traceable to the inexperience of the operator, especially in the use of certain attachments. All of this is satisfactorily accounted for and made plain by a witness for the company in his testimony and by a demonstration in open court before the jury on one of the machines claimed to have been defective.

Nor did Smith offer to return any of the machines until a short time before this suit was filed. It is rather significant that after he claims to have learned the machines were not as represented and were not giving satisfaction Smith sent the company a remittance on account.

Looking at the case from every angle, it is clear that appellant was entitled to a directed verdict, and upon a retrial, the evidence being substantially the same, the jury should be so instructed.

The motion for an appeal is sustained, the appeal granted, and judgment reversed for further proceedings consistent herewith.

HUNGATE v. HINES, Director General of Railroads.

1. Railroads §398(1)—Evidence held insufficient to show license to use tracks.

In a pedestrian's action for injuries while attempting to cross railroad tracks, evidence held insufficient to establish license to use tracks at place in question, so that he was a trespasser, if place of injury was not in public street or sidewalk which lay along its margin.

2. Railroads §369(3)—Pedestrian held a trespasser not entitled to lookout and signal.

Where a pedestrian, when struck by a railroad's locomotive, was several feet from public street, and at a place on tracks where he had no right to be, and was therefore a trespasser, railroad company did not owe him duty to maintain lookout or to signal.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by W. B. Hungate against Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Black and J. F. Vanarsdell, both of Harrodsburg, for appellant.

M. H. Gaither, of Harrodsburg, and Humphrey Crawford, of Louisville, for appellee.

SAMPSON, J. On November 20, 1918, William B. Hungate, while attempting to cross the tracks of the Southern Railway Company in the town of Harrodsburg, was struck by an engine and suffered a very painful injury. He brought this action to recover damages alleging that the railway company and its servants in charge of the engine were guilty of negligence in failing to sound a warning signal on the approach of the train to the street crossing; and further that the injury happened at a place on the tracks of the railroad habitually used by the public as a thoroughfare, and that all pedestrians traveling in that locality constantly and as a matter of right used the tracks of the railroad at that point as a passway with the knowledge and acquiescence of the railway company, and that this had continued for many years. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiff, Hungate, the court sustained the motion of the railroad company for a directed verdict in its favor, and Hungate appeals.

The accident happened on the railroad track near Office street and within about a hundred yards of the depot of the railway company, in the city of Harrodsburg. According to the evidence of the plaintiff, he was traveling along a path parallel with the railroad track until he came near Office street which runs at right angles with the railroad. Here he glanced back over the railroad track to see if a train was coming, and not seeing any he advanced, crossing Office street to the pavement on the other side, where he talked to an acquaintance and then started diagonally across the railroad track, and just as he stepped upon the ends of the ties the engine struck him, knocking him some 20 feet and inflicting the injuries aforesaid.

It is appellant's contention that he had barely crossed the street and was entering on the railroad track at a point only a few feet beyond said street when he was struck, but that the point at which he was struck was one over which the public habitually traveled in going to and from points of public interest in that vicinity with the knowledge and acquiescence of the railway company, and that the railway company as a consequence owed to him as a licensee a lookout duty and was under obligation of sounding a warning signal of the approach of the engine to that point.

The only evidence on the subject of the user of the tracks by the public is the following taken from the testimony of appellant:

"Q. How far were you from the pike, this pike, where you were hit? A. It would not be so very far from the pike, I reckon. You know the pike is tolerably close to the railroad; that is about the edge of the pike.

"Q. Did anybody holla to you? A. Not as I heard; I never heard anybody.

"Q. Anybody call anything to you? A. No, sir.

"Q. The place where you were hurt is a place that is used by everybody that travels up and down there? (Objection; objection overruled.) A. I think so; yes, sir.

"Q. At the point where you were hurt, I will ask you to tell the jury whether or not that place is commonly used by the public? A. I have seen many a one use.

"Q. Is there a path on each side of the railroad there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Have you seen people passing there at that place? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. To what extent? A. I have seen a heap of them."

[1, 2] No effort was made to show that the place of the injury was within the corporate limits of Harrodsburg nor that it was and is a thickly populated community. The evidence above quoted is wholly insufficient to establish a license on the part of the appellant to use the tracks at the place in question, and he was therefore a trespasser if the place of injury was not in the public street or sidewalk which lay along its margin. From part of the evidence of appellant it vaguely appears that he turned onto the railroad track very near the margin of the street, if not exactly at it; while other parts of his evidence make it appear that he was several feet from the street at the time he attempted to cross the railroad tracks. In fact, he practically admits that he was not on the public street or walkway of the street at the time of the injury, but was some feet therefrom. Had he been on the street or on the sidewalk near the place where he was injured, the evidence would have entitled him to go to the jury; but as he was several feet from the street and at a place on the railroad tracks where he had no right to be, and therefore a trespasser, the railroad company did not owe him the duty of maintaining a lookout nor of sounding a whistle or bell, because his presence on the track at that point was not to be anticipated.

While the case is a close one upon the facts, we are of opinion that the trial court did not err to the prejudice of appellant in sustaining the motion of the railroad company for a directed verdict at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

HUNT et al. v. SUTTON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 1, 1920.)

Easements §58(3)—Owner of servient estate not entitled to obstruct way with gates.

Where plaintiff had a right of way over defendants' lands which had existed without gates for more than the prescriptive period, defendants as owners of servient estate are not entitled to obstruct the way with gates which would lessen plaintiff's use thereof, particularly where the gates were not placed at the termini but were on other portions of the way.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Christian County.

Suit by W. H. Sutton against W. O. Hunt and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Breathitt & Allensworth, of Hopkinsville, for appellants.

Thomas P. Cook, of Hopkinsville, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the Christian circuit court whereby the appellants, W. O. and Alice M. Hunt, at the suit of the appellee, W. H. Sutton, were compelled by injunction to remove a gate from a passway running through their land and claimed as of right by the appellee, and perpetually restrained from erecting other gates across the same.

The appellee owns and resides upon a hundred acre tract of land in Christian county near Kelley, a station of the railroad of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and about a half mile from a turnpike running from Hopkinsville to Madisonville. Kelley is appellee's nearest railway station, likewise his voting place; and there is located the church attended by himself and family and also the district common school attended by his children. To reach Kelley, Hopkinsville, the county seat of Christian county, or any other place to which appellee could go by any sort of conveyance from his home, his only way or route is by the passway over appellants' land in question to the Hopkinsville and Madisonville turnpike; thence over same to the desired destination. The land of appellants, consisting of 480 acres, adjoins that of appellee on the north and east and lies between it and the turnpike.

The lands now owned by appellants and appellee were once parts of a large tract owned by one John Davis, who 40 or 50 years ago by proper deeds then executed conveyed portions thereof to certain of his sons. To one of the sons, J. Webber Davis, was conveyed the tract now belonging to appellants. To another, Tom Davis, the tract now belonging to appellee; the conveyance to Tom being the first made. By successive sales and mesne conveyances the titles to the lands in question passed to and became vested in the present owners, respectively. When the land now owned by appellee was conveyed Tom Davis by his father, John Davis, the latter gave him the passway leading from the land over and through the land then owned by him (John Davis), but later conveyed J. Webber Davis and not the property of appellants, to the Hopkinsville and Madisonville turnpike. No mention of the passway was made in the deed from John Davis to Tom Davis; but, though the grant thereof was by parol, it was undoubtedly made and the passway then defined and established substantially as it now runs and has since continuously existed.

It is alleged in the petition that the passway furnished the only way of getting from and to the land and residence of appellee, and that he and his vendors immediate and remote have had the free and uninterrupted possession, use, and enjoyment thereof, as of right, adversely to appellants and all others for more than 15 years before the institution of the action and, in fact, from and since the date of the deed from John Davis to Tom Davis, which was executed more than 40 years ago; that at no time during such existence of the passway has there been any interference with appellee's or any of his vendors' use thereof, until shortly before the institution of this action, when the appellants without right, maliciously, and with the object of obstructing appellee's use of the passway, erected a gate across the same which is unconnected with a fence on either side and can serve no purpose of effecting an inclosure of any field or other part of appellants' land. It is further alleged in the petition that the gate in question is so heavy of frame and the appliance for fastening it so difficult to move that appellee's little children in traveling the passway going to and from school will have neither the skill nor the strength to open it; and, in addition, that appellants were threatening to further obstruct the passway by the erection of other gates thereon, which threats they would certainly execute unless enjoined by the court from doing so.

Although the averments of the petition are traversed by the answer, considered as a whole the real defense it attempts to interpose is as to appellants' alleged right to erect and maintain gates upon and across the passway in as great number and at such points as they may see proper to place them. Indeed, it is frankly admitted by their able counsel that appellee has established by the weight of the evidence a prescriptive right to the passway as claimed, but argued that such right in the latter is not inconsistent with that of appellants to erect gates across it for the convenient operation of their farm. Looking to the evidence, we find that it overwhelmingly establishes the right of appellee to the passway as an easement, and that such right has existed in him and his vendors for more than 40 years, not merely by reason of his and their adverse user of the passway for more than the period required by the statute of limitations to bar the right of any owner of the servient estate to now deprive him of it, but also because of the express recognition by the servient owners of such right in him and his vendors during all the 40 years of their enjoyment of it. We may therefore, in entering upon the consideration of appellants' claim of right to maintain gates upon the passway, assume that appellee's right to the continued use of the passway by prescription is free of doubt.

This view of the case throws on appellants the burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that such right of appellee to the passway as an easement has not deprived them, as owners of the servient estate, of the right to erect and maintain gates thereon. While the grant of a right of way, whether made by deed or arising by prescription from adverse user for the statutory period, does not necessarily imply that the owner of the land may not maintain gates thereon, in the absence of express reservation of such right, whether he should be permitted to exercise it must depend upon the intention of the parties as shown by the circumstances of the case, the nature and situation of the property subject to the easement, and the manner in which it has been used and occupied. An elaborate discussion of this doctrine, together with a review of the numerous authorities bearing thereon, may be found in the opinion in Raisor v. Lyons, 172 Ky. 314, 189 S. W. 234. In Miller v. Pettit, 127 Ky. 419, 105 S. W. 892, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 337, quoted in the opinion, supra, and the facts of which are much like those of the instant case, we said:

"It has been held that the owner of the land may ordinarily erect gates where the passway enters and where it leaves his land. Maxwell v. McAtee, 9 B. Mon. 20, 48 Am. Dec. 409; Bland v. Smith, 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 34. On the other hand, it has been held that, where the way is acquired by prescription and is used as a lane free from gates during the period necessary for perfecting the title, none can be erected afterward. Frankbouer v. Corder, 127 Ind. 164, 28 N. E. 766; Shivers v. Shivers, 32 N. J. Eq. 578. The passway in question was established in 1843. It has been used since that time as far back as the witnesses can remember. Until recent years there was a fence on both sides of it and no gate except where the passway began at Miller's line. If the right to a passway may be acquired by prescription, we can see no reason why a passway free from gates may not be acquired in like manner; and where the passway is fenced off as a lane, and is used as such for 30 or 40 years, it must be presumed after such a great length of time, when the parties are all dead, that the persons using the passway were the owners of a right of way, as they held it and used it. On the facts shown, the court should have required the defendant to remove the gate at the pike from the passway, and to take the poles out of the branch. He should also adjudge the plaintiff

If the appellants had only attempted to erect gates at the termini of the passway (i. e., where it enters and leaves their land), we might have here had a different question to deal with. But the points selected for erecting them are elsewhere than the termini and at places where they would materially interfere with appellee's proper enjoyment of the passway. In Evans v. Cook, 111 S. W. 326, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 788, another case cited with approval in Raisor v. Lyons, supra, it was held that the appellant was properly convicted under an indictment for obstructing a passway, established as such by 15 years' adverse user, by erecting gates across same at points other than where it entered and left his premises. Testing its facts by the rule announced by the authorities, supra, the instant case does not seem to be one authorizing the erection of the gates contemplated to be maintained across the passway by appellants. According to the evidence, the passway was established by John Davis when he deeded to his son Tom the land now owned by appellee without mention of the erection of gates thereon or reservation of the right to do so. In fact, the passway was then and for more than 15 years thereafter inclosed as a lane as far as the land was cleared, and yet remains largely so inclosed. It is true that more than 15 years after it was opened, for a year or so a gate was maintained at one place across the passway by J. Webber Davis while he owned appellants' land, but he obtained the consent of the then owner of appellee's land to erect it and soon removed it.

When appellants purchased their land, the passway ran through it unobstructed by gates; and, when appellee purchased his land, it was with knowledge of the existence of the passway through appellants' land and with the right to enjoy its use as then conditioned. It is our conclusion that appellants have no right to obstruct the passway with gates as done and threatened.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

ROCHE v. ROCHE.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 28, 1920.)

1. Trusts §72—Grantee in deed trustee of party furnishing consideration at common law.

At common law all that was necessary in order to convert a grantee in a deed into a trustee for another was to establish the fact that the latter furnished the consideration.

2. Trusts §72—Grantee in deed when trustee for another furnishing consideration under statute.

Under Ky. St. § 2353, it is only where vendee takes a deed in his own name without the consent of the person paying the consideration, or where the grantee, in violation of some trust, purchases the lands with the effects of another person, a trust results in favor of the person furnishing the consideration.

3. Trusts §110—Deception as basis of trust must be established by clear and convincing evidence.

Evidence of deception, authorizing the establishment of a trust in land, must be clear and convincing.

4. Appeal and error §1009(4)—Finding of chancellor not disturbed unless against preponderance of evidence.

The finding by a chancellor will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is against the preponderance of the evidence.

5. Trusts §110—Evidence of deception sufficient to establish trust in land.

In an action by a widow against heirs of her husband to have established a trust in land deeded to the husband and paid for by the wife, evidence held to support a finding of the chancellor that plaintiff was deceived as to how the deed had been executed, and that husband was trustee for plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County.

Action by Maria J. Roche against Malachi Roche. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Murphy, of Covington, and R. J. Colbert, of Lexington, for appellant.

James C. Wright and C. W. Youngblut, both of Newport, for appellee.

THOMAS, J. On June 15, 1893, the appellee and plaintiff below, Maria J. Roche, and John Roche were married in Kenton county, Ky. At the time of their marriage the plaintiff was between 45 and 50 years of age, while her husband was perhaps a few years younger. Neither of them owned any property at the time, and the husband worked at different jobs in the neighborhood, sometimes on the farm, and sometimes at other employment as a common laborer. It is not shown that he ever accumulated anything, or owned any property, except perhaps a few articles of personal apparel.

The undisputed proof shows that some time prior to 1906 the plaintiff inherited from her father, John Singleton, $2,050, and that a short while thereafter she inherited from her uncle $1,926.77. On March 31, 1906, the parties purchased a small farm in Kenton county, containing about 60 acres, from John W. Stephens. The agreement to purchase seems to have been effected through A. E. Foster, a real estate agent having the land in charge for the purpose of selling, and plaintiff's husband, John Roche. The deed was prepared so as to convey the land absolutely to the husband, but the evidence shows conclusively that the consideration was paid entirely by the wife, some of which was in cash at the time, and the last payment was the discharge of a mortgage lien debt on the land, which perhaps had been placed on it by Stephens. After the purchase of the farm the plaintiff and her husband resided upon it until the latter's death, which occurred near the end of the year 1917. The husband left no will, nor did he leave surviving him any descendants or any collateral heirs except the appellant and defendant, who is a brother.

On March 8, 1918, plaintiff brought this suit against the brother (appellant, Malachi Roche), alleging that he was claiming to own the land by inheritance from her deceased husband; that the latter held title to the land as the trustee of plaintiff, because she furnished the consideration for its purchase, and that the deed was taken to him without her knowledge or consent, and that under the provisions of section 2353 of the Kentucky Statutes a trust resulted in her favor, whereby her husband held the legal title as her trustee, she being the beneficial owner. She prayed that the deed be so construed, and that the defendant be required to convey the land to her, and upon his failure to do so that the court direct its master commissioner to make such conveyance.

The answer consisted of a general denial of the averments of the petition, and upon submission the court sustained plaintiff's petition and granted her the relief prayed for, and to reverse that judgment the defendant prosecuted this appeal.

In addition to the above-recited facts, it also appears without contradiction that plaintiff paid all the taxes due on the land after the deed was obtained, and looked after, attended to, and paid for all improvements thereon, as well as purchased all of the farming tools and stock necessary to run the farm. She was industrious and energetic, and sold vegetables, butter, eggs, and other products from the farm, and seems to have been the moving spirit in its operation. On numerous occasions the husband stated to neighbors and others not related to plaintiff that he had no interest in the farm, or anything upon it; that his wife had paid for all of it, that she owned it, and in substance that he had nothing to do with it. In his last illness he was confined to his bed some days, and he was very much concerned about the execution of a will; but no one was present who could write it, and his neighbors who were in attendance upon him, at the request of his wife, did not encourage him in the desire, because she stated at the time that it made no difference, since everything belonged to her anyway.

Plaintiff testified that she had no knowledge as to how the deed was executed, but under the provisions of section 606 she was perhaps incompetent to give such testimony. The grantor, Stephens, attempts to say in his examination in chief that plaintiff did know to whom the deed was executed, but on cross-examination he contradicts himself, and he is also contradicted as to how and the person by whom the deed was prepared. All of the other witnesses present at the time, including the clerk who took the acknowledgment, state that the deed had been previously prepared with the name of the husband as grantee therein, but how this came to be done, or who prepared it, does not clearly appear. Other facts and circumstances are testified to going to establish the fact that the husband did not claim any interest in the property, but that the wife did, and that she did not know to whom the deed was executed.

[1] It is earnestly insisted that the demurrer filed to the petition should have been sustained because it contains no allegation that it was executed through fraud or mistake, and the case of Fitzpatrick v. Roark, 179 Ky. 504, 200 S. W. 920, and cases therein referred to, are relied on in support of this contention. We have carefully read those cases, and do not find them applicable to the facts of this case. The general rule is that a writing may not be reformed without allegation and clear proof of fraud or mistake in its execution, but even this rule does not apply where a deed absolute on its face is sought to be converted into a mortgage. Vaughn v. Smith, 148 Ky. 531, 146 S. W. 1094; Leibel v. Tandy, 146 Ky. 101, 141 S. W. 1183; Stone v. Middleton, 144 Ky. 284, 137 S. W. 1047; Hobbs v. Rowland, 136 Ky. 197, 123 S. W. 1185; Eastern Gulf Oil Co. v. Lovelace, 188 Ky. 238, 221 S. W. 544. But the petition in this case does not seek to reform a deed for fraud or mistake. Its only purpose is to show that the nominal grantor was in fact only a trustee for the person who furnished the consideration for the deed. At common law all that was necessary in order to convert the grantee into a trustee for another was to establish the fact that the latter furnished the consideration. Neel v. Noland, 166 Ky. 455, 179 S. W. 430; May v. May, 161 Ky. 114, 170 S. W. 537; Foushee v. Foushee, 163 Ky. 524, 173 S. W. 1115. Section 2353, supra, changed this rule of the common law so as to prevent a resulting trust in favor of the one furnishing the consideration, except: (a) Where the vendee takes the deed "in his own name without the consent of the person paying the consideration"; or (b) "where the grantee, in violation of some trust, shall have purchased the lands deeded with the effects of another person."

has uniformly held that when either of the conditions (a) or (b) exist, a trust will result, notwithstanding the statute. It is true that the cases hold that the evidence authorizing the establishment of a trust must be clear and convincing. The facts in the cases supra relied on by appellant are so entirely different from those in this case that we hardly deem it necessary to point them out. Suffice it to say that in some of them the absolute deed sought to be declared a trust had been executed for as much as 70 years, and in all of them it was shown that the wife who sought to establish the trust was fully acquainted with the fact that the deed conveyed the land to the grantee. In some of the cases there were contradictions in the testimony upon the issues involved, and the trial court found against the one seeking to establish the trust, and, under the well-recognized rule that the findings by the chancellor will not be disturbed unless they are against the preponderance of the evidence, this court affirmed the judgment. In this case we have an opposite finding by the chancellor, and the testimony, as well as the circumstances in the case, very clearly indicates that plaintiff was deceived as to how the deed from Stephens had been executed. The learned judge who tried the case filed an opinion in which a concise as well as correct summary of the evidence appears, and, recognizing our inability to improve upon it, we have concluded to adopt a portion of his statement as a part of this opinion. After finding that plaintiff had furnished and paid the entire consideration for the land, the court adds:

"While this is not sufficient to establish the trust, it is further testified by Maria J. Roche that it was understood that the property was to be conveyed to her, and that she believed it had been until after the death of her husband, when she then ascertained that the husband, while acting as her agent, had taken the title to himself, which, if true, constituted a breach of trust, and by reason of which he would be deemed a trustee for her in the land. The plaintiff was not a competent witness to testify to that fact. Aside, however, from her own evidence to that effect, the deposition of witness after witness is without controversy that the husband always and repeatedly stated that the land was his wife's; that in matters pertaining to it, with reference to selling it, or removing from it, recognized her dominion as to it, declaring that he could not do it because his wife owned the place. I have no doubt but that the husband knew and understood that the title to the farm was in him, for it is uncontroverted in the evidence that for several days preceding his death he was appealing to his neighbors who visited him to get some one to write his will, saying that everything belonged to his wife, and he wanted her to have it; and, as it appears that he had little, if any, property other than the title to this land, it would seem evident that he knew both of the fact and effect of the property being in his name. But that very evidence introduced a fact which is very convincing that the plaintiff did not know it, for it is shown that, when being appealed to to have some one procured to write his will, which was done in the presence of plaintiff, the neighbor, who from repeated statements of the husband believed and thought that the land belonged to the wife, asked the wife if that (the making of the will) was necessary, to which the wife responded no, and not to bother about it. If the wife had known that the title to the property was in her husband, it would seem to be greatly contrary to the nature of people under such circumstances, knowing that her husband was desiring to make a will giving her all the property, for her to have treated the matter so lightly and have declared it to be unnecessary, when the effect of her husband's death without such will would be to leave her at an advanced age without any estate with which to support herself. The only reasonable explanation of that act upon her part is that she believed that the property was hers, that the making of such a will would be for that reason the doing of a vain and useless thing, and therefore declared it unnecessary two or three days prior to his death, when he was desirous of procuring his will to be made.

"The entire evidence in the record tending in any way to show that the plaintiff knew that the title had been conveyed to her husband consists of the statement of Mr. Stephens, from whom the property was purchased, who stated that at the time of the transfer of the property the deputy county clerk who took the acknowledgment of himself and wife to the deed asked both the plaintiff and her husband to whom they desired the deed made, and that the plaintiff said she desired it made to her husband. It is evident in the opinion of the court that the witness' recollection about that matter is somewhat at fault. He started out by saying that he understood that it was to be made that way, and in his statement of his recollection about the matter transpiring there seems uncertain and hazy. He testified that the clerk drew the deed. The plaintiff in rebuttal stated that the conversation did not take place. The deputy clerk who took the acknowledgment testified that he did not draw the deed, and never drew one in his life; that the deed was fully prepared when presented to him for acknowledgment; that there were no blanks in the deed for the name of the grantee or grantees to be filled; that it was already filled just as the deed appears now; that he has no recollection of asking either of the persons there how they wanted the deed made; that there would be no occasion for him asking such a question; and that he is convinced that he did not make such inquiry, or that the plaintiff answered as stated. The sale of the property was made through a real estate agent, and he testified that the deed was fully prepared before it was taken to the clerk's office to be acknowledged, and that there was no uncertainty about who the deed was made to that would cause the clerk to make such inquiry; that he has no recollection about the matter of the sale, except that he sold the property; that he does not recollect any inquiry about the deed at all; that all the clerk did was to take the acknowledgment; that the clerk did not make the deed, or fill any blanks in the deed; that he did not know who made the deed, but that Mr. Roetkin was the attorney in the matter. Mr. Roetkin was not introduced as a witness.

"The court is of the opinion from the evidence that the husband did hold the property in trust for the plaintiff, and that she paid the purchase money, and that the title was taken by her husband without her knowledge and consent, and a trust results under such circumstances under the express provisions of the statute."

The testimony being sufficient to support the judgment of the court, it is therefore affirmed.

Notwithstanding Ky. St. \S 2127, providing that no part of a married woman's estate shall be subjected to payment or satisfaction of any liability on a contract made after marriage to answer for the debt or default of another, unless she shall have set apart the estate for such purpose by mortgage or other conveyance, her property in Kentucky, though not so set apart, can be subjected to payment of her liability on her contract of suretyship made in another state, where she then resided, and where her property could be so subjected without any setting apart thereof by her for such purpose.

6. Courts \S 90(6)—Earlier decisions as to liability of married woman followed under rule of stare decisis.

Whatever might be said as to the soundness of the doctrine of decisions of this court that property in the state of a married woman is liable to satisfaction of her obligation contracted in another state, where her property would be so liable in the state of the contract, though it would not be if the contract was made in Kentucky, the rule of stare decisis would require this court to follow them.

7. Homestead \S 87 — Exemption may be claimed by married woman owning the property.

The exemption provided by Ky. St. \S 1702, of homestead owned by resident debtors, actual bona fide housekeepers with a family, may be claimed by a married woman owning the property in her own name, though she be not the head of the family.

8. Homestead \S 94—Exempt, though purchased after liability, where purchased with subsequent bequest.

The exception in Ky. St. \S 1702, withholding the homestead exemption as against a liability existing prior to purchase of the homestead, does not extend to a homestead purchased with a bequest made after the liability was contracted.

9. Homestead \S 90 — Exemption enforced against liability contracted in another state.

The homestead exemption, being part of the remedy, will be enforced against a liability contracted in another state.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County.

Action by G. W. Barker against Susie E. Moody and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Bradburn & Harlin and Sims, Rodes & Sims, all of Bowling Green, for appellants.

T. W. & R. O. P. Thomas and W. R. Gardner, all of Bowling Green, for appellee.

THOMAS, J. The appellee and plaintiff below, G. W. Barker, obtained a judgment in the district court of Sumner county, Kan., against the appellants and defendants below, Susie E. Moody and her husband, J. W. Moody, for the sum of $597.38, with interest and costs. He obtained a duly certified copy of that judgment, and filed suit on it against the same defendants in the Warren circuit court, in which he obtained an attachment which was levied upon a small piece of real estate in that county containing about 11 acres, and upon which the defendants and their family resided.

[1] A demurrer was filed to the petition upon the ground that the Kansas judgment was certified by the deputy clerk of the Kansas court instead of the clerk himself, but the demurrer was overruled and a corrected copy of that judgment was filed, which was certified to by the clerk; so that this error, if one, was cured.

An answer was filed consisting of a denial, which denial was refuted by the properly certified copy of the Kansas judgment. Another defense made was that the defendants were husband and wife, and that the note upon which the Kansas judgment was rendered was the debt of the husband alone, he being principal therein, and that it was signed by the wife as his surety only, that the attached property was her separate estate, and that she at no time had set it apart for the purpose of paying the note or the judgment, by deed, mortgage, or other conveyance, as required by section 2127 of the Kentucky Statutes. It was further averred in this connection that under the laws of the state of Kansas it was competent for a married woman to obligate herself personally as surety for another, including her husband, and to render her property liable therefor as though she were entirely free from the disabilities of coverture. Another defense was that the husband and wife, after the rendition of the Kansas judgment, moved from Kansas to Warren county, Ky.; that Mrs. Moody received, through a bequest from a deceased aunt, the sum of $900 in cash, with which she purchased the 11 acres sought to be subjected by the attachment; that the deed to the land was executed to her, and that she and her family resided on it as a homestead; that the homestead laws of Kansas are the same as in Kentucky, with the exception that a housekeeper in Kansas who would otherwise be entitled to the homestead exemption could claim it, although the homestead was purchased after the creation of the debt which was sought to be realized by its subjection.

A demurrer filed to the answer was sustained, and, defendants declining to plead further, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, in which the attachment was sustained, and the property ordered sold for the satisfaction of the debt, and, complaining of that judgment, the defendants prosecute this appeal.

[2-4] The defense, relying upon the wife's noncompliance with section 2127 of the Statutes, so as to subject her property to the payment of the debt, presents a question upon which there is a great diversity of opinion among the various courts. It may be stated without exception that, if under the lex loci contractus the contract for any reason is void, it will be invalid everywhere, and will not be enforced by the lex fori, although it would be valid if executed in that jurisdiction. It is likewise practically universally held that, if the one sought to be held had legal capacity to enter into the contract at the place where it was made, or where it was to be performed, and if it was transitory or concerned movable property, it will be upheld and enforced by the lex fori, although the defendant was incapacitated under its laws to make the contract. The enforcement of such a contract by the lex fori is because of comity between the different states and countries. It cannot be claimed as a right, since under it the recognition by the forum of foreign laws is by virtue of a species of favor or courtesy toward the other sovereignty; hence it will be denied when to do so would violate some established rule of public policy prevailing in the jurisdiction of the forum. In all cases the rules with reference to procedure and matters pertaining exclusively to the remedy are governed by the lex fori. These general rules will be found stated and extensively discussed in the annotations to the cases of Union National Bank v. Chapman, 57 L. R. A. 513; Mayer v. Roche, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 763; International Harvester Co. v. Gertrude McAdam, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 774; Wharton's Conflict of Laws, vol. 2, § 428a; and Elliott on Contracts, vol. 1, § 432. In stating the above general principles, we have assumed that the domicile of the contracting parties was identical with the place of the contract, since such is the fact in this case.

[5] It is insisted by defendants that it is the public policy of this state, as declared by the section of the Statute supra, that a married woman's property shall not be subjected to a debt for which she was surety only, except in the manner pointed out in the statute, which statute it is claimed, was enacted in furtherance of such public policy, for her benefit, and in order to protect her from some supposed domination of her husband. But, if it should be conceded that the opportunities for such domination once existed because of inequalities in the legal status of the parties with reference to capacity to contract, to own and control property, etc., later modifications of the law have largely removed those opportunities, since to-day the wife stands on almost an equality with her husband before the law with reference to property and property rights, as well as contractual capacity and political privilege, and his only superior power through which he might exercise domination is physical strength, which, happily, he is likewise prevented from employing. But, however this may be, this court, in the cases of Gibson v. Sublett, 82 Ky. 596, and Young's Trustee v. Bullen, 43 S. W. 687, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 1561, held that the wife, as well as her property, was liable to the payment of a debt contracted by her in a state under whose laws the contract was valid, and where her property could be subjected to the discharge of its obligations, although neither she nor her property would be liable if the contract had been entered into here, and in each of the cases the separate property of the wife was held liable for her debt contracted in the foreign state.

At the time of the rendition of the opinion in the Gibson Case, section 2127, supra, had not been enacted; but at that time, under the provisions of section 2, art. 2, c. 52, General Statutes 1888, a married woman's real estate could be subjected to her debts only when they were contracted by her before marriage or for necessities for herself and family after marriage, but in the latter case the debt must have been evidenced by writing signed by her. The debt involved in that case was not contracted by the wife before marriage, nor for necessities after marriage. It was made in the state of Louisiana, where both she and her property were liable for the particular character of debt, and this court held that her real estate in this state, under the law of comity, could be subjected to the payment of that debt.

The debt involved in the Young Case grew out of a note executed by the wife in Missouri before the enactment of section 2127 of the Statutes, but the debt was contracted after marriage, and was not for necessities for the wife or any member of her family, but this court subjected to its payment her real property situated in this state, as was done in the Gibson Case. We find no cases from this court in conflict with the doctrines announced by the cases referred to.

The case of Brown v. Dalton, 105 Ky. 609, 49 S. W. 443, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1484, 88 Am. St. Rep. 325, relied on by defendants, is not so, nor is the case of Griswold v. Golding, 3 S. W. 535, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 777 (reported only in abstract). The only question in the Brown Case was whether Kentucky courts would enforce a contract between husband and wife entered into in Virginia, where such contract was valid. It was held that it was so patently against the public policy of this state that it would not be enforced.

In the Griswold Case the contract of the wife was executed in Missouri, under whose laws it was invalid as to her, although the same contract would have been valid here, and the court, for the reason above announced, declined to enforce it here.

[6] Whatever might be said as to the soundness of the doctrine of the Gibson and Young Cases, the rule of stare decisis would compel us to recognize and follow them. We therefore conclude that the court properly sustained the demurrer to the defense now under consideration.

[7] That portion of the answer relying on the homestead exemption presents to our minds a valid pro tanto defense, and the demurrer thereto was improperly sustained. Section 1702 of the Kentucky Statutes exempts from sale for the satisfaction of a debt the homestead, not exceeding in value the sum of $1,000 "owned by debtors who are actual bona fide housekeepers with a family, resident in this commonwealth." This court, in the cases of Herring v. Johnston, 72 S. W. 793, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1944, Lee & Hester v. Hughes, 77 S. W. 386, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1201, and American National Bank v. Mathews, 124 S. W. 811, held that a married woman could claim the benefit of the homestead exemption when she owned the homestead in her own name. So that, if the right otherwise exists, Mrs. Moody is not deprived of it from the fact that she may not be regarded as the head of the family.

[8] In the cases of Meador v. Meador, 88 Ky. 217, 10 S. W. 651, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 783, Jewell v. Clark, 78 Ky. 398, Spratt v. Allen, 106 Ky. 274, 50 S. W. 270, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1822, Miller v. Bennett, 12 S. W. 194, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 391, Burrow v. Maxon, 129 Ky. 578, 112 S. W. 661, Frizzell v. Rozzell, 155 Ky. 631, 160 S. W. 244, Staun v. Procter, 152 Ky. 142, 153 S. W. 196, and Roberts v. Adams, 96 S. W. 554, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 848, this court held that the debtor could claim his homestead right in land which was inherited by him after the creation of the debt if he was in the occupancy of it at the time it was sought to be subjected, and in a number of cases it has been held that the proceeds of a homestead may be invested in another one, if done within a reasonable time after the sale, and the newly acquired one will be exempt, though purchased after the creation of the debt.

In the cases of Burrow v. Maxon, 129 Ky. 578, 112 S. W. 661, Holcomb v. Hood, 1 S. W. 401, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 255, and Staun v. Procter, supra, it was held that the homestead exemption would prevail against a prior debt where the homestead was acquired by gift, and in the case of Hester v. Lynn, 49 S. W. 431, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1460, it was held that the debtor was entitled to the homestead exemptions in land purchased with money inherited from his son as against a prior debt when he was occupying the homestead at the time it was sought to be subjected.

In all of the cases referred to the reason for upholding the homestead exemption as against prior debts was that "the creditor has not been prejudiced, because the debtor has not converted any debt-paying part of his estate into exempt property" (Roark v. Bach, 118 Ky. 457, 76 S. W. 340, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 699), and its allowance was not forbidden by the exception in section 1702 withholding the exemption as against debts or liabilities existing prior to the purchase of the homestead.

The same reason for upholding the exemption as against prior existing debts is thus stated in the case of Jewell v. Clarke, supra, and quoted with approval in the case of Burrow v. Maxon, supra:

"The object of this provision was to prevent debtors from purchasing homesteads after creating debts or liabilities, and then claiming the exemption against such debts. The means with which a homestead was purchased might be the very means to which the creditor looked for payment, and gave the debtor the credit which enabled him to create the debt; and it would be unjust to the creditor to allow the debtor, by thus investing in a homestead, the means on the faith of which he obtained credit to defeat the collection of the debt. But, when the debtor derives title to the homestead by descent, no injury is done to the creditor in exempting the homestead so acquired. The means upon the faith of which he gave credit have not been diverted, and the case does not, therefore, come within the reason of the statute, and the rule that a case not coming within the reason of a remedial statute is not affected by it applies."

[9] We are convinced that the facts of this case, which are admitted by the demurrer, bring it strictly within the principle of the cases referred to, and that Mrs. Moody manifested her right to the homestead exemption as against plaintiff's debt, although it was created before the acquisition of defendant's homestead. The exemption laws of Kentucky, being a part of the remedy (Barker v. Brown, 33 S. W. 833, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 1172, and Minor on Conflict of Laws, § 209), will be enforced here under the rules heretofore referred to.

The court therefore erred in sustaining the demurrer to that portion of the answer relying upon the homestead exemption, and the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to that part of the answer, and to proceed in accordance with this opinion.

MIDKIFF et al. v. CARTER et al.

1. Drains \S 60—Establishment of drainage district does not preclude assertion of damage to land outside its area.

A judgment establishing a drainage area or district will in no wise bar or estop persons whose lands lie without the district, and who were refused permission to become parties from asserting injury to their lands as the result of the establishment of the district.

2. Drains \S 14(1)—Persons whose lands lay outside of drainage area are not entitled to become parties to proceedings.

As Acts 1912, c. 132, § 4 (Ky. St. 1915, § 2380, subsec. 4), provides that if a petition for a ditch be not dismissed process shall issue against the landowners named in the petition and viewers' report, landowners whose premises were outside the proposed drainage district are not, though they asserted that its establishment would injure their property, entitled to become parties, for the establishment of the ditch would not prevent them from recovering such damages.

3. Drains \S 14(3)—On appeal from county court, issues should be confined to those raised therein.

As Drainage Act of 1912, under which it was proposed to organize a district, provides in section 5 that the issues shall be confined on reaching the circuit court to those raised in the lower court, landowners not parties to the proceedings in the county court, and whose premises lay outside the drainage district, are not entitled to come in and file objections on the ground that the establishment of the ditch would injure their property.

4. Evidence \S 535—Opinion as to injury which might result from drainage district can be given only by qualified person.

Only qualified persons can give opinion testimony as to the practicability of constructing a drainage ditch, and as to whether, if established, it would be beneficial to public health and conducive to general welfare, and other witnesses may merely testify to the facts.

5. Appeal and error \S 1026—Only those errors which injuriously affect party's rights are ground for reversal.

Only those errors which injuriously affect a party's rights are ground for reversal.

6. Trial \S 296(1)—Deficiency in one instruction may be cured by subsequent instruction.

Though the first instruction was insufficient, standing alone, yet, where the second referred back to and made the first instruction part of it, and the two, taken together, properly submitted the issues, the insufficiency of the first is no ground for objection.

7. Drains \S 14(3)—Objectors to establishment of drainage district have burden of proof, viewers' approval making out prima facie case.

The viewers' report, recommending the establishment of a drainage ditch, makes out a prima facie case, under Acts 1918, c. 64 (Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 2380b9), for petitioners, and the exceptors have the burden of proof, so the exceptors, having accepted such burden without complaint, cannot complain.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ohio County

Petition by Finley Carter and others for the establishment of a drainage district, begun in county court and appealed to the circuit court. From a judgment in favor of petitioners, which also denied the petition of J. J. Midkiff and others, who sought to intervene, J. J. Midkiff and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. S. Glenn and Barnes & Smith, all of Hartford, for appellants.

Heavrin & Martin and Woodward & Kirk, all of Hartford, for appellees.

QUIN, J. In June, 1913, appellee Carter and others petitioned the county court for the establishment of a public drainage ditch or drain. Upon a trial of said proceedings in the county court there was a judgment adverse to the establishment of the ditch, and a like result followed a trial in the circuit court. Petitioners appealed to this court, and in an opinion reported in 179 Ky. 164, 200 S. W. 369, Carter et al. v. Griffith et al., the judgment of the lower court was reversed because of erroneous instructions and the admission and rejection of testimony.

After the mandate of reversal was filed in the court below, the case was assigned to the September, 1913, term for trial, and during said term J. J. Midkiff and 18 others, in two separate pleadings, petitioned the court to be made parties defendant to the proceedings. It was alleged that they (Midkiff and others, hereinafter referred to as petitioners) owned land bordering on the banks of Panther creek, and below the mouth of the proposed improvement, and that their lands would be materially affected and injured by the establishment of said ditch. It was further alleged that water flowing into the ditch would be collected in greater quantity and reach the channel of the creek in a much shorter period of time, thereby causing the banks of Panther creek to overflow and be discharged on petitioners' lands, wash the soil therefrom, deposit sand and other debris thereon, destroy their crops, and otherwise injure their land.

The petitions were ordered filed, but later, on motion of appellees, they were stricken from the record. The case was heard on exceptions filed by the remaining appellants, and from a verdict favorable to the establishment of the ditch the exceptors and petitioners have appealed. A reversal is asked on three grounds. These we will discuss in the order named:

[1, 2] 1. Alleged error in refusing to permit Midkiff and others to be made parties.

This proceeding had been pending for something over five years at the time these petitions were filed. In the petition seeking the organization of the drainage district and the establishment of the ditch, some of the petitioners were named as persons whose land would be affected by the improvement. The viewers, however, did not report favorably upon the ditch as proposed by appellees. Had the viewers followed the route outlined in the petition, the lands of many of the petitioners would have been included; but they reported in favor of a more restricted district than that sought, thus eliminating the land of some of the petitioners.

Summons was issued only against those included in the viewer's report, and this is assigned as error. These proceedings were instituted under Acts 1912, c. 132 (Ky. Stats. 1915, § 2380), in the fourth section of which it is provided that, if the petition for the ditch be not dismissed, process shall issue against the landowners named in the petition and in the viewer's report. This, it seems, was done. No process was issued against any one whose land was not included in the viewers' report. It is said that, though petitioners were not included in the district as recommended by the viewers, inasmuch as their lands are immediately below the mouth of the proposed ditch, they will be damaged for the reasons heretofore given, and hence were necessary parties. The statute supra provides that, after notice to all persons whose lands are shown to be affected by the proposed improvement, the action on the viewers' preliminary report shall stand for exceptions as to each and every party brought before the court at the next regular term of the county court, after process shall have been executed for the requisite time. It was the evident intention of the lawmakers to limit the inquiry and the right to file exceptions to those included in the viewers' report.

The effect of the proposed ditch upon those owning land below the mouth thereof is problematical, and if damage results from the construction of said ditch the failure to make petitioners parties would in no wise bar or estop them from the prosecution of any action available to them. The statute was not intended, nor will it be construed, as depriving petitioners of any rights or remedies to which they were entitled. Williams v. Wedding, 105 Ky. 361, 176 S. W. 1176. Petitioners were not assessed for any portion of the improvement. They are not within the drainage area or district as approved by the viewers; therefore the court was not compelled to permit them to be made parties. 19 C. J. 940. In Latham v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 100 Neb. 173, 158 N. W. 923, construing a statute similar to ours, the court says:

"The statute does not contemplate that the question of the rights and liabilities of the district to third persons shall be determined in such proceeding. It is not intended that landowners without the district, who will not be assessed for the cost of the improvements, shall prevent the organization of a drainage district by landowners consenting to be assessed for the cost of the improvements."

In said opinion it was also held that the Drainage Act did not contemplate that the question of damages raised by third persons would be decided at the hearing upon the application for the formation of a district.

[3] Then, too, the petitioners raised an issue not before the county court, a proceeding prohibited by statute. In subsection 5 of the Drainage Act of 1912, it is provided:

"Said proceeding shall be docketed and tried in the circuit court, as other civil cases are tried, except that the issues shall be confined to those raised in the lower court, and no new issues not so raised shall be considered, and no summons need issue on the appeal."

While not necessary parties, it would not have been improper, had the court, upon motion reasonably made, permitted petitioners to be made parties; but the petitions were not tendered until more than five years after the proceedings were instituted. To permit petitioners at so late a date to file these pleadings might lead to almost endless delay and defeat the construction of the ditch. If accorded the relief sought, what would prevent other landowners bordering on Panther creek, further distant from the mouth of the ditch, from later coming in, asking leave to be made parties, and to file exceptions? Then, perhaps, after these had been disposed of, others would make a like request, and so on ad infinitum. We do not think it was ever contemplated that persons below or outside of the proposed district should be made parties to the proceedings.

[4] 2. It is urged the court erred in the admission and rejection of evidence. Because of the conclusion above reached, it follows the court did not err in refusing to allow appellants to introduce evidence as to the effect of the proposed improvements on the lands below the mouth of the ditch.

It is complained the court refused to permit four witnesses, "after they had testified to facts," using the language of appellants' brief, to testify that it was not practicable to construct the proposed ditch. This very point was decided in the first opinion, wherein, referring to certain witnesses, it is said:

"It was error to permit Dr. Carter and Sam Neal, who had not qualified as experts by showing any scientific or practical knowledge on the subject, to give it as their opinion that it was not practicable to drain the proposed district by a public ditch. They should have been permitted to testify only to the facts, thus leaving to the jury the right to draw its own deduction from the facts so stated and the other evidence in the case."

The same rule is applicable to the testimony of certain witnesses as to whether in their opinion the establishment of the improvement would be beneficial to the general health or conducive to the general welfare. They were permitted to state the facts, as conceded in counsel's brief; further than this they were not qualified to testify. The testimony on the two trials is substantially the same.

The ditch involved in the present proceeding is known as the "Finley-Carter ditch," and parallels the "Rhodes ditch" in the Panther creek valley. It is claimed witnesses for appellee were allowed to testify as to the advantages accruing from the construction of the Rhodes ditch, but that appellants' witnesses were denied the right to testify as to the disadvantages resulting therefrom. We have examined the evidence in this connection and we fail to find wherein the court has ruled prejudicially to appellants. It is true the court sustained appellees' objection to certain questions propounded appellants' witnesses, but much evidence relating to the effect of the Rhodes ditch was admitted. On the other hand, appellants' objections to similar questions propounded appellees' witnesses were sustained. Altogether it seems the advantage in this respect is with appellants.

[5] It is but natural, in a trial like this, with so many witnesses before the court, and so many questions of law and practice raised, that the court might err at times in passing upon the competency and incompetency of testimony. There are few contested cases where the record is free from error. The question is whether the ruling was prejudicial. We find no such errors in the record.

Refusal of the court to permit Dr. Barnett to answer a hypothetical question is likewise urged as error; but the question, covering, as it does, three pages of the transcript, is much involved, and is one that should more properly have been addressed to an engineer. The ruling of the court in refusing to permit the witness to answer was not error.

[6] 3. It is said the court erroneously instructed the jury. No useful purpose would be served in copying these instructions into the opinion. Standing alone, the first instruction did not properly submit the case to the jury; but its insufficiency was cured by the second instruction, which referred back to and made the first instruction a part of the second, the same as if copied therein, and, taking the two as one instruction, as must be done, under the wording of the second instruction, they properly submitted the issue to the jury. Certainly appellants have no cause to complain thereof. The third was but the converse of the second instruction. The fourth instruction given was tendered by appellants. Appellants were not entitled to have other tendered instructions given.

[7] It is also urged in the brief that the court erred in holding that the burden of proof was with appellants. Appellants, without objection, introduced their evidence first, which gave them the concluding argument. There was no objection on their part to thus assuming the burden, nor was this alleged error made a ground for a new trial. The aforesaid statute provides that, if the report shows the proposed improvement is not practicable, or will not benefit the public health, or any public highway, or be conducive to the community's general welfare, the petition for the ditch shall be dismissed. If a contrary condition is shown, the proceeding shall be continued for process and for further orders. The burden was on the exceptors, as the viewers' report makes out a prima facie case for the appellants. Katterhenry v. Arensman, 183 Ind. 347, 106 N. E. 101; Mapel v. Calhoun County, 179 Iowa, 981, 162 N. W. 198; Hall v. Polk, 181 Iowa, 828, 165 N. W. 119. It is so provided in the 1918 act. 3 Ky. Stats. § 2380b9.

Finding no grounds justifying a reversal, the judgment is affirmed.

ADAMS et al. v. HORN et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 28, 1920.)

1. Drains \S 14(3)—Where evidence to support statutory requirements for a ditch is contradicted, the question is for the jury.

Where the evidence in support of the statutory requirements for a proposed drainage ditch was contradicted, the question is for the jury, and a peremptory instruction in favor of the improvement is erroneous.

2. Drains \S 14(2)—Petition for a drainage district, filed under the act of 1912, need not be signed by 25 per cent. of owners, as required by amendment.

A petition to establish a drainage district, filed under Acts 1912, c. 182, need not be signed by 25 per cent. of the landowners, as required by the amendment of 1918 (Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 2380—49) because the amendment expressly validates all prior proceedings had under the act.

3. Drains \S 14(3)—On appeal to the circuit court, amended exceptions to establishment of district pertaining to issue raised below may be filed.

While the Drainage Act of 1912 provides that on appeal to the circuit court the issue shall be heard de novo, but shall be confined to those raised in the lower court, exceptors to the establishment of a drainage district may file amended exceptions pertaining to the same subjects raised below, and so the amended exceptions, merely diminishing the territory sought to be excluded, were improperly rejected.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.

Petition by J. B. Horn for the establishment of a drainage district, opposed by E. N. Adams and others. The proceeding was begun in the county court, and appealed to the circuit court. From a judgment in favor of the improvement, the exceptors appeal. Reversed for further proceedings.

And & Higdon and T. F. Birkhead, all of Owensboro, for appellants.

J. R. Hays and R. Miller Holland, both of Owensboro, for appellees.

QUIN, J. This is an action under the Drainage Act of 1912 (Ky. Stats. [Ed. 1915] § 2380), instituted by appellee, Horn, and others for the establishment of a drainage ditch for the improvement of what is known as Burnett's creek, a tributary of Panther creek. Viewers were appointed, made their report, exceptions were filed, and a trial had. During the trial in the county court exceptors tendered amended exceptions raising the question as to the right to establish a separate drainage district within the district already established. The court refused to allow said exceptions to be filed, and peremptorily instructed the jury to find in favor of the construction of the ditch. An appeal was taken to the circuit court, which ordered the exceptions filed, and the petition was dismissed. The circuit court was reversed in an opinion reported in 184 Ky. 424, 212 S. W. 108, Horn v. Adams et al.; the only question on that appeal being whether a drainage district could be organized within the limits of an established district. This court held that such could be done. After the return of the case to the circuit court, and before trial, further amended exceptions were tendered; but the circuit court refused to allow these to be filed. There was a verdict at the hands of a jury in favor of petitioners, and this appeal is to reverse that judgment.

[1] The court in its first instruction peremptorily told the jury to find in favor of the improvement. This was error. Many witnesses were introduced by the respective parties. Those testifying for the petitioners set forth the insufficient drainage in the vicinity, and the benefits that would accrue from the construction of the ditch, as well as its needs, its practicability, propriety, and other statutory requirements. This evidence was contradicted by witnesses introduced by the exceptors; thus the question was for the jury.

It is provided in subsection 3, Ky. Stats. § 2380 (Ed. of 1915), that the viewers shall report whether the proposed improvement is practicable and the route the proper one; whether it will benefit the public health, comfort, or convenience, or any public highway, or be conducive to the general welfare of the community; the accruing benefits to the lands, and whether the lands affected are included in the proposed district. It is also provided:

"If the board of viewers shall find the improvement practicable, but the route named in the petition improper or impracticable, they may so state, showing therein the proper and practicable route," and "if the viewers report that the improvement is practicable, and will benefit the public health or any highway, or will be conducive to the general welfare of the community affected, then the proceeding shall be continued, for process and for further orders."

The practicability and propriety of the route selected, as well as the needs or accruing benefits, were not submitted to the jury. In instruction No. 2 the jury was told to find against the exceptors, unless they believed their land would not be benefited by the proposed improvement, in which event the jury should find in favor of any exceptors not deriving benefits from the improvements against the other. This was the only question submitted to the jury.

Instruction No. 3 tendered by appellant is not complained of. The substance of instructions B and C, tendered by appellant, was included in instruction No. 2 given by the court. Appellant was not entitled to have instruction D given to the jury but the theory sought to be included therein should be embodied in an instruction given upon the next trial.

[2] There was no foundation for instruction E. In this instruction it was sought to have the jury told that it was necessary that 25 per cent. of the landowners petitioned for the ditch. It is true by an amendment of March, 1918 (Acts 1918, c. 114) it is provided that a petition for a ditch shall be signed by not less than 25 per cent. of the landowners in a proposed district; but by a later section of the amendatory act it is expressly provided that—

"All proceedings heretofore had under the act, and all steps taken to organize districts thereunder, and all districts heretofore organized, all assessments heretofore made, all contracts heretofore entered into, and all bonds heretofore issued, or ordered or directed by the board of drainage commissioners to be issued under the said act are hereby validated and made valid; and all such districts heretofore organized are declared to be valid and existing districts, and all acts and proceedings heretofore done, had and performed by each of said districts and the board of drainage commissioners acting for them, and for each of them, and all acts of the viewers and of the board of drainage commissioners and of the court in respect thereto, are hereby declared to be legal and valid in all respects." Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 2380—49.

Thus the court did not err in refusing to give instruction E.

[3] It is provided by statute that trials in the circuit court shall be de novo, and the cases shall be tried and docketed as other cases are tried; that the issues shall be confined to those raised in the lower court, no new issues shall be considered. This language of the statute is cited in support of the court's refusal to permit exceptors to file amended exceptions upon the return of the case to the circuit court. The tendered amendments did not raise new issues, but pertained to issues raised by the original exceptions filed in the county court. In the original exceptions objections were made to the inclusion in the drainage district of any land north of the Leitchfield public road. By the amendment the territory sought to be excluded, instead of being enlarged, was diminished, and the exceptions limited to so much of the territory as was situated more than 50 yards north of said Leitchfield public road. The court should have permitted the amended exceptions to be filed.

In Midkiff et al. v. Carter et al. (this day decided) 188 Ky. 339, 222 S. W. 92, which was an appeal from the same judicial district as the present case, we approved as substantially correct the instructions given by the lower court. These instructions might be followed on the next trial in so far as applicable to the facts of this case.

For the reasons given, the judgment will be reversed, for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MILLER et ux. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §1159(3)—Verdict on conflicting evidence will not be set aside on appeal.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be set aside upon appeal on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, though testimony of numerous witnesses was made incredible.

2. Homicide §300(3) — Danger should be submitted from standpoint of defendants relying on self-defense.

An instruction on the subject of self-defense is erroneous, where it leaves to the jury the question whether defendants were in danger of death or great harm was likely, and the question which should be submitted is whether defendants believed, or had reasonable grounds to believe, that they were in danger.

3. Criminal law §823(6)—Error in instructions on self-defense cured by other instructions.

Error in an instruction on self-defense, which submitted to the jury the question whether defendants were in peril instead of whether they believed or had reasonable grounds to believe that they were in peril, was harmless where other instructions clearly presented the correct rule.

4. Homicide §300(2)—Instruction that defendants could not use more force than actually necessary not objectionable.

An instruction in a homicide case that defendants had no right to use "more force than was actually necessary" or reasonably appeared to be necessary to repel deceased's assault held not objectionable in the use of the quoted words.

5. Homicide §123—A person cannot kill because another is forcing a trespass upon his premises.

A person cannot kill one forcibly trespassing on his premises, and, though one of the defendants testified that she shot deceased when he attempted to force an entrance into her house, it was not error for the court to refuse an instruction that she had the right to kill to protect her home from such attack.

6. Witnesses §246(1, 5)—A juror may cause a witness to be recalled to propound proper question to him.

Any member of the jury has the right, during the examination of a witness, to ask any competent, pertinent question, and, after the jury has retired, jurors have the right to return to the courtroom and ask that a witness, who has testified, be recalled if he is present or so convenient as to be quickly secured, and in the presence of the parties and their attorneys ask proper questions.

7. Criminal law §689—Witnesses §246(5)
Recalling a witness for examination by juror after submission held not reversible error.

In a homicide case it was not error for the court, after submission of the case, at the request of a juror to recall a witness whose son had also been indicted and allow the juror to examine her as to whether she received threats that her son would be sent to the penitentiary unless she produced evidence against one of the defendants; it being the theory of the defense that the principal witness against him, who was a sister of the one indicted, was coerced.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Perry County.

Allen Miller and wife were convicted of manslaughter, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Hogg & Johnson and F. J. Eversole, all of Hazard, for appellants.

Chas. I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., and Thomas B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

CARROLL, O. J. The appellants, Allen Miller and Delilah Miller, under an indictment charging them with the murder of Sam Combs, were found guilty of manslaughter and the punishment of each assessed at a term in the penitentiary for 21 years.

[1] The evidence in the record leaves in considerable doubt the circumstances surrounding the death of Combs, who one evening after supper left his home and the next morning was found dead at the house of the Millers, who are husband and wife. The only person who testified as to the manner in which Combs came to his death was Delilah Miller, and she said: That Sam Combs, who lived in the same neighborhood, was well known to her. That on the night he was killed she and a little girl about six years old were occupying alone the cabin in which she and her husband lived. That her husband about 3 or 4 o'clock on the afternoon of that day went to the house of his brother, John Miller, where he stayed all night, leaving no person at his home except herself and the little girl. That she was awakened about 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning by a "pounding" on the door of the room in which she and the child were sleeping. That she did not know who it was until she asked, and the person said: "Bad Sam Combs, by God, the worst God d— s— of a b— ever seed this place," and I says 'Get away from here; you have no business here,' and he says, 'By G—d, I make business wherever I go,' and he pounded on the door, and I got up and got the gun and held the gun in my hand, and the door flew open, and I heard something burst in the floor, and, as quick as I discovered him, I shot, and I dropped the gun down on the bed and grabbed the little girl up and went out the door barefooted and in my nightclothes, as quick as I could get out, and went down to Sallie Miller's."

She further said that he prized the door open, and while there was no light or fire in the room, there was enough light from the door and window to enable her to discover that it was a man, but she only knew who it was from what he said; that as soon as he came in the door she shot as quick as she could with a single-barrel shotgun.

This is all the evidence as to the circumstances surrounding the death of Combs, nor does the record disclose why or how he happened to be at the house of Miller at the time he was killed. The fact is that the evidence is so confusing and contradictory as to leave involved in doubt every material fact connected with the case, except that Sam Combs was shot and killed during the night at the house of Miller.

Allen Miller testified that he was not at home during the night and did not know anything about the tragedy until late the next morning, when he was told what happened by some people that he met.

Nancy Miller, a girl about 14 years old and a niece of Allen Miller, testifying for the commonwealth, said that she went to Allen Miller's house in the afternoon of the day before Combs was killed and remained in the house all night; that she retired early and went to sleep, but about 10 or 11 o'clock was awakened by a noise in the room in which she was sleeping, and saw Delilah Miller, who was sleeping in the bed with her, get up and open the door and let Sam Combs in the room; that Allen Miller was at home and in the room where they were sleeping, and when Sam Combs came in he and Allen Miller sat in the room, and she saw them drinking whisky; that presently she went to sleep and was next aroused by the firing of a gun and saw Allen Miller standing near the door holding Sam Combs; that Delilah Miller was standing over in one corner of the room; that she did not hear anything said at this time, but got up at once and went out of the house to Sallie Miller's, a neighbor, who lived near by.

This girl was the principal witness for the commonwealth, in connection with two or three other witnesses, who testified to threats made by Allen Miller that he would kill Combs.

It will be noticed that Delilah Miller testified that she shot and killed Sam Combs, but it appears probable that the jury may have believed that he was killed by Allen Miller and that his wife, Delilah, assumed the blame in order to exonerate her husband from liability for the crime. We may further assume that the jury believed the story told by Nancy Miller, and inferred from the circumstances of the case that Combs, while drunk, was shot and killed by Allen Miller with the advice and assistance of his wife. But however this may be, the direct and circumstantial evidence in the case was, as we think, sufficient to justify the jury in returning the verdict, although, as we have said, the evidence is so contradictory and confusing as to leave us in great doubt as to the truth of the case. The jury, however, saw and heard the witnesses testify and were doubtless acquainted with them, and we do not feel warranted in holding, on the record before us, that their finding should be set aside and a new trial ordered on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to support it.

On this appeal, it is urged that the court committed error in the instructions given to the jury and in permitting Sallie Ann Miller to be recalled at the request of the jury and examined by one of the jurors after the case had been argued and submitted.

[2, 3] There is no objection to the instructions on the subject of murder and manslaughter; but instruction No. 6, on the subject of self-defense, is criticized because it is said that this instruction left to the jury to say whether the Millers, or either of them, at the time Combs was killed, were in danger of death or great harm at his hands, in place of telling the jury that they should acquit if they believed that the Millers, or either of them, had reasonable grounds to believe that they or either of them were in danger of death or great harm at the hands of Combs.

It is true that an acquittal on the ground of self-defense rests on what the defendant believes and has reasonable grounds to believe, and not on what the jury may believe. In other words, this instruction, in place of reading as it does;

"If the jury shall believe from the evidence that the deceased, Sam Combs, had unlawfully and forcibly assaulted the home of the defendants, and if the jury shall further believe from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, or any member of the family, were in danger of death or the infliction of some great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased at and before the time of the shooting, then in such event the defendants, or either of them, had the right to use such force"

—should have read:

"If the jury shall further believe from the evidence that the defendants, or either of them, believed or had reasonable grounds to believe that they, or either of them, or any member of the family, were in danger of death or the infliction of some great bodily harm at the hands of the deceased at and before the time of the shooting, then the defendants, or either of them, had the right to use such force at their command as was necessary or believed by them to be necessary in the exercise of reasonable judgment to repel the assault."

This instruction would have been in better form if the words we have indicated had been inserted. But the omission from this instruction at the place mentioned of the words, "they or either of them believed or had reasonable grounds to believe that they," etc., did not prejudice the substantial rights of the accused, because in other instructions the jury were distinctly told that they should acquit the Millers, and each of them, if they or either of them believed that they, or either of them, was in danger of death or the infliction of some great bodily harm at the hands of said Combs, and that it was necessary, or was believed by either of them, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary, to shoot and kill him.

[4] It is further argued that the court committed error in telling the jury in instruction No. 6 that the defendants "had no right to use more force than was actually necessary or reasonably appeared to be necessary for that purpose, and, if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the defendants did not use any more force than was necessary in the exercise of reasonable judgment to repel such assault," they should acquit.

The particular objection to this part of the instruction is the use of the words "more force than was actually necessary," but we do not find any substantial error in the use of the words criticized.

[5] It is further insisted that as Delilah Miller, the only witness who gave direct evidence of the circumstances under which Combs was shot and killed, testified that he violently and forcibly broke into the room in which she was sleeping, and that she shot him because she believed she was in danger and to protect her home, the jury should have been told in substance that she had the right to shoot and kill to protect her home from the violent and forcible attack of the intruder.

But we think the court properly instructed the jury on this subject. The law does not authorize a person to take the life of another merely because such other is forcibly trespassing on his premises. To excuse the homicide, under circumstances like this, it is essential that the shooting and killing should be believed by the person accused necessary or reasonably necessary to protect himself or his family from danger.

[6, 7] It appears that, after the jury had taken the case, they returned to the courtroom and requested the court to permit them to question Sallie Ann Miller, who had testified as a witness for the accused. In response to this request, the court recalled Mrs. Miller to the witness stand, and Mr. Hayes, one of the jurors, in the presence of the court, the counsel for the defendant and the commonwealth, and the defendants, asked her the following questions, to which she made the following answers:

"Q. We want to ask you if counsel for the defendant asked you on the trial if App Eversole and Andy Williams threatened to put your son in the penitentiary unless you produced evidence against Allen Miller? A. They was talking to me, said I had better know something against Allen; they said it would be a heap better for me if I knowed something. Q. The point we were after was whether the witness was threatened that, unless she produced evidence against Allen Miller, her son would be sent to the penitentiary? A. They said it would be better. That's the way I stated it at the first start. They said it would be better if I did know something against Allen Miller; it would be better on my boy if I did know something against Allen Miller. I think that's the way I stated it the first time. I don't think I have forgot. The Court, to the Jury: Is that all you wanted to ask her? The Jury: 'Yes.'"

Counsel for the defendants objected and excepted to this evidence, and moved the court to have the stenographer's notes of the evidence given by the witness read to the jury upon the point she was inquired about, which motion was overruled.

In order to understand the purpose of the jury in asking these questions, it should be stated that Cager Miller, a son of Sallie Ann, was indicted in connection with Allen and Deillah Miller, but the indictment against him was either dismissed or the case continued as to him; it does not appear which. At any rate, he was not put upon his trial with Allen and Deillah Miller; and counsel for the defendants endeavored to show that the prosecution procured the indictment of Cager Miller in order to force his sister, Nancy Miller, the principal witness for the commonwealth, to give the evidence that she did by the threat made to her mother, Sallie Ann Miller, as well as herself, that unless she did connect Deillah and Allen Miller with the murder her brother, Cager, could be prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary; and on the examination of Nancy and her mother, Sallie Ann Miller, counsel for the defendants endeavored to show by them the state of facts stated, but failed to do so, except that Sallie Ann Miller, when first introduced as a witness, testified substantially as she did when recalled by the jury.

We do not find any objection to the course pursued by the trial judge in permitting Sallie Ann Miller to be recalled and examined by the jury in the presence of the accused and their counsel. Any member of the jury has the right, during the examination of a witness, to ask any competent, pertinent question, and, after the jury has retired to consider their verdict, they have the right to return to the courtroom and ask that a witness, who has testified, be recalled if he is present or so convenient as to be quickly secured and in the presence of the court, the parties to the case and their attorneys ask the witness any pertinent, competent questions relating to matter brought out on the examination of the witness.

After a careful consideration of the case, we have reached the conclusion that no error prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendants was committed during the trial, and the judgment is affirmed.

CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO. v. BLACKBURN.

1. Damages $$138-\700 held excessive for injury to property by fire.

In an action against a railroad company for damages from fire, where there was no satisfactory evidence as to the value of the standing timber burned, objections being sustained to questions as to the injury to the property per acre and to the timber destroyed, and there being no evidence as to the value of the timber before and after the fire, a verdict for $700 was excessive, notwithstanding testimony that the injury to fences was $500, where the damages for that item were laid at less than $200.

2. Damages $$157(1)$, $216(1)$ — Instructions limiting recovery to damages itemized in petition necessary.

Where the petition itemizes the amounts of the various damages, recovery is limited to the amounts specified, notwithstanding the evidence shows greater damage, and the jury should be so instructed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Floyd County.

Action by Rufus Blackburn against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Worthington, Cochran, Browning & Reed, of Maysville, and Kirk & Kirk, of Paintsville, for appellant.

A. J. May, of Prestonsburg, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Rufus Blackburn, who owned a tract of land in Floyd county, adjoining the right of way of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, brought suit against the company to recover damages for injury to his property caused by fire. The acts of negligence relied on were defective spark arresters, negligent operation, and permitting combustible material to accumulate on the right of way. In his petition the damages were itemized as follows: Injury to timber, $720; burning about 200 panels of rails, $100; burning 25 panels of partnership fence, $12.50; burning and injuring 500 yards of wire fence, $50. The company filed an answer, denying the allegation of the petition. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $700. The company appeals.

[1] The first contention of the company is that the verdict is excessive. Plaintiff testified that he owned 90 acres of young timber, consisting of black oak, white oak, chestnut, yellow locust, beech, and hickory. A large amount of the timber was completely destroyed, while a considerable portion of it was burned enough to kill it. After stating that he had handled timber for a number of years, and was familiar with the value and price of growing timber in that community, and that he was well enough acquainted with the timber in question to state what it was worth per acre, and how much of it had been injured, he was asked the following question:

"What, in your opinion, Mr. Blackburn, was the reasonable amount of injury to the property per acre, to the timber that was growing there, that was burned, destroyed, or injured?"

An objection was sustained to this question. Two other witnesses were also asked to state the extent of the damage to the timber, but a similar objection was sustained to their testimony. The result was that no witness gave the value of the timber before and after the fire, or stated any facts from which the jury could find the extent of the damage. True, there was evidence by plaintiff tending to show that the reasonable cost of replacing the 200 panels of rail fence was $500; yet plaintiff fixed his damages on this item at $100 and the entire damage to the fencing at $162.50. On the item of fencing, therefore, his recovery was limited to that amount of damages asked, or $162.50, and there being no satisfactory evidence tending to show the extent of the damage to the timber, it is clear that the verdict for $700 is excessive. O. & O. Railroad Co. v. Coleman, 184 Ky. 9, 210 S. W. 947.

[2] Another contention is that the recovery on each item of damage should have been limited by the instruction. The point is well taken. Since there was evidence tending to show that the damage to the fencing was largely in excess of the amount claimed in the petition, the jury had the right under the given instruction to exceed that amount, and it is altogether probable that they did so. Clearly, where the damages are itemized, and the amount of each item is fixed in the petition, the instruction should limit the recovery on each item to the amount claimed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

HAZEL v. McCULLOUGH et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Limitation of actions \S 25(3)—Action on note must be commenced within five years.

Under Ky. St. \S 2515, an action on a promissory note placed on the footing of a bill of exchange must be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrues.

2. Limitation of actions \S 25(3)—Notes negotiated before maturity become bills of exchange within five-year statute.

Notes which were not only negotiable, but were actually negotiated before maturity, were placed on the footing of a bill of exchange to bring them within the five-year statute of limitations, Ky. St. \S 2515.

3. Limitation of actions \S 167(1)—Lien securing notes barred with them.

Where notes were barred by limitations, the lien by which they were secured also was barred.

4. Limitation of actions \S 172—Defense of statute, though personal, can be set up by grantees or mortgagees.

The grantees or mortgagees of property subjected to liens by the owner with respect to the property, and notes secured by liens thereon, stand in his shoes, and can set up any defense, as the statute of limitations, that he might himself have set up, either to defeat recovery of the property or its sale on foreclosure.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Logan County.

Action by W. S. Hazel against J. W. McCullough and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Browder & Browder and Miriam O. Stevenson, both of Russellville, for appellant.

S. R. Crewdson, of Russellville, and J. J. Sweeney, of Owensboro, for appellees.

CLAY, C. On June 8, 1906, J. W. Cottrell and wife, by deed which was recorded on June 19, 1906, conveyed to D. N. Combs certain land located in Logan county. The consideration was $500 cash and three notes of D. N. Combs for $291.66% each, payable to the order of J. W. Cottrell and due in two, four, and six months after date, and secured by a lien on the land conveyed. In due course, for value and before their maturity, the notes were sold and transferred to the Owensboro Savings Bank & Trust Company, and were afterwards purchased by W. S. Hazel.

On July 29, 1907, D. N. Combs and wife conveyed the land to J. S. Cottrell, who in turn sold the land to J. W. McCullough on January 24, 1913, for a consideration then paid in full. Neither Cottrell nor McCullough assumed the payment of the notes in question, and since its purchase, McCullough has been in possession of the land.

Hazel brought suit against D. N. Combs, the maker of the notes, to recover on the notes and to enforce his vendor's lien. Combs made no defense. In addition to a personal judgment against Combs, plaintiff was awarded a lien on the land, and the land was ordered sold. The judgment directing a sale of the property was afterwards set aside, and an amended petition filed, making J. W. McCullough a party defendant. McCullough answered, and pleaded the five-year statute of limitations. His plea was sustained, and it was adjudged that plaintiff has no lien on the land. Plaintiff appeals.

[1-3] Under our statute, an action upon a promissory note, placed upon the footing of a bill of exchange, must be commenced within five years next after the cause of action accrued. Section 2515, Kentucky Statutes; Southern National Bank v. Schimpeler, 160 Ky. 813, 170 S. W. 178. The notes in question were not only negotiable, but were actually negotiated before their maturity, and were therefore placed upon the footing of a bill of exchange. As the suit was not brought within five years after the notes matured, they were barred by limitation, and, that being true, the lien by which they were secured was also barred. Tate v. Hawkins, 81 Ky. 577, 50 Am. Rep. 181; McCracken County v. Mercantile Trust Co., 84 Ky. 344, 1 S. W. 585, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 314; Ewell v. Daggs, 108 U. S. 143, 2 Sup. Ct. 408, 27 L. Ed. 682. Indeed, the foregoing rules are conceded by counsel for appellant, but it is insisted that they are not applicable to the facts of this case, because the plea of limitation is a personal one, and as Combs, the debtor, did not rely on the statute, McCullough, his vendee, cannot rely on it. In the case of Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482, Chief Justice Field used the following language:

"But it is said that the plea of the statute is a personal privilege of the party, and cannot be set up by a stranger. This, as a general rule, is undoubtedly correct with respect to personal obligations, which concern only the party himself, or with respect to property which the party possesses the power to charge or dispose of. But with respect to property placed by him beyond his control, or subjected by him to liens, he has no such personal privilege. He cannot at his pleasure affect the interests of other parties. His grantees or mortgagees, with respect to the property stand in his shoes, and can set up any defense that he might himself have set up to the action, either to defeat a recovery of the property or its sale."

[4] This view has been generally adopted by the courts (17 R. C. L. § 331, p. 963), and prevails in this state. Tate v. Hawkins, supra; Duvall v. Parepoint, 168 Ky. 11, 181 S. W. 653. It follows that the court did not err in sustaining McCullough's plea of limitation.

Judgment affirmed.

HOPKINS et al. v. DICKENS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 1, 1920.)

1. Statutes \S 181(1)—In interpreting a statute, intention of the Legislature should be ascertained.

To interpret a statute, it must be ascertained and determined what the Legislature meant and intended, as the intention of the Legislature is what statute law is.

2. Statutes \S 190—Where the language is plain and unambiguous, there is no room for judicial construction.

Where the language of a statute is plain and unambiguous and only one meaning can fairly be deduced from it, there is nothing for the courts to do but to give it such meaning, and there is no room for judicial construction.

3. Statutes \S 181(1)—Where ambiguous intent ascertained from entire act and objects to be accomplished.

Where a statute is ambiguous and uncertain, the legislative intentment may be ascertained from a consideration of all of the provisions of the act, and in ascertaining such intent the objects to be accomplished, the occasion of the enactment of the statute, as well as other existing legislation upon the subject may be considered.

4. Statutes \S 183—Not given a literal construction defeating intent.

A statute will not be given a literal construction, where such construction will defeat the intention of the Legislature or lead to an absurdity, and in such cases the real purpose of the Legislature will prevail over the literal import of the words.

5. Schools and school districts \S 42(2)—Petition for graded school district need not be signed by twenty-five per cent. of voters.

Ky. St. Supp. 1918, § 4464, declaring that it shall be the duty of the county judge in each county, on the written petition signed by at least 25 per cent. of the legal voters who are taxpayers in the justice's district, town, or city, etc., to make an order fixing the boundaries of any proposed graded common school district, etc., a petition for establishment of a graded common school district in a justice's district need not, in view of section 4168a3, providing for the establishment of graded common schools in cities of the first, second, third, and fourth classes, be signed by 25 per cent. of the voters of the entire justice's district, but the requirement should be construed as merely prescribing qualification of the petitioners, and the article "the," preceding justice's district, may be construed as "a."

6. Schools and school districts \S 42(2)—Petitioners for graded school district may sign separate petitions.

Where four petitions for a graded common school district, which were exact copies of each other, were circulated, and more than 25 per cent. of the legal voters who were taxpayers within the boundaries of the district signed some one of the petitions, those petitions may be treated as a single petition, sufficient basis for an election to establish the district.

7. Schools and school districts §42(2)—Approval of board and superintendent of graded common school district must be secured before county judge can act.

The written approval of the county board of education and the county superintendent of schools of a petition for the establishment of a common graded school district must be secured before the county judge can act on the petition and order an election.

8. Schools and school districts §48(6)—County board of education is corporation and must act as such.

The county board of education is a corporation as the trustees of a school district are a corporation, and must act as such, or else its acts are ineffectual.

9. Schools and school districts §48(6)—To act, quorum of county board must be present, and all members must have notice.

To act, the county board of education must have present a quorum of its members, and all must have had notice and opportunity to be present.

10. Schools and school districts §42(2)—Approval of petition for school district sufficient, though members of county board signed as individuals.

Where the county board of education adopted a resolution approving a petition for the creation of a common graded school district, which was duly entered upon its records and was subscribed by chairman and secretary, and each member of the county board indorsed on petition for establishment his approval, held that, as the board had adopted a resolution of approval, the written approval will be deemed sufficient; the matter being only one of intellectual approval.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clinton County.

Suit by G. D. Hopkins and others against W. A. Dickens and others, trustees of a graded common school district. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bertram & Bertram, of Monticello, for appellants.

Duncan & Bell, of Monticello, and J. G. Smith, of Albany, for appellees.

HURT, J. This appeal involves the validity of a proceeding which was instituted and terminated in the year 1919 under the provisions of section 4464, Ky. Stats. Supp. 1918, to establish a graded common school district, which includes within its boundaries the town of Albany, which is of the sixth class, and a certain portion of the adjacent territory, but all of the territory included in the proposed graded common school district is situated within the bounds of the same justice's district. The pleadings admit that the election, held within the proposed graded common school district by the legal voters thereof, to determine whether they would vote an annual tax upon the property and polls of white persons and corporations within the district for the purpose of maintaining a graded common school and for the erection, purchasing, or repairing of suitable buildings therefor, if necessary, and for the selection of trustees, was held on April 19, 1919, and resulted in a majority in favor of the imposition of the tax and the establishment of the district. Thereafter another election was held in the district upon the proposition whether or not the trustees should be authorized to issue bonds of the district in an amount not exceeding the limit provided by sections 157 and 158 of the present Constitution of this state, for the purpose of providing suitable grounds, school buildings, furnishing, and apparatus for the district, and that at such election two-thirds of the voters voting at the election voted in favor of the issue of the bonds. The latter election, as we presume, was held under the provisions of section 4481, Ky. Stats., and in accordance with the requirements of that statute. At least there is no complaint made of any irregularity touching that election. The appellants, who were the plaintiffs below, however, assail the validity of both elections upon the grounds that the district was not established in accordance with the law, and that the county court had not jurisdiction of the subject-matter when it entered its order defining the boundary of the district and directing the sheriff to open a poll and hold an election in the district as provided in section 4464, supra, the appellants alleging that both of the elections were void, and that the trustees, or pretended trustees, of the district were proceeding to levy and collect taxes as though the establishment of the district was valid, and sought to have them restrained from any further levies or collection of taxes upon the property or polls of the district, and to declare the entire proceedings null and void. A statement of facts was agreed upon by the parties to the following effect: (1) That the proposed graded common school district is within the boundaries of the First justice's district of Clinton county, and that the boundaries of the school district includes the whole of the town of Albany, which is a town of the sixth class; (2) that two-thirds of the territory included in the proposed graded common school district is without the corporate limits of the town of Albany; (3) that less than 25 per centum of the legal voters and taxpayers residing in the First justice's district subscribed the pe-tion asking for the establishment of a graded common school district, but that more than 25 per centum of the legal voters and taxpayers, within the boundary of the proposed graded common school district, subscribed the petition asking for the establishment of the district.

Upon the record made the cause was submitted, and the court adjudged that the plaintiffs, who were voters and taxpayers within the proposed graded common school district, had failed to manifest any right to the relief sought, and dismissed the petition, and furthermore adjudged that the bonds proposed to be issued were valid obligations of the district, and that in the levying and collection of the taxes the trustees in the district were within their authority. The plaintiffs have appealed from that judgment, and insist that the judgment of the circuit court was erroneous, in that the county court, when it made the order fixing the boundary of the district and ordered the sheriff to hold an election as provided by section 4464, supra, was without jurisdiction to do so, and hence that all the proceedings thereafter were invalid. The jurisdiction exercised by the county court is assailed upon three grounds: (1) The petition, upon which the board of education and the county superintendent of schools indorsed their approval, was subscribed by only three petitioners, which was admittedly an insufficient number to give the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter; (2) the county board of education did not indorse its approval of the establishment of the district and its boundaries upon the petition in writing; (3) the petition upon which the court acted was not subscribed by 25 per centum of the legal voters who were taxpayers in the justice's district within the boundaries of which the graded common school district was proposed to be established.

[1-5] (a) The determination of the merits of the third ground upon which the jurisdiction of the county court is denied depends upon the construction to be placed and the interpretation made of section 4464, supra. The section in part reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the county judge in each county of this commonwealth, upon a written petition signed by at least twenty-five per cent. of legal voters who are taxpayers in the justice's district, town or city of the fifth or sixth class in his county to make an order on his order book, at the next regular term of his court after he receives said petition, fixing the boundary of any proposed graded common school district, as agreed on by the county judge and the petitioners, and directing the sheriff or other officers, whose duty it may be to hold the election, to open a poll in said proposed graded common school district, at the next regular state, town or city election to be held therein, or on any other day fixed by said judge in said order, not in either case earlier than forty days from the date of said order, for the purpose of taking the sense of the legal white voters in said proposed graded common school district upon the proposition whether or not they will vote an annual tax, in any sum named in said order, not exceeding fifty cents on each one hundred dollars of property assessed in said proposed graded common school district, town or city belonging to said white voters or corporations, or a poll tax in any sum named in said order not exceeding one dollar and fifty cents per capita on each white male inhabitant over twenty-one years of age residing in said proposed graded common school district, or both an ad valorem and a poll tax, if so stated in the order, for the purpose of maintaining a graded common school in said proposed graded common school district, and for erecting, purchasing or repairing suitable buildings therefor if necessary."

A proviso in the section is to the following effect:

"Provided, that the proposition to establish any graded common school, as provided for in this section, * * * that no point on the boundary of any proposed graded common school district be more than two and one-half miles from the site of the school building," etc.

It must necessarily be conceded that the county court is without authority to fix the boundaries of a proposed graded common school district, or order an election held therein, as provided, in the statute, supra, until the county judge shall have received a petition signed by the number of persons and with the qualifications required. The qualifications prescribed for the persons who sign the petition are that they must be legal voters, and also taxpayers, in a justice's district, or in a town or city of the fifth or sixth class, in the county. The number of the signers must be "twenty-five per cent. of the legal voters, who are taxpayers," etc., and the point about which the contention here arises is whether they must constitute 25 per centum of the legal voters who are taxpayers in the proposed graded common school district, or whether they must be 25 per cent. of all the legal voters who are taxpayers in the justice's district, or town, in which the district is proposed to be established. If the statute requires the signers of the petition to amount in number to 25 per centum of the legal voters who are taxpayers in the proposed district, it is conceded that the petition in the instant case was amply sufficient. If it requires the signatures of 25 per centum of the legal voters who are taxpayers in the town of Albany, or in the magisterial district, within the boundaries of which the proposed district is situated, the petition was not sufficiently signed, and the county court was without jurisdiction to order the election, or to do anything, except to deny the application. To interpret the statute, it must be ascertained and determined what the Legislature meant and intended, touching the requirement in issue, as the intention of the Legislature is what statute law is. Com. v. International Harvester Co., 131 Ky. 551, 115 S. W. 703, 133 Am. St. Rep. 256; Maysville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Herrick, 13 Bush, 122; Bailey v. Com., 11 Bush, 688. Of course, if the language of a statute is plain and unambiguous, and only one meaning can be fairly deduced from it, there is nothing for the courts to do but to give it such meaning, and there is no room for any judicial construction. Gains v. Gains, 2 A. K. Marsh, 190, 12 Am. Dec. 375; Adams Express Co. v. Ky., 238 U. S. 190, 35 Sup. Ct. 824, 59 L. Ed. 1267, L. R. A. 1916C, 273, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 1167; Deposit Bank v. Daviess County, 102 Ky. 174, 39 S. W. 1030, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 248, 44 L. R. A. 825. If, however, there is ambiguity and uncertainty of the legislative meaning from the literal meaning of the language or other reason, the legislative intentment may be ascertained from a consideration of all the provisions of the act together, as well as the objects intended to be accomplished by it, the occasion of its enactment, other existing legislation upon the same subject at the time of the enactment, the legislative policy and previous legislation upon the subject, and the result, if a construction contended for is upheld; and from all these sources, if necessary, the true legislative intention may be gathered, and any construction which is contrary to the obvious intention of the Legislature, or which will lead to an absurdity, rejected.

A well-known rule of construction of an ambiguous statute is that when the intention of the Legislature is obvious, but the language used, if given its literal meaning, will defeat the intention, the real purpose of the Legislature should be allowed to prevail over the literal import of the words. Brown v. Thompson, 14 Bush, 538, 29 Am. Rep. 416; Lanferman v. Vanzile, 150 Ky. 751, 150 S. W. 1008, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 563. Hence the courts have often substituted the word "and" for "or," and "or" for "of," and have disregarded words when the context showed that the use of the word employed was a manifest error or inadvertence.

It will be observed that the language of the statute in question is "upon a written petition signed by at least twenty-five per cent. of the legal voters who are taxpayers in the justice's district, town or city of the fifth or sixth class in his county," etc. This language, if allowed its literal signification, would imply that the Legislature was under the impression that only one justice's district, or only one town of the fifth or sixth class, was in a county, and it is manifest at once that the article "the" preceding the words "justice's district" was inadvertently used for the article "a." Substituting the article "a" for the article "the," it at once becomes apparent that the intention of the makers of the statute in the use of the words "legal voters, who are taxpayers in a justice's district, town or city of the fifth or sixth class, in his county," was not to prescribe a unit beyond the boundaries of which a proposed graded common school district should not go, or that the voters in such a unit should control the establishment of such a district, but the purpose was to prescribe a qualification for the petitioners; that is, in addition to being a legal voter and a taxpayer, he must reside in a justice's district, or in a town of the fifth or sixth class. This construction is fortified by the fact that at the legislative session of 1916, when section 4464, supra, was amended, and re-enacted, in its present form, section 4468a3 was also enacted, and which provides a method different from that provided by section 4464, supra, for the establishment of graded common schools in cities of the first, second, third, and fourth classes. The language above quoted from section 4464, supra, has been in such statute in its present form since its amendment in 1914, and both before and since that time its provisions by reason of other existing legislation have not applied to cities of the first, second, third, and fourth classes. Bailey v. Gigely, 106 Ky. 725, 51 S. W. 424, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 341; Trustees v. Stone, 142 Ky. 715, 135 S. W. 307; Read v. Smith, 106 S. W. 1182, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 116. The only voters and taxpayers, except those residing in cities of the first four classes, are those who reside in justice's districts, in the county, and in cities of the fifth and sixth classes, and, this statute not applying to citizens of cities of the first four classes, it was necessary to refer to the ones to whom the latter statute applied, in that statute, as persons who were legal voters and taxpayers, and therefore residents in a justice's district, or in a town of the fifth or sixth class. A reference to other provisions of section 4464, supra, shows indisputably that it was not the intention of the statute that the boundaries of a graded common school district should be confined within the limits of any one justice's district, or a town of the fifth or sixth class, exclusive of territory in a justice district, since the limits provided for by the act for such a school district was not the boundary line of a magisterial district, but it might extend to the distance of $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the site of the school building proposed for the district. The boundaries of the graded common school district is a subject of agreement between the county judge and the petitioners, with the approval of the board of education and the county superintendent of schools. There is no provision of the statutes which limits a graded common school district to the boundaries of a magisterial district, or of a town of the fifth or sixth class, and the uniform construction which has been given to section 4464, supra, by the officers and patrons of such schools, and in a number of cases assumed by this court, has been that a graded common school district may be established which includes towns of the fifth or sixth classes, and also adjoining territory, in one or more magisterial districts beyond the limits of the town. When the election is held to determine whether the proposed district shall be established, the only persons permitted to vote at such election are, if a white district, not the voters, within the justice's district or town, in which the proposed school district, or a part of it is situated, but the legal white voters residing within the boundaries of the proposed district. After the establishment of the school district, it is only the residents of it who are required to bear the taxation necessary to maintain its buildings and school, and to control the district. Hence we conclude that it is 25 per centum of the legal voters who are taxpayers within the boundaries of the proposed graded common school district only who must be signers of the petition, to give the county court jurisdiction of the matter. A different conclusion as to the persons necessary to be signers of the petition would lead to the following results: If the number of voters in a justice's district, or a town of the fifth or sixth class, were held to be units by which to determine, when a sufficient number of signers was secured to give the county court jurisdiction, the applicants would have to first elect where a town of the fifth or sixth class was situated, whether the proposed school district should be in the town, or should include territory outside of it, and if the town was selected as the unit, then to secure the signatures of 25 per centum of the voters and taxpayers of the town would be necessary to the petition whether they were all included in the proposed school district or not. If the justice's district was selected as the unit, then it would take 25 per centum of the voters and taxpayers within the magisterial district, although 75 per centum of them might reside without the limits of the proposed school district, and if the latter included portions of several magisterial districts, as it might, then it would require the signatures of 25 per centum of the voters and taxpayers of each of the magisterial districts to give the court jurisdiction, although a very small per centum of all would be in the proposed school district, or would be permitted to vote on the question of its establishment, or would ever have any interest in or control of it. Twenty-five per centum of the voters and taxpayers in a magisterial district could, under such a construction of the statute, require an election to be held for the establishment of a school district in a portion of the magisterial district wherein no one of the signers resided or was a taxpayer, and all the voters and taxpayers within the proposed school district be opposed to it. Applying to the words "twenty-five per cent. of the legal voters, who are taxpayers in the justice's district," etc., without reference to other provisions of the statute, their literal import would make it necessary to give the county court jurisdiction of the subject, to include in the computation to be made to determine when 25 per centum of the legal voters and taxpayers had signed the petition, the persons of color, as well as the white voters, which, in the view of all the legislation touching schools, no one would suppose that the Legislature contemplated. In view of the foregoing it seems very clear that the Legislature intended by the statute that to give the county court jurisdiction of the subject a petition signed by 25 per centum of the legal white voters who are taxpayers within the boundary of the proposed graded common school district only was necessary, where a white graded common school is desired, as in the present instance.

[8] The other two contentions of appellants will be considered together. Four petitions, which were exact copies of each other, were circulated, and more than 25 per centum of the legal white voters who were taxpayers, and who resided within the proposed school district signed one or the other of the petitions, but neither of the petitions alone had a sufficient number of signers. These petitions were treated as one petition, and were together presented to the board of education for its indorsement, and to the county judge. The statute requires that 25 per centum of the legal voters who are taxpayers within the proposed school district must petition for its establishment before the costs and trouble of an election are resorted to, and the names of the petitioners upon whose request the county court bases its actions must appear that the people of the proposed district may determine whether they are legal voters and taxpayers within the district, and two or more petitions identical in terms, and together signed by the requisite number, satisfies the requirements of the statute. Under the local option law, which required a petition subscribed by 25 per centum of the voters in a district to be affected to be presented to the county judge, requesting the holding of an election upon the subject of the sale of spirituous liquors, in order to authorize the county judge to order the election to be held, it was held that two or more petitions, which together were subscribed by the requisite number of persons, satisfied the requirements of the statute. The same reasons would satisfy the statute, in ordering an election for the establishment of a graded common school district. Slith v. Patton, 103 Ky. 444, 45 S. W. 459, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 165; Tousey v. De Huy, 62 S. W. 1118, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 458.

[7] The statute requires the petition to be approved in writing by the county board of education and the county superintendent of schools before the county judge is authorized to act upon it. That such approval must exist to give the county court jurisdiction there is no doubt. Under a former statute, when the approval of a school trustee whose district was affected by the proposed creation of a graded common school district was necessary, it was held that the failure of the applicants to secure such approval was fatal to the proceedings, and the same has been held with reference to the approval of the county board of education under the present statute. Kattawa Common School District v. Trustee, etc., 99 S. W. 905, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 839; Mullins v. Andrews, 45 S. W. 231, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 20; Conrad v. Poole, 184 Ky. 348, 211 S. W. 874.

[8-10] In the instant case, the board of education at a meeting held for the purpose adopted a resolution approving the creation of the proposed graded common school and the boundaries of it, which was duly entered upon its records, and was subscribed by its chairman and secretary, but at the same time the approval, which it placed in writing upon the petition, was written upon one of the petitions only, and was signed by each of the members of the board with his name, followed by a statement that he was a member by reason of being the chairman of a designated educational division. It is insisted that, the board of education being a corporation, it could act only as such, and that the approval indorsed upon the petition was not the act of the board, but the separate act of each of its individual members, and that the approval should have been subscribed by the board by its chairman and attested by its secretary. True the board is a corporation, and so declared by statute, as the trustees of a school district are a corporation, and must act as such, or else its acts are ineffectual. The board to act must have present a quorum of its members, and all must have had notice or opportunity to be present. Shore v. Langston, 125 Ky. 816, 102 S. W. 236, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 388; Scott v. Pendley, 114 Ky. 606, 71 S. W. 647, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1431; Shepherd v. Gambill, 75 S. W. 223, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 333; Creech v. Trustees, 102 S. W. 804, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 379. A distinction must, however, be drawn between the manner required of the board when transacting its business touching contracts and performing its fiscal duties and such an act as approving the creation of a graded common school district. In the latter instance it is only its intellectual approval that is required in order that it may maintain a proper control over the schools and educational interests of the county. In such case a substantial compliance with the statute satisfies it. In De Haven v. Hardinsburg, etc., 164 Ky. 515, 175 S. W. 994, which involved the sufficiency of an indorsement of approval by a school trustee of the petition for the creation of a graded common school district, this court said:

"We are not disposed to hold that the same formalities should attend the approval of such a petition as are held to be necessary in the execution of ordinary legal documents."

The members of the board of education in the instant case, acting as the board, at a meeting held for the purpose, indorsed its approval in writing upon one of the petitions, therein referring to the other as copies of it, and extending its approval to all, and then each member of the board signed the writing. The superintendent of schools also indorsed his approval at the same time, and thus the written approval was subscribed by not only the chairman and secretary, but each member, of the board, though the signatures of the chairman and secretary did not purport to be subscribed as such, but as members of the board, which they were. This was a compliance with the statute, for all the purposes for which the approval of the board of education is required. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

JOHNSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 4, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §938(1)—New trial will be granted for material new evidence probably affecting result.

While courts are somewhat reluctant to grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence, they will grant a new trial for such evidence if its materiality and probable effect are such that a manifest injustice would be committed to disallow the new trial.

2. Criminal law §938(1)—Cumulative evidence which probably would change verdict requires new trial.

While a new trial will not be granted as a general rule to accused for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative only, it will be granted where the evidence, though somewhat cumulative, is of so controlling a character that it would possibly change the verdict.

3. Homicide §319—Newly discovered evidence which would reduce degree of homicide requires new trial.

Where the newly discovered evidence, though insufficient to establish a possibility that accused would be acquitted on a new trial, is sufficient to make it probable that a verdict for a lesser degree of homicide than murder in the first degree would be rendered, it is sufficient to require a new trial after verdict of first degree murder fixing the penalty at death.

4. Homicide \S 319—Newly discovered evidence cumulative to defendant's testimony held sufficient to require new trial.

Where defendant was convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to death, newly discovered evidence by two witnesses that they heard the conversation to which defendant testified and in which deceased made scurrilous remarks about defendant's sister would be sufficient, if true, to reduce the offense to manslaughter and requires the granting of a new trial.

5. Criminal law \S 944—Credibility of witnesses not determined on motion for new trial for new evidence.

On a motion for a new trial of a criminal prosecution for newly discovered evidence, where the affidavits of both sides as to the character of the new witnesses was about equal in volume and weight, the credibility of their testimony will not be determined in deciding the motion, but will be left for the jury at the new trial.

6. Criminal law \S 722 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Prosecuting attorney cannot charge accused with degrading offense not supported by record.

It is misconduct for the prosecuting attorney in his argument to charge the accused with an independent degrading offense which is not supported by the testimony.

7. Criminal law \S 304(4), 722 $\frac{1}{2}$ —Court judicially knows that "bootlegger" is unlawful liquor seller, and prosecutor should not refer to defendant in such terms in absence of evidence.

The Court of Appeals may take judicial notice that the term "bootlegger" refers to one engaged in the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and that in some communities would cause the jury to regard the person so engaged with contempt and prejudice, so that it was prejudicial error for prosecuting attorney to state without evidence that defendant accused of murder was a bootlegger.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Bootlegger.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bourbon County.

Oscar N. Johnson was convicted of murder in the first degree and his punishment fixed at death, and he appeals. Reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

Edwin P. Morrow, of Somerset, and O. T. Hinton, of Paris, for appellant.

Charles I. Dawson, Atty. Gen., and T. B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

THOMAS, J. The grand jury of Bourbon county returned an indictment against the appellant, Oscar N. Johnson, charging him with murdering Walter Rice, which occurred at about 7 p. m. on January 29, 1918, in the restaurant of A'Hern & Burton, located at the corner of Tenth and Pleasant streets in the city of Paris, Ky. Appellant entered a plea of not guilty, but upon his trial the jury convicted him and fixed his punishment at death. His motion for a new trial having been overruled, he prosecutes this appeal, relying upon three grounds for a reversal: (1) Error of the court in failing to grant him a new trial because of newly discovered material evidence which he did not and could not discover before the trial by the use of ordinary diligence; (2) misconduct of the commonwealth's attorney in his closing argument to the jury; and (3) actual bias of two of the jurors who sat in the case, as shown by the affidavits of witnesses discovered after the trial that the two jurors had formed and expressed an opinion adverse to the appellant before being accepted on the jury.

A disposition of ground 1 requires a brief statement of the substantial facts as shown by the record. Appellant was about 30 years of age and unmarried, while the deceased was 36 years of age, married, and resided at Livingston, Ky. They were both employed by the railroad company, appellant as a brakeman, and the deceased as a fireman. They were and had been acquainted with each other for some 4 or 5 years. They frequently met, and there is nothing in the testimony showing that there was any ill feeling between them, or that they sustained to each other anything less than the most cordial relations.

There appears to be some kind of division railroad office located at Paris, where the appellant resided, and the deceased was on the fatal day consulting with some of the railroad officers relative to being promoted from the position of fireman to that of engineer, and was in Paris on that day for that purpose. The appellant was not at work, because he was to be examined on that day for acceptance or rejection as a member of the army under the draft law.

About 8 o'clock in the morning, appellant being as he says more or less disturbed over the prospects of being taken into the army, took one drink of whisky given him in a barber shop, and later in the day he bought some from a bootlegger and took several drinks of that. About 4 o'clock in the afternoon he and the deceased met at the restaurant where the homicide occurred, and according to the testimony of some five or six witnesses introduced by the commonwealth they were talking pleasantly together, and in the language of the witnesses were "going in and out frequently," when about 7 o'clock, while the deceased was talking to a drummer and was eating some peanuts, the appellant came into the restaurant and shot him twice, without any words passing between them. Immediately Mr. Burton, one of the proprietors of the restaurant, and as soon as he could, grabbed the appellant, who still had his pistol in his hand, and the latter said, "This man has said enough for me to kill him." Burton asked for a surrender of the pistol, but appellant said to him, "No, I am not going to shoot any more." He then left the restaurant and went to the barber shop, about one square distant, and inquired if his nephew, a young Mr. York, was there, or had been there. He then came back to the restaurant with his pistol in his hand and requested that the police be telephoned for because he wanted to surrender. He was taken to the jail, where he has remained since.

In explanation of this apparent premeditated murder, the appellant testified: That he had known the deceased as above stated. That he was the youngest of a family of 13 children, the most of whom were girls, and that he was very much attached to his brothers and sisters, particularly to the latter. That about four years prior to the homicide the deceased had worked as an engineer at the plant of the Bond Lumber Company at Bonds, Ky., in the neighborhood of which the appellant, his brothers and sisters, were born and reared. One of his sisters married a man by the name of Dave York, and he says that some three or four years prior to the homicide the deceased got into a conversation with him in which the former asked him if he knew Mrs. Dave York, and the deceased stated that she was running a disorderly house at Bonds, and in substance that she was unchaste and without virtue, using in the conversation, as testified to by appellant, language which we will not copy in this opinion. The appellant says that he did not then state to the deceased that Mrs. York was his sister, because he was somewhat wrought up and he thought it would be necessarily embarrassing, but he denied the charge and asserted that Mrs. York was a virtuous woman and he could prove it. He afterward got affidavits denying the charges made by deceased, including one from the man with whom he particularly charged Mrs. York with being familiar, and brought that information to the knowledge of the deceased, who, according to the appellant, accepted it as true, and there was never afterward anything said between the parties concerning the matter until a few minutes or seconds preceding the shooting. He said that he entertained no malice nor any unkind feeling toward the deceased until the conversation immediately preceding the killing, which conversation was to this effect: That he walked out of the restaurant intending to telephone his boarding house that he perhaps would not be there for supper, and that deceased followed him out on the pavement and asked him what he (appellant) thought of his (deceased's) chances to be promoted from fireman to engineer, in answer to which appellant said in substance, "I don't see why you wouldn't stand a good chance for promotion, since you have been a good fireman, and had experience as an engineer down at Bonds," and that upon the mention of the name "Bonds" the conversation turned to the subject as to when either of them had been up there, deceased saying that he had not been there for some time, but was intending to go soon; that there was a woman up there, Mrs. Dave York, that he wanted to see, and used language describing the cheapness of her virtue, saying that he had the price, etc., and used with reference to her such scurrilous and slanderous language that we will not here incorporate it, whereupon the defendant replied, "You are a damn liar, you are drunk," when the deceased said, "Go home," and turned and went into the restaurant. Appellant said that he became so enraged that he did not remember what happened after that until he fired the second shot, but he went almost immediately thereafter into the restaurant and committed the homicide. His explanation of his conduct is that he was so shocked and enraged at the accusation against his sister by the deceased after what had occurred some years before that he lost consciousness, and his attorneys insist that this, coupled with his partially intoxicated condition, produced emotional insanity sufficient to excuse him from the guilty consequences of his deed.

While some few witnesses, who are shown not to be on the best terms with appellant, testified to his bad character for peace and order, the greater weight of the testimony is that he was both peaceable and orderly in his association with his fellows; that he was industrious and energetic; that he possessed an excitable nature, was very much attached to his sisters, and would naturally become angry when their reputations were assailed.

In support of his motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, appellant filed the affidavits of Thomas Gregory and J. B. Barrett, both of whom were unacquainted with either the appellant or deceased, and in which affidavits they state in substance that they were both in the city of Paris on the day in question, and that they were on their way to the depot, when, between 6 and 7 o'clock, they passed the restaurant in question and saw two men standing in front of it near a telephone pole, and that in passing they heard the substance of the conversation testified to by appellant as having occurred between him and the deceased just in front of the restaurant, with reference to Mrs. York. The two affiants, after getting to the depot, and before the arrival of the train upon which they expected to depart, heard of a shooting down in town; but they did not connect it with the conversation they had heard, and went away. With these affidavits there was also filed that of the appellant, as well as one by his attorney in which it appears that appellant had stated to his attorney that persons passed on the pavement at the time of that conversation, but that appellant did not know any of them, and the attorney had made a number of visits to surrounding towns and had exercised extraordinary diligence to discover some one who might have passed and heard the whole or a part of that conversation, but without avail.

After appellant was convicted, he addressed a pamphlet to the public in which he depicted his unfortunate situation and appealed for sympathy, as well as financial aid in prosecuting his defense, and one of these pamphlets seems to have come to the notice of Thomas Gregory, and from the statements made in it Gregory said that he became convinced that the conversation which he and Barrett heard in front of the restaurant was the one mentioned by appellant, and he afterwards divulged it, and in that manner his and Barrett's testimony was discovered, and all of which occurred after the trial. So that there neither can be nor is there any complaint concerning the question of diligence in the discovery of that testimony. The only questions are: Is it relevant and material, and, if so, is it to be rejected because it might be considered cumulative?

[1, 2] As a general proposition, courts are somewhat reluctant to grant a new trial upon this ground, because it is one which opens a ready door, not only for the commission of perjury, but for the perpetration of fraud by the party relying upon it. Notwithstanding, however, such reluctance, the courts will unhesitatingly grant a new trial for newly discovered evidence, when on account of its materiality and probable effect a manifest injustice would be committed to disallow it, and it may also here be stated that while this court, as well as others, announce and apply the general rule that a new trial will not be granted for newly discovered evidence which is cumulative only, still that rule is not of universal application, and where the newly discovered evidence, although to some extent cumulative in its nature, is of so controlling a character as that it would possibly change the verdict, it would be prejudicial error to refuse a new trial based on this ground. For authorities sustaining these general propositions, we refer to 16 Corpus Juris, 1191-1201; 20 R. C. L. 289, 296, 297; Gravitt v. Commonwealth, 184 Ky. 429, 212 S. W. 430; Crouch v. Commonwealth, 172 Ky. 463, 189 S. W. 698; C. N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Cecil, 164 Ky. 377, 175 S. W. 664; and other Kentucky cases cited in the notes of the publications referred to.

convicted for killing a man by the name of Wills. The shooting occurred near the depot, and when it was practically dark. The son of deceased had been arrested by officers for some misdemeanor, and the father was making demonstrations to take him away from the officers, when the defendant Crouch, according to his testimony, asked the deceased to stay back and not interfere with the officers who arrested the boy, when the deceased cursed and drew a pistol and was about to fire when defendant shot him. After the trial he discovered a witness by the name of Ferguson, who it seems was a prospective passenger waiting for the train and was standing close enough to see what occurred, and his affidavit corroborated the testimony of the defendant Crouch. A new trial was sought, and among the grounds relied on was the newly discovered testimony of Ferguson. There was no question of want of diligence in that case, as there is none in this case; but the judgment of conviction was reversed solely upon the ground of newly discovered testimony, although it was in its nature cumulative to that given by the defendant. The court in commenting upon the newly discovered testimony, its nature, materiality, and probable effect, said:

"The testimony, which Ferguson proposes to give, bears upon the decisive facts of the homicide and from them the guilt or innocence of appellant can be most certainly determined. It is not cumulative or for the purpose of impeaching any witness, who testified upon the trial. The witnesses who testified upon the trial, with the exception of Freeman Wills, deposed that they either did not or could not, at the time the mortal wounds were given, see the appellant and the deceased, and it is reasonable to conclude that other persons, if any there were, who may have been about the depot, did not and could not see what transpired. The testimony of Ferguson will strongly corroborate that of appellant."

In the Cecil Case, this court, quoting from the case of Torain v. Terrell, 122 Ky. 745, 93 S. W. 10, said:

"The rule that newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative is not ground for a new trial allows of some exceptions. For instance, the rule does not apply if the newly discovered evidence, though cumulative, is sufficient to render clear that which was before a doubtful case, or if it is of a conclusive or decisive character, or of so controlling a character it would probably change the verdict. * * * Applications for new trials are addressed to the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised according to the rules and usages of law, and the court should regard the substantial justice of the case, equally remote from favoring negligence or exacting unreasonable diligence."

ers, 95 Ky. 128, 23 S. W. 957, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 477; Berberich v. Louisville Bridge Co., 46 S. W. 691, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 487; and Owsley v. Owsley, 77 S. W. 397, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1186.

[3] If the newly discovered testimony is material upon any vital issue in the case, and it is otherwise admissible, the fact that it is not directed to the establishment of the defendant's innocence of all crime will not cure the error in refusing to sustain the motion for a new trial therefor if the newly discovered evidence is directed to an issue which, if established, would reduce the degree of the crime as well as lessen the punishment inflicted. The question of supreme interest to a defendant in a criminal prosecution is, first, to establish his innocence of any crime, but, if he should be unable to do that, he is next interested in reducing his offense to the lowest one for which he could be convicted under the indictment, and in capital cases the one is about of as much importance to him as the other. Thus, in 16 Corpus Juris, 1208, the text says:

"Where newly discovered evidence will probably change the result to a verdict more favorable to defendant, a new trial should be granted." Crouch v. Commonwealth, supra, and Brooks v. Commonwealth, 144 Ky. 107, 137 S. W. 867.

In the same volume of Corpus Juris, on page 1209, in speaking of the rule with reference to capital cases, it is said:

"In a capital case even a grave doubt created by the newly discovered evidence may, in the interest of justice, require a new trial. Where the new evidence is not alone sufficient to require a new trial, nevertheless it may be considered in connection with other errors and irregularities on the trial as bearing on a defendant's right to a new trial."

[4] Whether the effect of the conversation immediately preceding the killing testified to by appellant alone, but which he seeks to corroborate by the discovered witnesses, would be sufficient to authorize a verdict of acquittal, is a question with which we are not concerned; it being exclusively for the determination of the jury. But can we say that the establishment of that conversation would not affect the verdict in either reducing the severity of the punishment or the degree of guilt? Manifestly not. To do so would plainly ignore our knowledge of human nature obtained from observation and experience. That knowledge teaches us that the conversation with reference to appellant's sister, if it occurred in the manner and at the time testified to by him, would have a tendency at least to provoke and anger the deceased to such an extent as to authorize the jury to find that he did not commit the deed with which he is charged with that degree of maliciousness and premeditation essential to the crime of murder, but that, on the contrary, he acted under sudden heat and passion, which, if true, would reduce his offense to that of voluntary manslaughter. Out of the frailties of our nature grows the distinction between the two grades of homicide, which distinction, from the dictates of reason and justice, has long been recognized and established as a part of the criminal law. Without further discussion, we conclude that a new trial should have been granted on this ground.

[5] Much evidence in the way of affidavits was introduced by both sides touching the character of the affiants Gregory and Barrett, and we might say that it was about equal in volume and weight; but whether their testimony is or not credible will be a question for the jury upon another trial, and not one for us to determine at this time.

[6] To sustain ground 2 urged for a reversal, the bill of evidence shows a number of remarks made by the commonwealth's attorney in his closing argument to the jury, of which complaint is made; but the only one we deem necessary to notice is that one charging defendant with being a "bootlegger." He also charged appellant with being a "pistol toter," and there was some evidence introduced to establish his reputation for that offense. This, however, was given by witnesses who were not on friendly terms with him. He admitted having the pistol on the occasion complained of, but explains that in finishing his run, which was Paris, on the evening before, he left his pistol in his overcoat pocket, and which he carried for the purpose of protecting himself in going from the railroad yards to his boarding house against waylayers and robbers with which the community was infested at that time. It is doubtful whether it is competent to prove one's reputation for a specific offense; but, waiving that, we are convinced that there was absolutely no testimony in the record, direct or circumstantial, supporting the charge made by the commonwealth's attorney that appellant was a bootlegger. This court has time and again prescribed the limits within which counsel in their argument to the jury should be confined, and the general rule gathered from all the cases is that the proper bounds are overstepped when counsel goes outside of the record for the purpose of abusing and vilifying the opposing client and transgresses his rights and duties when he accuses such client of being guilty of a degrading offense to support which there is no testimony of any character in the record. Some of the cases from this court dealing with this question are Gilbert v. Commonwealth, 106 Ky. 919, 51 S. W. 804, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 544; Wilson v. Commonwealth, 54 S. W. 946, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1333; Allen v. Commonwealth, 145 Ky. 409, 140 S. W. 527; Slaughter v. Commonwealth, 149 Ky. 5, 147 S. W. 751; Turpin v. Commonwealth, 140 Ky. 294, 130 S. W. 1086, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 794, 140 Am.

St. Rep. 378; Howerton v. Commonwealth, 129 Ky. 482, 112 S. W. 606, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 1008; Rhodes v. Commonwealth, 107 Ky. 534, 54 S. W. 170, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1070, 92 Am. St. Rep. 360; Stroud v. Commonwealth, 160 Ky. 503, 169 S. W. 1021; and Stearns Coal & Lbr. Co. v. Williams, 177 Ky. 698, 198 S. W. 54.

[7] The general tenor of all the cases cited, and others which might be, is that an attorney in his argument has no right to go outside of the record for the purpose of influencing the passions or prejudices of the jury, nor has he the right to assert as a material fact that which the testimony does not support, or which asserted fact is not to be deduced from other facts or circumstances proven, especially so if the statement consists in the unsupported charge that the one referred to is guilty of an independent offense calculated to render him obnoxious to the jury. It is a fact of which we may take judicial notice that the term "bootlegger" refers to one who engages in the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. We likewise know that in some communities, and with some people, scarcely any more opprobrious epithet could be applied to one than to call him a "bootlegger." In such communities and before such people it is not difficult to see that the accusation would be calculated to cause the jury to regard the defendant with contempt and prejudice and to cause them to render a verdict against him which they might not otherwise do. At any rate, it is impossible for us to say that such a charge would not so affect the verdict of the jury. It is sufficient for the purpose that the charge might produce upon the minds of the jury such adverse effect, and the objection to the statement should have been sustained and the jury admonished to not regard it. The court should have at least done this much, there having been no motion to discharge the jury and continue the case.

What has been said renders it unnecessary to discuss or determine the questions relied on by ground 3.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, with directions to grant the defendant a new trial, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

CASEY v. HART WALLACE & CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 8, 1920.)

1. Brokers \Leftrightarrow 60—Entitled to commission on obtaining binding contract which party refused to carry out.

Where customer was presented by brokers, and was accepted by landowner, and parties executed a valid and enforceable contract, brokers were entitled to their commission, even though the parties, through the fault of one or the other, afterwards refused to carry out the contract.

2. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 1033(6)—Refusal to instruct harmless, where given instruction was more favorable.

Where the given instruction is more favorable to the defendant than the one requested, appellant cannot complain that the request was refused.

3. New trial \Leftrightarrow 42(4)—Remote relationship of party to juror not ground.

Court did not err in denying a new trial on the ground that one juror was a second cousin to the wife of one of the prevailing parties and to the mother of another prevailing party, where it was shown that there was an estrangement between the families, and that one of the prevailing parties had never been in the juror's home, and the other had been there only once in 20 years.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby County.

Action by Hart Wallace & Co. against F. M. Casey. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Beard and George L. Pickett, of Shelbyville, for appellant.

Beckham & Gilbert, of Shelbyville, for appellees.

CLAY, C. F. M. Casey owned a farm in Shelby county, which he placed in the hands of Hart Wallace & Co. for sale at the price of $165 an acre. The agents showed the farm to R. S. and J. A. Scobee, who thereupon entered into a written contract with Casey and wife for the purchase of the farm. The agents claimed that the agreed commission was 5 per cent. on the first $10,000 and 3 per cent. on the balance of the purchase price. When the trade was consummated, Casey gave the agents a check for $500, saying that he would see about the balance of the commission. The check was lost, but the agents say that it showed that the agreed commission was as claimed by the agents, and that the $500 was a payment on account. Casey says that the $500 payment was made on condition that it would be returned if the Scobees did not take the farm. After the contract was executed, some question arose as to one of the lines of the survey, and after some discussion of the matter the trade was rescinded. Hart Wallace & Co. brought this suit to recover $239, the balance of the commission. Casey not only resisted the claim of plaintiffs, but counterclaimed for the $500 which he paid to them. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs. Casey appeals.

[1] The point is made that defendant's motion for a peremptory instruction should have been sustained, because the sale was never consummated. In support of this position it is argued that plaintiffs were not entitled to a commission until they produced a customer ready, able, and willing to take and pay for the property, which they failed to do. This contention overlooks the rule that a real estate broker may earn his commission, either by producing a person who is not only then, but at all times, ready, able, and willing to purchase the property on the prescribed terms, or by obtaining from the customer a binding contract which the landowner himself may enforce, in case of a breach or default in its terms. 4 R. C. L. p. 307; Randle v. Bloomfield, 146 Ky. 421, 142 S. W. 677; Coleman's Ex'r v. Meade, 13 Bush, 358; Watters v. Dancey, 23 S. D. 481, 122 N. W. 430, 139 Am. St. Rep. 1071. Here the customers presented by plaintiffs were accepted by defendant, and the parties executed a valid and enforceable contract. That being true, plaintiffs were entitled to their commission, even though the parties, through the fault of one or the other, afterwards refused to carry out the trade. 4 R. C. L. p. 310; Moore v. Irwin, 89 Ark. 289, 116 S. W. 662, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1168, 131 Am. St. Rep. 97; Richardson v. Olanthe Milling Elevator Co., 167 Ala. 411, 52 South. 659, 140 Am. St. Rep. 45. It follows that the court did not err in refusing the peremptory asked for by defendant.

It being immaterial whether the failure to consummate the trade was due to the fault of defendant, or to the Scobeys, the court did not err in refusing to permit defendant to tell what took place between him and the Scobeys with reference to their refusal to accept the deed.

Only two instructions were given to the jury. In instruction No. 1, the only question submitted was whether the agreed commission was 5 per cent. on the first $10,000 of the purchase price and 3 per cent. on the balance of the purchase price. The jury were told that, if they so believed from the evidence, they should find for plaintiffs, but, unless they so believed they should find for defendant. The second instruction submitted to the jury the question whether plaintiffs agreed with the defendant, at the time the defendant delivered the check for $500, that if the purchaser did not take the farm they would return the $500 to him. Instruction No. 1 is attacked on the ground that it assumed that plaintiffs had earned their commission. For the reasons given above, there was no error in this.

[2] Another contention is that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that plaintiff agreed to sell the farm of defendant at $165 per acre, and no specified commission was agreed on, then they should find for plaintiff such a sum as would reasonably compensate plaintiff for his services."

Since instruction No. 1 authorized a finding for plaintiffs only in the event the jury believed from the evidence that the agreed commission was 5 per cent. on the first $10,000 of the purchase price and 3 per cent. on the balance, the necessary effect of the instruction was to require a finding for defendant in every other case. That being true, the given instruction not only included the defense presented by the offered instruction, but was much more favorable to the defendant, since, if the commission had not been agreed on, there might have been finding for plaintiffs under the offered instruction, but not under the given instruction.

[3] Another ground urged for reversal is the relationship of one of the jurors to plaintiffs. It appears that the wife of one of the jurors was a second cousin to the wife of one of the plaintiffs and to the mother of another plaintiff. It was shown, however, that there was an estrangement between the families, and that one of the plaintiffs had never been in the juror's home, and the other had been there only once in 20 years. In view of these circumstances, and the remoteness of the relationship, we conclude that the court did not err in refusing defendant a new trial because of such relationship.

Judgment affirmed.

REED et al. v. ROSE, Judge.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. June 15, 1920.)

Courts \Leftarrow 74—Circuit court will not divide its time between county seat and third-class city not wholly within the county.

The circuit court of the county of Whitley will not divide its time between the city of Corbin and the county seat, though Corbin is a city of the third class; notwithstanding Ky. St. § 963d, requiring circuit court of counties having a city of third class to divide its time between such city and county seat; such statute being applicable only where the city of the third class is entirely within the borders of the county, and the city of Corbin not being wholly within Whitley county.

Prohibition by M. D. Reed and others against R. S. Rose, Judge, to prohibit defendant from holding any part of the Whitley county circuit court in the city of Corbin. Writ made permanent, and defendant permanently enjoined from holding any terms or parts of terms of the Whitley circuit court in the city of Corbin.

Henry C. Gillis and Tye & Siler, all of Williamsburg, for petitioners.

J. B. Snyder, of Williamsburg, and M. A. Gray, of Corbin, for respondent.

M. A. Gray, of Corbin, and Hazelrigg & Hazelrigg, of Frankfort, for city of Corbin.

CARROLL, C. J. In 1910 the Legislature enacted a law, that may be found in section 963d of the Kentucky Statutes, providing in part "that, any county of this commonwealth having therein, or that may hereafter have therein, a city of the third class, not a county seat, and being more than ten miles from the county seat" the circuit court of such counties should be held alternately, so as to divide the time between the county seat and the third-class city. The Legislature of 1920 (Acts 1920, c. 164) put Corbin in cities of the third class, and therefore, if the city of Corbin was wholly within the county of Whitley, the section of the statute would require that the Whitley circuit court should be held in part in the city of Corbin.

After this act of 1920 became effective, the city of Corbin having complied with all of the other requirements of the act of 1910 necessary to enable it to secure terms of court, petitioned in the proper manner the respondent, Hon. R. S. Rose, judge of the Whitley circuit court, to hold terms of the Whitley circuit court, as required by the statute, in the city of Corbin, and Judge Rose, who was at the time holding a term of court in Williamsburg, the county seat of Whitley county, thereupon entered an order directing that parts of each term of the Whitley circuit court should be held at Corbin.

After this order was made, the plaintiffs, M. D. Reed and S. P. Petrey, respectively jailer and circuit clerk of Whitley county, filed their petition in this court asking that a writ of prohibition issue, prohibiting Judge Rose from holding any part of the Whitley circuit court in Corbin. To this petition Judge Rose filed a response, setting forth in substance that he conceived it to be his duty, under the law, to hold parts of the terms of the Whitley circuit court in the city of Corbin; and the city of Corbin also filed its petition to be made a party, setting up that, under the law and facts, parts of the term of the Whitley circuit court should be held in the city of Corbin and asking that the petition for a writ of prohibition be dismissed.

When the petition for a writ of prohibition was filed, a temporary restraining order was issued by this court, enjoining Judge Rose from holding any part of the terms of the Whitley circuit court in the city of Corbin until the case could be disposed of on its merits, and this we will now do.

It will be observed that the statute provides that courts shall be held in two places only in counties "having therein, or that may hereafter have therein," a city of the third class. It is therefore a condition precedent that the county in which it is sought to have terms of court held in two places must have therein a city of the third class, and so we will confine this opinion to the single question of whether Whitley county has therein a city of the third class, namely, the city of Corbin.

It is admitted of record that the city of Corbin has a population of 10,000; that the territorial limits of the city are partly in the counties of Whitley, Knox, and Laurel; that approximately one-third of the territory and population of the city is located in the county of Knox; that only a small part of the territory embraced in the city and a few hundred of its population is in the county of Laurel; that about two-thirds of the population and practically all of the business part of the city, including the public buildings, is in the county of Whitley.

On these facts we hold that the county of Whitley has not therein a city of the third class, and therefore Corbin is not entitled to terms of court. It is only when a county has entirely within its borders a city of the third class that such a city will be entitled under the statute to have held there at terms of the circuit court.

Wherefore the writ of prohibition is made permanent, and Judge Rose is permanently enjoined from holding any terms or parts of terms of the Whitley circuit court in the city of Corbin.

WOLF v. TERMINAL R. ASS'N OF ST. LOUIS.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Motion for Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ⇨302(1)—Scope of employment defined.

Whether a servant's act causing injury to a stranger was within the scope of his employment is not determined by the time nor his motive, but the question is whether the act was done by virtue of his employment and in furtherance of his master's business.

2. Master and servant ⇨302(2)—Switchmen lowering car gate to accommodate third person held not within scope of employment.

Where one unloading a box car placed a crate upon a gondola car on a parallel track and was injured by the fall of the tailgate of such car, which had been lowered by switchmen to facilitate the unloading of the gondola before they moved it, their act in lowering the gate was not within the scope of their employment; it operating to retard railroad's business rather than to aid it.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Benjamin J. Klene, Judge.

Action by Herman Wolf against the Terminal Railroad Association of St. Louis.
From an order overruling a motion to set aside an involuntary nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Brownrigg, Mason & Altman, of St. Louis, for appellant.

J. L. Howell and W. M. Hezel, both of St.
Louis, for respondent.

• BLAIR, P. J. This is an appeal from an order overruling a motion to set aside an involuntary nonsuit taken by appellant in an action he brought for damages he alleges he received when a tailgate, or end gate, in one of respondent's cars fell upon his feet while he was moving a piece of furniture out of the car.

Appellant testified he was a furniture mover in the employ of Lammert Furniture Company, and was sent, with a helper, to remove the furniture from one of respondent's box cars which stood upon a track in its yards. The team track was on the south side of the car. When the south car door was opened it was disclosed that the furniture car had been loaded from the other side and some of the furniture on that side would have to be moved before the crates next the south door could be loosened and taken out. Appellant's helper opened the north door of the car, and he and appellant lifted two crates of furniture out of that door and placed them on a gondola, or flat car, which stood immediately north of the furniture car on a track parallel to that on which the furniture car stood. This enabled appellant and his helper to "loosen up" other crates in the furniture car so they could load their wagon at the south door. This they did, but left room on the wagon for the two crates they had transferred to the gondola car. They then went to the gondola car and were about to unload from it the two crates they had placed upon it, when one of respondent's switching crews came up, and one of them said, "We are going to cut out those cars." Appellant replied, "All right, we have got two crates in there and we will take them out and put them on the end gate of my wagon;" and then lifted the lighter crate over the side of the car and "slid it down" the side to the ground. One of the switching crew then said, "Wait a minute, I'll show you an easier and faster way than that; you won't have to leave it off that end;" and he then pulled some pins or hooks out of the end of the car and "kicked it over and let this end down, but they didn't come all the way;" and the switchman then stepped upon the end and on into the car and said, "That is as far as it will go; let's go in and throw it over." This car end or tailgate was as wide as the car and as high as its sides (3½ or 4 feet), about 3 inches thick and iron bound. The gate was not down on the car floor, but lacked about 12 or 18 inches of it. Appellant saw it was lying at an angle. He and his helper and one of the switchmen then "tipped" a 200-pound crated table over on this gate. Appellant stood very near to it. When the weight of the table came upon the gate it fell and injured appellant. No one made any investigation to see whether the door would go down nearer the floor. Appellant had never seen one of these tailgates put down before. It was "just a gate on hinges" which "folded" to the inside of the car to which it was attached. Appellant contends the act of the switchman was within the scope of his employment and was negligent. Respondent contends otherwise, and also insists appellant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law.

[1, 2] The fact that the act was done during the time of the servant's employment is not conclusive, nor is the motive of the servant so. The question is, Was the act done by virtue of the employment and in furtherance of the master's business? Hinkle v. Railroad, 199 S. W. 227. "Whose business was being done and whose general purposes were being promoted?" Maniaci v. Express Co., 266 Mo. 633, 182 S. W. 981. Was the servant acting in the line of his employment about his master's business and seeking to accomplish his master's purpose? Whiteaker

v. Railroad, 252 Mo. 438, 160 S. W. 1009. These and other cases cited by appellant announce the general rule as heretofore expressed in this state, but the facts of the cited cases are not such as to shed much light upon the question whether the rule is applicable to the facts of this case; and that is the only question the briefs present in this connection.

It is not contended the switchmen were charged with any general duty relating to the unloading of cars. Appellant's contention is that the evidence tended to show that they undertook to aid him in order to hasten the accomplishment of their purpose, and duty, to take out a car which stood back of the gondola car upon which he and his helper had placed the two crates of furniture, in the unloading of which the injury was inflicted. Appellant placed the crates upon the gondola car without authority and at his own risk. The switchmen were under no obligation to aid him in their removal and owed him no duty to wait for their removal before moving out the car they sought at the time. They were free to proceed with their switching and allow appellant to wait until they returned the gondola car before removing the crates therefrom. The presence of the crates constituted no obstacle to the switching operations. In this situation they determined to delay the master's business until appellant could accomplish his purpose of removing the crates. They were in fact not performing their work in so doing but were merely accommodating appellant. The effect of this was not the furtherance of the master's business but the temporary suspension of it for the accommodation of appellant. It is true, after the switching crew suspended their operation to await appellant's removal of the crates from the gondola car, that the quicker the crates were removed the quicker the crew could resume the master's business; but the fact that they did temporarily suspend the performance of that business for appellant's benefit makes it clear that the switchmen were not at the time, and in the act done, serving the master, but had stepped aside therefrom, and their acts in aiding appellant were therefore not acts for which the master was responsible. 1 Thompson on Negligence, § 526; 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 147. To bind the master it was necessary that the acts "pertain to the duties of the employment." Snyder v. Railroad, 60 Mo. 413; Walker v. Railroad, 121 Mo. 575, 26 S. W. 360, 24 L. R. A. 363, 42 Am. The judgment is affirmed.

SCOTT et al. v. THOMPSON.
(Nos. 20159, 20160.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Partnership ⇨92—Partner not entitled to participate in profits of individual transaction.

Where partners constructed a railroad under a contract, plaintiff to oversee the work and defendant to furnish capital, plaintiff had no right to participate in the profits of a transaction, whether he assented to it or not, whereby defendant loaned money to the railroad outside the construction contract, but was entitled to participate in the profits if the transaction was a partnership affair, and he did not waive any right by assenting to the transaction as being one outside the contract, where he was never told the true facts.

2. Partnership ⇨336(3)—Transaction not shown to be outside partnership business.

In an action by a partner in a construction firm for an accounting, held under the evidence that a certain amount of money paid for property to be used in the construction of a railroad was not in fact a loan by defendant partner outside of the partnership business, but was a partnership transaction, and profits arising therefrom were profits of the partnership.

3. Partnership ⇨336(3)—Transaction held one within partnership business, entitling plaintiff partner to participate in profits.

A furnishing of money for tanks and pumps on a railroad line under construction by a partner in a construction firm, a certain percentage being allowed by the railroad as compensation for the advance, held, under the evidence, a partnership transaction, and the profits belonged to the partnership.

4. Partnership ⇨336(3)—Evidence held to show partner did not waive profits arising out of railroad construction contract.

In an action by partners for an accounting, evidence held to sustain a finding that plaintiffs did not waive right to profits arising out of a certain railroad construction job.

5. Partnership ⇨308—Interest allowed partner in accounting on items due on termination of different jobs.

In an action for an accounting, where the partnership was not a general partnership, and each contract was a separate undertaking, profits to be divided at the completion of the work on each contract, court did not err in allowing interest on one-half of profits in defendant's hands on the completion of each contract until the date of dissolution of the partnership, in view of defendant's failure to make settlements on the completion of the separate contracts.

6. Partnership ⇨308—Interest properly allowed in an accounting.

In an action by a partner for an accounting, where plaintiff was entitled to interest on certain amounts due at various times under separate contracts up to date of dissolution of the partnership, held, in view of the fiduciary relations between the parties and equitable features arising out of the facts of the case, that court did not err in striking a balance as of date of dissolution, including interest, and then allowing interest on the whole amount until the date of judgment.

7. Partnership ¶333—Partner donated money by third person entitled to same on accounting.

Where it was defendant partner's duty, as between the partners, to keep the books and do the office work, and contract of the partnership with a railroad for which it was constructing a road did not obligate it to pay any of the bookkeeping or office expenses, and for some reason it saw fit to pay defendant a certain amount to cover the expense incumbent on him alone, the other partners were entitled to no part of such money, in an action for an accounting after dissolution.

8. Partnership ¶333—Partner on accounting allowed value of services of accountant.

In a partner's action for an accounting after dissolution of a partnership under which it was defendant's duty to keep the books and pay therefor, plaintiff was entitled to an allowance for one-half the reasonable value of the services of an accountant employed by him to bring the books up to date; defendant having failed to do so.

9. Partnership ¶336(3)—Defendant partner entitled under evidence to interest on vouchers for capital advanced under firm agreement.

In an action by a partner for an accounting, held, under the evidence, that defendant was entitled, under the firm agreement to interest on vouchers given to the partnership in consideration of his advancing all the capital.

10. Partnership ¶308—Partner allowed legal interest on accounting not entitled to interest earned by money.

In an action by a partner for an accounting, where court allowed plaintiff legal interest at 6 per cent. to cover his loss or damage by reason of defendant's wrongful retention of the funds of the partnership, court properly refused to make plaintiff an allowance on account of interest paid by a bank on daily balances on money of the firm in the hands of the defendant.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wm. M. Kinsey, Judge.

Suit by John R. Scott and another against John W. Thompson for an accounting. From a judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed and remanded with directions.

Kinealy & Kinealy, of St. Louis, for plaintiffs.

Marshall & Henderson and Jourdan, Rasleaur & Pierce, all of St. Louis, for defendant.

BLAIR, P. J. This is a suit in equity for an accounting between partners. The cause was referred. The referee recommended judgment for plaintiffs in the sum of $36,- 823.76, with interest from the dissolution of the partnership, September 23, 1913. Both plaintiffs and defendant excepted to the report. The court disallowed one $2,500 item included in the account against defendant, and overruled all other exceptions. Plaintiffs and defendant appealed. Separate abstracts and briefs are filed on the appeal and cross-appeal.

The parties were residents of St. Louis. Both long had been engaged in railroad construction, plaintiffs under the name of John Scott & Sons, and defendant under his own name. They were on friendly terms, and previously had worked together. Plaintiffs were more experienced in grading, track construction, etc., and defendant had given more attention to erecting depots, terminals, and the like. Defendant was a man of large means, and plaintiffs, according to defendant, were but very modestly, indeed, supplied with worldly goods. The first contracts for work under the partnership arrangement involved in this suit were made in May, 1910. There were five separate projects undertaken by the parties. The facts relevant to the several questions require separate statement and consideration.

I. Defendant challenges the allowance to plaintiffs of a share of the profits in one transaction involving the use of $112,429.13 in connection with the construction of the Stephenville North & South Texas Railway Company. He contends the money was loaned by him, and that this loan had nothing to do with the construction contract under which he and plaintiffs, as partners, were building the line of that road.

In April, 1910, defendant learned that certain railroad construction work was in contemplation, advised John R. Scott thereof, and suggested that they undertake the work. In advance of a consultation with the railroad officials, defendant and John R. Scott agreed together to submit a bid on a unit basis, on the theory that the work would be paid for as it progressed, and agreed they would advance equal shares of the relatively small capital which, on such a basis, would be required to carry the work. They were later advised that the railroad was unable to finance the undertaking in this way, and desired the contractors to do so and carry the expense until bonds of the proposed line could be marketed. This required a new arrangement between defendant and Scott. It was agreed between them, so far as concerns four of their joint ventures, that defendant "was to finance the work and attend to all matters relating thereto that could be attended to in St. Louis, including making purchases, hiring the men, furnishing the money, settling with the railroad, etc., and that plaintiffs were to furnish no money or capital, but were to look after and superintend the work." (This quoted statement is taken from defendant's brief.) With this understanding of the matter between themselves, and of the railroad's desire that the contractors were to finance the work, plaintiffs and defendant, under the name of Thompson & Scott, on May 12, 1910, entered into a contract with the Stephenville North & South Texas Railroad Company, as follows:

"St. Louis, May 12, 1910.

"Stephenville North & South Texas Railway. We, the undersigned, hereby propose to do all the clearing, grubbing, earth excavation and embankment, loose and solid rock excavation, necessary in connection with the construction of a line of railroad from Gatesville, Texas, to Hamilton, Texas (and if decided to be built, a line from Hamilton to Comanche), and will frame and place in position all timber trestles, mix and place all concrete work, place all drains (wood, tile, or cast iron pipe as may be necessary), and will furnish all labor and erect all depots, station buildings and outhouses, water tanks and turntables, and will furnish labor and construct all right of way fences; and, if required, will purchase all or any part of right of way lands required for depots, station buildings, outhouses and other necessary facilities, and will do any or all other work and furnish any or all material that may be necessary to complete the proposed line of railroad between the points above mentioned; all of such work to be done in accordance with the specifications heretofore agreed upon, and in compliance with plans furnished by your company, to the full and complete satisfaction and acceptance of your chief engineer; or, in the case of station buildings and work other than that properly classed as engineering, to the satisfaction and acceptance of such representatives as you may designate; such work to be completed within six (6) months from the date hereof, it being understood that your company is to furnish all bridge timbers, lumber, piling and other articles required in connection with the trestles to be constructed, right of way fences, as well as necessary rail, fastenings, switch material and other fixtures required in laying the track between the points hereinabove mentioned.

"We propose to furnish all labor required to complete the work as above outlined, and such material as may not be furnished by your company, at actual cost, to which shall be added fifteen per cent. (15%).

"Your company to furnish us by the fifteenth (15) of each month, estimates to cover the work done during the preceding calendar month.

"We agree to carry estimates, if desired by your company, until final completion of the work as hereinabove set forth, until the completion thereof, said estimates to bear interest at rate of five and one-half per cent ($5\frac{1}{2}\%$) from the fifteenth day of the month following that for which they are made to cover, your company to agree that you will not delay the work of securing right of way, engineering features, or delivery of material to be furnished by you, but will have all such items looked after, right of way secured, grade stakes, etc., furnished and material delivered at such time as will not cause us delay in the completion of the work.

"It is further understood that all payments to be made under this proposal are to be guaranteed by the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Missouri. [Signed] Thompson & Scott, by J. W. Thompson.

"Accepted for Stephenville North & South Tex. Ry. Co. by B. C. Cage, President."

On the same day a contract identical in legal effect was entered into with the Central Arkansas & Eastern Railroad for construction for it. The Stephenville North & South Texas Railway Company (hereafter referred to as the Stephenville Company) was a Texas corporation, and its line was wholly within that state. The Central Arkansas & Eastern Railroad (hereafter referred to as the Central Arkansas) was an Arkansas corporation, and its line was wholly within that state. The guarantor company, the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Missouri, was a Missouri corporation and owned lines in Missouri and Arkansas. It will hereafter be referred to as the Missouri Company. The St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas (hereafter referred to as the Texas Company) was a Texas corporation, and owned lines in that state. On May 12, 1910, F. H. Britton was vice president and general manager of the Missouri Company and president of the Texas Company. These two companies were jointly known as the "Cotton Belt." The Stephenville road was designed to be a sort of subsidiary of the Texas Company, and was subsequently operated under a lease to it. There is evidence the latter road was owned by the Missouri Company. The Central Arkansas was designed to be a subsidiary to the Missouri Company. All these corporations were separate and distinct entities.

Concerning the major part of the work under the Stephenville contract, there is no controversy. Defendant concedes partnership profits aggregating over $102,000. The principal item in dispute in this connection is the sum of $16,864.37, which plaintiffs contend are partnership profits arising from the purchase, under the contract, of rail, fastenings, switch material and switch ties, in the sum of $112,429.13, which were used in the construction of the line under the Stephenville contract. Defendant contends he loaned the $112,429.13 either to the Missouri Company or the Texas Company for use by it to purchase new steel rail for its own purposes.

On August 18, 1910, defendant wrote John R. Scott (then on the Stephenville line), among other things, that Britton "mentioned that he might want us to buy some rail." About March, 1911, the arrangement was made which is drawn in question by this assignment of error. The documentary evidence will be stated first. On March 15, 1911, the Texas Company made out its bill against Thompson & Scott for rail, rail fastenings, switch material, and switch ties in the sum of \$112,429.13. This bill is itemized, and shows the various materials, the prices charged, and the total amount. On April 11, 1911, defendant made out his check for \$112,429.13, payable to the Missouri Company. This check was, by the payee, indorsed to the Texas Company, and deposited to the latter's account. The testimony of the vice president of the Missouri Company is that this check should have been made payable to the Texas Company in the first place, but was, by mistake, drawn payable to the Missouri Company. Its proceeds went into the general account of the Texas Company. On the books of the Texas Company the bill against Thompson & Scott is shown to be paid by this check. April 20, 1911, the Stephenville Company made out its voucher in favor of Thompson & Scott for \$129,293.50. This voucher covers the identical items set out in the bill made against Thompson & Scott by the Texas Company under date of March 15, 1911, at the same prices. The aggregate amount in the voucher is that of the bill (identical with that of defendant's check) plus 15 per cent., the per cent. of profit provided for in the contract between Thompson & Scott and the Stephenville Company. This voucher also bore interest at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. until paid. This, also, was the contract rate upon deferred payments on vouchers. Upon defendant's personal books this matter appeared as follows:

to date of payment. So far as the documentary evidence is concerned, this transaction was clearly a partnership matter. Defendant's contention is that all this was a subterfuge; that the fact was that he loaned the Missouri Company $112,429.13, which that company used to buy new rail, and that this was all there was to it. This matter was first broached to defendant. Thereafter he told Scott he was going to advance to the Texas Company money to buy new rail, and that the advance had nothing to do with work under the contracts of Thompson & Scott; that it was "outside the contract." Scott made no objection; if it was "outside the contract" it was no concern of his. Again defendant testifies in so many words that the $112,429.13 was loaned to the Texas Company. His position is that the various bills, vouchers and bookkeeping entries are mere matters of bookkeeping, and that the real transaction is as he states it. To support this position he called C. W. Nelson, vice president of the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway. Nelson testified that the Missouri Company was purchasing a large quantity of new rail, part of which was to be used upon the lines of the Texas Company. This latter company was short of funds to repay the Missouri Company for the rail it got or was to get from it. The Missouri Company also would need the value of the rail sold to the Texas Company in order to meet the bill of the Illinois Steel Company, from

The rail, fastenings, etc., covered by the bill and voucher were listed at the usual prices and actually were used by Thompson & Scott in the construction of the Stephenville road, and the amount of the voucher (\$129,293.50) issued to Thompson & Scott therefor by the Stephenville Company was, on March 1, 1912, duly paid by that company, together with several hundred thousand dollars for work, concededly that of the partnership. This payment also included interest at $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. from date of voucher which company it was making the purchase. The Missouri Company had guaranteed the Stephenville Company's contract with Thompson & Scott. Old rail from the Texas Company's line was to be used to lay the Stephenville Company's track. Nelson said: Defendant's \$112,429.13 check was given by defendant "in payment for old rail that went into the Stephenville road." That the Missouri Company "purchased a considerable quantity of new steel. A portion of that went to the Texas Company to permit of taking up the light rail to be used on the Stephenville road. There was a transaction with Mr. Thompson in which this check was involved to this effect. Our company was short of funds to pay for this first original purchase on new rail; and in order to tide them over a shortage of funds, as they were in some financial difficulty, they arranged to— with Mr. Thompson, to pay cash for so much of the old rail as went into the Stephenville road, and Thompson carried the account for some months. The payment was made to the Texas Company" it "in turn paid the" Missouri Company this amount of money. The Missouri Company "of course paid it to the men who rolled the rail, the people from whom the rails were purchased." The witness explained that the check was made payable to the Missouri Company, indorsed to the Texas Company and deposited to its account, and the money then turned back to the Missouri Company in payment for new rail furnished by the Missouri Company to the Texas Company, and this money and other funds used by the Missouri Company to pay for new rail, part of which it laid on its own lines. He said: That he and Britton when they first called Thompson in about the matter asked him if he "could provide the funds to pay for the rail that would go to the Stephenville road. That the Missouri Company needed the cash at that particular instant. That the whole situation was frankly discussed. Defendant said he would get the money. The old rail came from the lines of the Texas Company. That the Missouri Company "did not get the money from Thompson. The Texas Company got the money from Thompson, and the Missouri Company got the money from the Texas Company." That the contracts were let to Thompson & Scott because Thompson was financially able to carry the contracts. That the Missouri Company was not in financial condition to carry more than a part of the cost. In another part of his testimony he explains the matter again: That he and Britton told Thompson that "we were short of funds" and asked him to "advance the amount involved in the old rail that was going to the Stephenville road," i. e., "buy from the Texas Company the old rail that was being put into the construction of the Stephenville road." The Stephenville road would reimburse him eventually. "Q. So that the transaction took the form of his buying the old rail from the Texas Company and using it in the construction of the Stephenville road, and the Stephenville road paying it back to Mr. Thompson. A. That's what happened." Witness said defendant's check "never did go through the accounts of the Missouri Company," but that the Texas Company "undoubtedly turned that money over with other funds it had" to the Missouri Company, the parent company, and, as far as he knew, it was used by that company to pay for the new rail. On cross-examination he testified that defendant's check was made payable to the Missouri Company by mistake; that "it was a mistake any one would make. Thompson undoubtedly would make a check reading that way because of the conversations and because of what had been said about new rails." He testified that—

"Thompson paid that money to the Texas Company on a bill that listed a lot of old rail, old material, that would go to the Stephenville road. Now Thompson got his money back eventually through construction accounts of the Stephenville road, and in the meantime—the time of this transaction and the time the Stephenville Company paid out, Thompson, the contractor, Thompson & Scott, or the contract, carried the account, $112,000. Q. As they were required to do under the contract? A. As was contemplated at the time this arrangement was made. Q. You don't mean to say that any road borrowed any money, do you, on this transaction? A. Well, it was in the nature of forcing a loan; it is, in fact, forcing a loan from the contractor. Q. Now, then, if it was a loan, what rate of interest did you agree to pay on it? A. I don't remember the rate; the contract states what the rate is. Q. What contract? A. With Thompson & Scott. Q. No; but you are talking now about borrowing money; that this wasn't under the contract, but it was in reality a borrowing of money from Thompson? A. No, no; I used the words 'forcing a loan.' Q. Well, was it a borrowing of money from Thompson? A. It, in effect, amounts to forcing Thompson to loan the Texas Company. Q. You mean forcing him to provide that certain amount of money to the Texas Company, the value of the old rails? A. The value of materials. Q. In other words, you mean forcing him to buy material for the Texas Company? A. In a sense that's it. Q. Not in a sense, but actually? A. He actually got the money. Q. He bought the material and paid you for that and got the material, didn't he? A. Undoubtedly. Q. Well, it was no question of a loan, was it? A. Not directly. * * * Q. Now, you didn't make any arrangement about borrowing money from him, did you? A. No; the arrangement was as I have stated; that Thompson would advance, which amounts to a loan, the amount involved in the old rail that was to go to the Stephenville road."

He testified he thought, though the old rail was sold to Thompson for cash, it amounted, in the circumstances, to an advance; that it was not a loan "directly," but amounted to "borrowing that much money"; that the Missouri Company "had no connection with the transaction, and would not pay Thompson & Scott, or the contractors, anything"; that the Texas Company never repaid any part of the money; that so far as it was concerned the transaction was a sale of old material; that "they got rid of the material and delivered it, got it off the premises and out of their hands, and in lieu of it they received an agreed price," and that defendant's $112,429-

13 was the amount "of that particular bill"; that the Texas Company billed the old material to Thompson & Scott according to its scale of prices; that was a matter for that company; that most of his conversations about the matter were with Thompson, but that he "undoubtedly" understood he was dealing with the contractors, Thompson & Scott. "Q. That was your understanding of the matter? A. Undoubtedly, all the way through, so far as the contract was concerned, it was the contractors; we didn't know anything about the arrangement with Thompson & Scott. Q. You felt that you were dealing with the persons who were bound by you under the contract with you, is that the idea? A. Yes."

On redirect examination the principal new matter testified to was that the purpose was to keep all the material, etc., that went into the Stephenville road "free and clear," and to prevent the obligation of the bonds of the Missouri Company and the Texas Company from applying to such material, and that the company made out the bills against Thompson so as to show that the materials which went into the Stephenville road had been bought and paid for by the contractors, and thereby get those values included in the valuation of the Texas Railroad Commission, which valuation would form the basis of a bond issue. Immediately following this last testimony the referee interposed:

"The Referee: Were you thinking about the question of bonds at all, or did you simply have in mind the Texas Company having some secondhand rail that you wanted to sell Mr. Thompson, or to the contractors, to have put into the railroad they were constructing, and you went ahead and sold them and got the money, because you needed it at the time? A. That was what really happened."

Mr. Britton testified: That in 1911 he was vice president of the Missouri Company and president of the Texas Company; that some time prior to April, 1911, he was about to sail for Europe, and it was necessary to make some financial arrangements for the company before he sailed. That "it was necessary to purchase rail, and Mr. Thompson agreed to furnish the funds necessary for that purpose, in order to release some rail which was to go to the Stephenville road. Q. The money that he agreed to furnish was for the purchase of rail for this St. Louis & Southwestern of Texas? A. Well, the rails he purchased were used on the St. Louis & Southwestern of Texas." That the arrangement was made with Thompson.

On cross-examination he testified that the old rail on the Texas Company's line was taken up and new rail laid, and that this old rail was used by Thompson & Scott in constructing the Stephenville road under their contract; that he supposed "it turned around" that the Stephenville road paid

Thompson & Scott for the old rail; that was a question of bookkeeping; that he did not know "how they charged it out"; that the Stephenville road paid Thompson & Scott for the old rail, and he supposed it "paid the percentage"; he had not seen the books; and when he went to the Railroad Commission of Texas for the purpose of issuing bonds on the Stephenville road, one of the items entering into the value of the road, as represented to the commission, was the amount "paid Thompson & Scott for those rails and the laying of them on the road;" what Thompson & Scott had paid for them. Witness thought the 15 per cent. commission was also included, and added, "It is all a question of bookkeeping; you had better go to the books;" that he had no direct knowledge of this last matter. He also referred plaintiffs' counsel to the books of the Railroad Commission and of the railway, saying:

"Well, that's all old—that was some time ago; I cannot tell just how these items were charged out on the books; the books will show, and our report to the commission will show; you can get it much better than I can give it to you."

For plaintiffs R. D. Cobb, auditor of the Texas Company, testified concerning some records of his office. He also stated that the bill of his company against Thompson & Scott was made out in advance of the shipment of the material it included, and sent to Mr. Britton, at St. Louis, by his request. He identified letters which tended to show the old material was billed to Thompson & Scott before it was taken from the track of the Texas Company. He further testified that the treasurer of the road reported to him on April 13, 1911, that the bill had been paid; that he did not know how it had been paid; in fact, he did not "know how any bill is paid, because the payment is made to our treasurer."

Defendant's bookkeeper testified that he "understood at the time" that the $112,429.13 check was issued to pay a bill for "second-hand rail" received from the Cotton Belt Railway; that the bill was then attached to defendant's bill against the Stephenville road for a like sum, plus a commission of 15 per cent., that commission amounting to about $16,000.00.

[1] (a) The fact that defendant told Scott he was going to furnish the railroad money to buy new rails is of no value in solving the question this exception presents. This is true because what defendant told Scott was that he was going to loan the Cotton Belt Railway Company money to buy new rail and tanks, and that it was a matter "outside the contract." This was what Scott was "agreeable to," according to defendant. If, in fact, the transaction was a loan of money to the Missouri or Texas company and "outside the contract," plaintiffs have no right to participate in the profits of the transaction whether or not they assented to it. If it was not such a loan, but was a partnership transaction, then Scott was never told the true facts, and never waived any right of himself or his brothers. The question must be resolved on the other evidence.

(b) One of defendant's briefs proceeds upon the theory that the Stephensville road furnished the old rail and material used in constructing its line, and that it billed that material to Thompson & Scott, Thompson & Scott billed it to the Stephensville road, and that road issued its voucher to Thompson & Scott to cover the rail and material, and 15 per cent., the contract percentage due the contractor on cost of work and material furnished.

(c) In their contract with the Stephensville Company, Thompson & Scott agreed, among other things, to "do any or all other work and furnish any or all material that may be necessary to complete the proposed line of railroad between the points above mentioned." A subsequent clause in the contract provided that the work was "to be completed in six months from the date hereof, it being understood that your company is to furnish all bridge timbers, lumber, piling and other articles required in connection with trestles to be constructed, right of way fences, as well as necessary rail, fastenings, switch material and other fixtures required in laying the track between the points hereinbefore mentioned." Immediately following this is the clause:

"We [Thompson & Scott] propose to furnish all labor required to complete the work as above outlined and such material as may not be furnished by your company, at actual cost, to which shall be added fifteen per cent."

Then follows the agreement of the contractors to "carry estimates" until the completion of the work. A correct interpretation of these provisions of the contract depends upon the circumstances surrounding the parties. It is undisputed that the Stephensville Company had no funds of any consequence, and would obtain none until the road was completed, valued by the Texas Railroad Commission, and a bond issue authorized by that tribunal. It is also certain that the original idea of contracting with Thompson & Scott on a unit basis was abandoned because the company did not have the funds to carry the contract in that way, and the contract as written was given to Thompson & Scott because of Thompson's ability to finance the work and "carry the estimates" until the completion of the work. In the light of these facts it seems clear that the only reasonable construction of the apparently somewhat conflicting provisions of the contract, set out above, is that the company had the right to furnish such material as it could, but that Thompson & Scott obligated themselves to furnish all materials the company did not furnish.

(d) As between defendant and plaintiffs, the agreement was that defendant should furnish the money required to carry the contract work in accordance with its terms. The Stephensville Company had neither rail to use on its line nor money with which it could purchase rail. The Texas Company was engaged in relaying portions of its tracks with new rail. After this relaying was done it would have old rail suitable for construction of the Stephensville road. The Texas Company was purchasing new rail from the Missouri Company. The Missouri Company had bought new rail from the Illinois Steel Company. The Missouri Company needed money to pay the Steel Company. The Texas Company needed money to pay the Missouri Company. The Stephensville Company needed the Texas Company's old rail, but had no money with which to buy. The contract of the Stephensville Company with Thompson & Scott obligated Thompson & Scott to furnish such material as was necessary, and which the Stephensville Company did not furnish. In this situation the books of the Texas Company, of defendant Thompson, and the bills, check, and voucher, show that the Texas Company sold the old rail, etc., to Thompson & Scott, the contractors; that defendant Thompson advanced the necessary funds therefor, as his contract with Scott provided; that Thompson & Scott then billed the same rail and material to the Stephensville Company, adding the contract percentage of 15 per cent.; that the Stephensville Company issued to Thompson & Scott its voucher covering the identical material and the percentage thereon, which voucher bore the contract rate of interest until paid; that this rail and material was laid in the track of the Stephensville Company by Thompson & Scott, under their contract; and that the Stephensville Company thereafter paid the amount, together with several hundred thousand dollars more, in one check, dated about March 1, 1912. The whole, about $935,000, covered the whole amount due in connection with the Stephensville road.

[2] The contention that this $112,429.13 was in fact a loan to the Texas Company or the Missouri Company has nothing in the documentary evidence or books to support it. It finds but scant support in the oral testimony, when that is studied. Defendant says he made the arrangement for the loan with Nelson. Nelson's testimony is somewhat confused, but he finally says, in answer to the referee's question set out above, that, in substance, what the books and documentary evidence show is "what really happened," i. e., that the Texas Company had some old rail they wanted to sell to the contractors to be put in the Stephensville road, and the Texas Company "went ahead and sold them and got the money, because" it "needed it at the time." Thompson & Scott were obligated to buy rail. Defendant Thompson was obligated to plaintiffs to put up the money Thompson & Scott needed to buy the rail. Thompson & Scott did buy the rail, lay it in the track of the Stephenville Company, and the Stephenville Company paid the bill and 15 per cent. This percentage is the thing in dispute on this exception. It was a part of the profits of Thompson & Scott. Thompson kept it. The judgment requires him to account for half of it. In that the judgment is right. The fact that the Missouri Company is said to "own" the Texas Company, and that the Texas Company subsequently obtained a lease on the Stephenville road does not materially affect the question, as is apparent. These things seem to have served to confuse one or two of the witnesses and may account for some of the inconsistencies in the oral testimony. The fact that the Texas Company anticipated the taking up of its old rail and sent its bill to Thompson & Scott in advance of the actual removal of that rail from its track does not alter the transaction itself. It indicates that the Texas Company needed money to pay for new rail before it could deliver all the old rail, in the place of which the new rail was to be laid. It does not affect the fact that the old rail was actually sold by the Texas Company, at scale prices to Thompson & Scott and used by Thompson & Scott in carrying out their contract with the Stephenville Company. There was no error in overruling this exception.

[3] II. Exception was taken to the holding that defendant must account for the percentage (15 per cent.) received by him for money furnished to pay for water tanks and pumps on the Stephenville and Central Arkansas roads. The contracts with the Central Arkansas and the Stephenville Company were of the same date, and identical with respect to the obligations of Thompson & Scott. Each required the contractors to "furnish all labor and erect all depots, station buildings, and outhouses, water tanks and turntables," etc. Defendant testified that—

"Our contract called for wooden tanks, and it was expected we would furnish wooden tanks or build wooden tanks, but after we got into it, Mr. Purdon, the chief engineer, decided to put in steel tanks. This was outside our contracts; we took this up with Mr. Scott at the time that we were going to do this; it was perfectly agreeable to do that, and we did it."

It is apparent the contracts did not call for wooden tanks. They called simply for tanks. In this situation the companies doubtless were permitted to determine the kind of tanks they desired. The tanks were ordered and contracted for under the firm name of Thompson & Scott. Thompson conducted the correspondence, and advanced the money. His agreement with plaintiff required both these things of him. Thompson & Scott billed the tanks and pumping outfits therefor to the Stephenville and Central Arkansas companies, respectively. Some were put in on one line and some on the other. Each company issued its voucher to Thompson & Scott for the cost of the tanks and pumps erected on its line. Each added to the cost the contract percentage, 15 per cent., and included this in its vouchers. These vouchers bore the contract rate of interest. There is no evidence sufficient to justify overturning the ruling of the trial court on these items. The receipt referred to by counsel as showing a settlement covering these and other matters does not warrant that conclusion. Properly understood, and as explained by the evidence, it shows merely a payment on account.

III. The judgment awards plaintiffs one-half the profits on the construction of a freight depot at St. Louis. These profits amounted to something over $47,000. This allowance is assailed. July 14, 1911, Thompson & Scott, as partners, contracted to construct in St. Louis a freight depot for the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company. The work was to be paid for on monthly estimates, as it progressed. These estimates were to be paid "on or before the 15th day of the month succeeding the month in which the work" was done. The contractors were to receive cost and 15 per cent. and 10 per cent., respectively, on disbursements for labor and material. Unlike the four other undertakings of the firm, plaintiffs and defendant agreed to advance equal amounts of the capital necessary to carry the work. Under this agreement plaintiffs, on July 22, 1911, paid defendant $2,500. It seems a capital of $5,000 was then deemed adequate. The work progressed without incident until late in September.

Defendant contends that in September, 1911, he called upon Scott for additional capital; that Scott was not ready to furnish it and withdrew his firm, entirely, from further participation in the work under the contract, and it is therefore entitled to no part of the profits thereon. Plaintiffs contend there was no withdrawal, and that they are entitled to participate in all the profits on the depot work. The referee and trial court found the facts for plaintiffs. This question, like those which have preceded it, is one of fact. When Thompson & Scott contracted to build the depot at St. Louis, work on the Stephenville and Central Arkansas lines in Texas and Arkansas was progressing and required attention. Scott was to continue to look after these enterprises, and did. He also gave, for the firm, the only attention which was given by way of actual superintendence to a contract with the International & Great Northern in Texas, carried out in the spring and summer of 1912, and another with the St. Louis & Southwestern of Missouri, in Arkansas, carried on in the fall of 1912 and spring and summer of 1913. Defendant testifies it was agreed that he (defendant) should "run this job" and "take care of" the depot work himself. He explains that this was agreed because it was "more in his line," and was "right here in St. Louis," and he "had an organization to take care of it." John R. Scott testifies he, also, was to give the depot work his attention when in St. Louis. Soon after the depot contract was signed, defendant and John R. Scott were in Chicago, and Scott looked up one Falkenstein, who was employed and put in charge of wrecking old buildings on the depot site. This work continued until the last of September or the first of October. Meanwhile, some of the construction work was begun. Either in the latter part of September or early in October occurred the conversation which defendant testifies resulted in plaintiffs' withdrawal from the whole work, and which plaintiffs contend, and the referee and trial court found, amounted to no more than a conditional agreement that plaintiffs would waive their claim to profits on the structural steel subcontract. Defendant's answer thus stated his view when it was filed:

"That thereafter, to wit, about January 8, 1912, it became necessary for this defendant and said John R. Scott to put up and advance an additional sum of $74,000 for the purchase of steel to be used in the erection of said buildings and depots; that upon request by this defendant of said John R. Scott to put up and advance his one-half of said $74,000 said John R. Scott declared himself unable so to do, and refused to put up his one-half of said $74,000, and thereupon it was agreed between this defendant and said John R. Scott that said John R. Scott should be released from all further rights, obligations, and duties in any manner arising out of the contract aforesaid, and that he should not have any part of the profits arising therefrom, but that this defendant should proceed and complete the work aforesaid and advance all of the money and do all of the work necessary for the completion of said contract, and this defendant, thereafter, on his own account completed said work at his own cost and expense; that in pursuance of said agreement, releasing said John R. Scott from further liability on account of said contract, it was agreed that the $2,500 heretofore advanced and put up by said John R. Scott on account of said contract should be returned and refunded to him, and the same was done, and the said $2,500 was applied by said John R. Scott to another venture of his own, wholly separate and apart from the contract aforesaid; that thereafter said John R. Scott advanced no money and did no work and assumed no responsibility, and was not entitled to any of the profits in any manner arising out of said contract or the execution thereof."

Ed Scott, one of plaintiffs, testified he was in defendant's office prior to the transaction between defendant and John Scott; that as he was leaving defendant said:

"By the way, I have ordered some steel for the warehouse [depot] and it will have to be paid for. It is going to take— I think he said $75,000. Now, if you fellows can't put up your part of the money, and I have to put up all the money to pay for this steel I want all the percentage" on the purchase price of the material.

Witness says he told defendant they (plaintiffs) would put up their part of the money. He then wrote his brother John, who thereafter looked after the matter. After Ed Scott wrote his brother John the latter was in St. Louis, and went to see defendant about his proposition concerning the steel.

John R. Scott testified: That he thought the conversation referred to above occurred in September, 1911. Defendant asked that plaintiffs put up $30,000 to pay one-half the bill for the steel; that he, Scott, was then in Texas. On his return he saw defendant, and suggested that there was much more than $30,000 due plaintiffs. Defendant said that was true, but it had not been paid in. Witness told defendant he could use some of the vouchers to raise money. Defendant said he had money borrowed on them and "wouldn't give them to" witness. Witness then told defendant that to put in $30,000 then might cramp plaintiffs, and rather than take that chance he would not put it up, but would waive all profits on the steel contract if the money was needed before they could get it from the railway. That he could put up the money for a few weeks until it would be repaid by the railway, but defendant refused to agree to his taking the money down when the railway paid for the steel in place. That there was no agreement to withdraw nor any that Thompson should finish the work on his own account, and that the proposition he made was to waive the profits on the steel contract upon a condition which was never fulfilled.

Defendant's version is that in September he told John Scott that "the contract [for the steel work] would amount to about $74,000 or $75,000; their [the Steel Company's] proposition was to have it in a lump sum, and it was to be paid in a lump sum at that time, and at the time I made the contract;" that "they were about to let the contract" at the time this occurred; that Scott said his firm was losing money on a New York contract and one in St. Louis, and "he couldn't put up his money, and I was to finish the contract; that was all; go ahead with the work, which I did." A little later he was asked by his counsel what was said between them when Scott said he "couldn't put up his part of the Christopher & Simpson (steel) contract, about his (Scott's) continuing or having anything to do with the freight depot work." He answered, "Why, he didn't specify any contract at all; he just simply couldn't put up his money, any part of it, go any further on it; that $2,500 was all he could put up. Q. What, if anything, was said as to who was to continue that work? A. There never was said anything about it, because it was understood that I was to continue the work, because my money was there; there was no discussion of that; it was just supposed that I was to do it."

On cross-examination, defendant testified he meant by this that he and John Scott had an understanding that Scott was giving up his interest in the contract because he could not get the money to advance his half of the needed capital, and that Scott did give up his interest, and he, defendant, completed the contract. At another place he testified he told Scott, not only about the contract for the steel, but "about all these contracts that were going on, that I was about to let," and asked him to put up money, but did not "ask him any special amount," though he mentioned the steel contract and others besides; never did talk with Scott about the steel contract alone; asked Scott to put up money "for the balance of the work; there were several contracts"; he, defendant, wanted the money put up so "we could draw on it." He testified this was in September, 1911, just before the steel contract was let. The proposal of the Steel Company was dated September 23, 1911. The acceptance was of later date. The price accepted was $74,378; erection to start about seven weeks after acceptance and work to be completed six or eight weeks after work commenced; payment to be made about the 10th of each month for 85 per cent. of the value of all work finished during the previous month. Defendant testified he did not recall that anything was said, at the time he says Scott withdrew, about Scott's further liability; that Scott understood he was not liable; that he, defendant, told him that much. He also testified nothing was said between them at the time about Scott's interest in profits already accrued. Defendant says any such interest would have been "very slight." The books show plaintiffs' interest in percentages on work done in July and August was $551.20 and in September $113.43, making a total of $664.63. Defendant admits that nothing was said at the time of plaintiffs' alleged withdrawal about the $2,500 of capital which they put into the work at the beginning. The books show that the payment he now relies on as a "taking down" of this sum was not made until March 21, 1912. The question concerning this payment is much discussed, and will be considered later.

The account on this work was kept throughout in the depot contract books, except that the entries concerning the structural steel did not appear thereon, but were shown only on the individual books of defendant. Defendant testified he continued to carry on the work in the name of Thompson & Scott, and that contracts were made under the name of Thompson & Scott "all through the work." The record shows many contracts so made. On October 16, 1911, a contract was entered into, in the name of Thompson & Scott, with the Globe Automatic Sprinkling Company. A proposition of Blackmer & Post, dated October 25, 1911, made to Thompson & Scott, was accepted in their name. November 8, 1911, a contract was entered into with the Corrugated Bar Company, under the name of Thompson & Scott. December 8, 1911, a proposition of the International Electric Fixture Contracting Company addressed to St. Louis & Southwestern Railway and Thompson & Scott, was O. K'd by Purdon, chief engineer of the railway, and carried out. January 27, 1912, a proposition of the St. Louis Terra Cotta Company, addressed to J. W. Thompson, manner of acceptance not shown. Proposition of McDonald & Dunn, painters, dated February 23, 1912, addressed to Thompson, was accepted by Thompson & Scott, by O. G. Shands, defendant's chief clerk. Contract or proposition (accepted) of date April 20, 1912, addressed by Shiras Electric Company to Thompson & Scott. Proposition of O'Brien Boiler Works, dated April 27, 1912, addressed to J. W. Thompson and O. K'd by Purdon, chief engineer of railway, goods "bought on his O. K." Contract with Wm. Burke, plumbing, April 27, 1912, with Thompson & Scott. Geo. F. Smith, contractors' equipment, May 4, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott, manner of acceptance not shown; defendant said he thought it was "just an order." Otis Elevator Company, May 24, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott, accepted by Barry, the railway's superintendent of bridges. Mesker Bros., May 30, 1912, addressed to Barry, care of Thompson & Scott. June 3, 1913, Mesker Bros., addressed to Barry (two others) care of Thompson & Scott. "An order for some flat wire partitions for the freighthouse, dated June 4, 1912, from Lasar Manufacturing Company, addressed to Thompson & Scott; this is for roofing, Keystone Manufacturing Company, June 11, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott." Parker-Washington Company, June 27, 1912, for painting, addressed to Thompson & Scott, and accepted by Thompson & Scott. Chas. A. Olcott, July 11, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott, open order, no acceptance on it. National Hygiene Flour Company, August 15, 1912, ordered by Barry. Armstrong Cork Company, July 22, 1912, accepted by Shands for Thompson & Scott. Hall Safe & Fixture Company, September 6, 1912, "to Thompson & Scott." Howe Scale Company, September 12, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott, accepted by Barry and contract executed Condle-Neal Glass Company, proposition to Thompson & Scott, but defendant did not "remember how it was accepted"—date September 12, 1912. McGuire & Lane, September 13, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott. Hydraulic Pressed Brick Company, September 19, 1912, "pressed brick that was bought, just an order; the address is here Thompson & Scott." Boeckeler Lumber Company, November 11, 1912. Three orders, St. Louis Fire Door & S. M. Works, December 11, 1912; several orders Ludlow-Saylor Wire Company, December 17, 1912, addressed to Thompson & Scott. American Sign Company, December 24, 1912, proposition in name of Thompson & Scott, form of acceptance not shown. Proposition of Fluegel Roofing Company, to Thompson & Scott, January 10, 1913; acceptance does not appear. Propositions for furnishing contractors' equipment were, in several instances, chiefly before September, 1911, addressed to Brenneky & Fay, engineers. Defendant said contracts were made in the name of Thompson & Scott "all through that work," but he thought "there was some of them with J. W. Thompson." He produced only those referred to above.

Defendant testified he did not think the total liability under contracts in the name of Thompson & Scott after September, 1911, would amount to $100,000; he would have to look it up; the books would show; "they addressed their communications to Thompson & Scott, and as far as that was concerned I didn't pay any attention to that; I just took them in that way, some of them and some of them were addressed to me." He testified he did not change old contracts, because he "didn't want to embarrass Mr. Scott"; that for the same reason he signed new contracts in the name of Thompson & Scott, and refrained from informing the railway company and Purdon of Scott's withdrawal. Samen, superintendent of the work, employed by Thompson & Scott, testified defendant never told him the Scotts had withdrawn. Defendant testified he did not want to "embarrass or belittle" Scott by telling he did not have any money and had to get out for that reason. He admitted that the giving of that reason was not necessarily incident to notice of Scott's withdrawal. As already stated, the depot account was kept in a set of books separate from other construction contracts and from defendant's individual books, except that the structural steel subcontract and the mule and cart percentage accounts are found on defendant's individual books.

Purdon, chief engineer of the railway building the depot, "designed the building and lay out of the yards, and superintended the work in a general way as it went along." He testified he visited the work frequently, giving instructions to the general foreman, Falkenstein, and afterwards to Samen, who succeeded Falkenstein, and thereafter to

Pierson, who succeeded Samen; that he "didn't keep any dates," but sometimes he went to the work with defendant and sometimes with John R. Scott; that this continued during the whole time the work was progressing; that Scott gave more attention to the work during the period of wrecking the buildings than afterward; his time was thereafter more occupied with the construction work in Texas and Arkansas, which he (Purdon) also superintended for his company; that when he had any business about the depot work at St. Louis he communicated with Thompson & Scott; made no distinction between the two, dealt with the one he found "on the work." This continued until the work was completed. (Defendant testified as already stated, that he did not notify Purdon of Scott's withdrawal.) Plaintiffs offered to prove by Purdon that defendant "never notified or said anything to Purdon tending to show that he claimed that Mr. Scott's connection with that work had ceased at any time." Purdon identified pay rolls for August, 1912, "just as an example." The bill was in the name of Thompson & Scott, and the approval by Purdon was on a summary under the same name. To the bill or pay roll were appended the names of all persons at work on the depot, and each such person signed a receipt acknowledging payment to him by "Thompson & Scott" of the amount due him for the month. Witness said the bills for all the other months were in the same general form; that so far as he knew no request was ever made to make out the vouchers otherwise than to Thompson & Scott.

E. W. Samen testified he took charge of the work in September, 1911, as superintendent of construction; that defendant brought John R. Scott to the work at a later date, which witness could not fix, and introduced him as his partner; that thenceforward he saw Scott on the work frequently, and took directions from him and defendant impartially, until he left for other employment with defendant, about the 8th of February, 1913, the work being largely done at that date; only odds and ends unfinished; that in August, 1912, he arranged with Scott to take a vacation; that when he left the work in 1913 Scott "came up there and spoke about it, spoke about leaving somebody in charge, and I recommended Roy Pierson as a good man." It is undisputed that Pierson was put in charge at that time, and remained in charge as a sort of superintendent until the work was finished in April, 1913. Samen leaves the impression that Scott put Pierson in charge; Scott testified he did so; defendant does not claim to have put him in charge, and Pierson said Samen put him in charge. Samen further testified that some time in October, 1911, some one put up an old sign over the toolhouse, "J. W. Thompson, General Railroad Contractor;" that defendant saw it, and asked him who put up the sign, and said, "Have that taken down; I wouldn't want Mr. Scott to see that." Defendant denies this; says he does not recollect it; "don't think it ever came up; I never heard of it." Samen further testified that defendant did not instruct him to take no orders from Scott. This was in rebuttal. Defendant had testified he had given Samen such orders some months after September, 1911.

August C. Kountz, accountant, called by defendant, testified he was employed by Mr. Shands, defendant's chief clerk, to make a detail cost account of the depot work; was engaged in this from September 2, 1912, until February 7, 1913; that he was at the depot until about January 7, 1913, and thereafter worked in defendant's office; that he saw Scott "a couple of times there on the work, walking around"; that he did not hear him give any orders; saw him once walking around with the superintendent, Samen; "don't know what he said"; Scott saw him in defendant's office, and asked him how he was getting along, and looked at witness' work; on one occasion defendant came in just after Scott had been there, and told witness not to give out any information about his report; thinks defendant saw Scott talking to him; witness never told Scott what defendant said; this was in January, 1913; witness understood the work was being carried on in the name of Thompson & Scott.

A. R. Pierson, called by defendant, testified he had been working on the depot job as foreman until Samen left (January or February, 1913); that about that time Samen sent for him, and he went up to where Samen, Scott, Purdon, and another railway official were, and Samen introduced him to the men; Purdon asked him if he was capable of taking charge; witness said he was, and Samen said the same thing, and Purdon said, "All right." Scott said nothing; had not seen Scott there during the three weeks he worked as journeyman, but was then at the extreme end of the building, away from the office; saw Scott there a few times while he was foreman; that he was employed in 1912, and had been there about six months before Samen left, and he was put in charge; never saw Scott "on the job" after he took charge; saw him talking with Samen, but did not know what he said. The evidence shows that on January 7, 1913, before Pierson supplanted Samen, the railway company occupied the new building, which was then nearly completed, and that but little remained to be done in finishing the work, "only odds and ends."

Defendant testified John R. Scott did "absolutely nothing" in connection with the wrecking work, except that "very early during the work and during the wrecking" Scott gave some directions about some men who were injured; that these directions were not

"in accordance with our policies covering the insurance," and defendant then gave the foreman orders not to take directions from Scott. Samen says this incident occurred while he was superintendent in April, 1912; and that defendant gave him no such order as he claimed, but did say injured persons should not be carried on the pay roll; said to witness:

"You ought not to do anything like that; anything like that ought not to show on the time book; it should be a separate account; the insurance company takes care of injuries."

Defendant further said John R. Scott "never did anything on the terminals at North St. Louis [the depot] of any kind or description; had nothing whatever to do with it." He admitted Scott went with him "up to the work" on many occasions, and that on "one or two occasions" when he was out of the city he asked Scott "to go to the job, but not in any capacity of directing it or having anything to do with it; only just as a favor to me; he may have wired me something about it; I don't know; I don't recollect." Defendant testified he went to Europe about July 22, 1912, and returned September 9, 1912; that as he was about to depart, he asked Scott while he (defendant) was away. "If he had time, if he would run down to the work and write me a letter of the general condition of it, which" he thought Scott did. The letter was in evidence. Defendant said he asked it "just as a favor" on "account of our being together in other work." He testified, also, that he employed Brenneke to look after the work during this trip to Europe. Brenneke testified to the same thing, and said he looked after it, though the work was well organized, and there "wasn't much occasion to give directions." Brenneke also testifies he went to the depot work several times with defendant and John R. Scott, and saw Scott on the work occasionally. Brenneke's testimony leaves a strong impression that during defendant's absence in Europe he visited the work little, if any, more frequently than he did while defendant was in St. Louis. In one place he says there was no definite arrangement covering this time. His firm was employed by the year by defendant, and had designed the "towers, chuting arrangements and the plant in general, and looked after the work with him [defendant], visiting the work and giving advice to him, and afterwards, while he was away I looked after it in person for him." Defendant concedes that Scott went with him and the mayor of St. Louis to the depot September 21, 1912, when some matter was pending in which the city had an interest.

Scott testified that he "started the work, employed the men, and put in the organization" until he had to leave for other work of Thompson & Scott; that he left J. E. Baker in charge, and Baker was in charge a few days until Evans succeeded him. Defendant testified he put Evans on the work. Evans seems to have been succeeded by Falkenstein. Scott says that when he was not engaged in other work for Thompson & Scott and was in St. Louis he went to the depot work nearly every day, and went over the work with the superintendent, "giving directions, noting and promoting progress"; that when in St. Louis he went to the work "almost every day." He produced memoranda and testified to numerous trips to the work during the 18 months it was in progress; gives dates and circumstances. Some of these trips were made with defendant and others were with Purdon, and on others he was alone; others with Cotton Belt officials and with Brenneke. He also testified that he was "on the work" on dates other than those of which he had kept a record. His testimony shows numerous consultations, some with the superintendent, some with Purdon, some with defendant, about the work, and shows occasions on which he and defendant "went over the work" together. He gives many dates and circumstances. No effort was made to contradict him concerning any particular visit. Defendant relied upon the sweeping statement that Scott had nothing to do with the work, though he might have visited it. Much of Scott's time was occupied with the Stephensville, Central Arkansas, and International & Great Northern (in the summer of 1912) and double-tracking work (this last after October 1, 1912), but he was very frequently in St. Louis, where he lives. Letters and a telegram from defendant to John R. Scott were offered, in which defendant refers to the St. Louis work. Defendant on his own account bought mules and carts which he put to work on the depot job. They were carried on the pay roll in an account kept under the name of E. W. Sawade, defendant's bookkeeper. Under the contract a day rate for mules and carts was charged in this account, and the usual percentage of 15 per cent. charged in addition. This account was kept in Thompson's personal books, and did not appear on the Thompson & Scott books.

On January 6, 1912, a voucher was issued for depot work in the following form:

"Edwin Gould St. Louis Realty Account.
Thompson & Scott.

"St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 6, 1912.

"Dec. 11. Partial payment on account of Christopher & Simpson, contract covering furnishing and erection of steel framework for the new St. Louis freight depot. $40,000.00
"First payment.
"Contract price, $74,378.00."

On this voucher was indorsed the following:

"Received, St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 8, 1912, in full payment for the above account the sum of forty thousand dollars.

"[Signed] Thompson & Scott."

On January 13, 1912, the following bill was rendered:

| | |
|---|-------------|
| Edwin Gould, St. Louis, Mo., in account with Thompson & Scott, Railroad Contractors. | |
| Structural steel furnished in place by Christopher & Simpson subcontractors, on Cotton Belt Freight Depot, Main and Florida streets, St. Louis, Mo., per contract | $74,378 00 |
| Add 10 per cent. | 7,437 80 |
| | $81,815 80 |
| Less cash received on account..... | 40,000 00 |
| | $41,815 80 |

February 12, 1912, a voucher was issued to Thompson & Scott for final payment on this bill and indorsed thereon is:

"Received, St. Louis, February 14, 1912, in full payment of the above account the sum of forty-one thousand eight hundred and fifteen and 80/100 dollars.

"[Signed] Thompson & Scott."

The first payment to Christopher & Simpson on this structural steel subcontract was $30,000, and was made on January 8, 1912. A second payment of $30,000 was made February 14, 1912, and the balance, $14,378, was paid March 1, 1912.

Defendant testified he paid out, at Scott's direction, on account of Butler Bros., the $2,500 the plaintiffs put up July 22, 1911, as their share of the capital to be used in carrying the depot work. He gives no date, so far as the record seems to show. His books show a charge against Scott under date of March 21, 1912. Defendants said that Butler Bros. (grocers in St. Louis) had previously borrowed $6,000 or $8,000 from him, for which had no security; that they came for more money; that he said to John Scott that one of Butler Bros. had married Ed Scott's cousin, and they were "pretty good fellows," and he (defendant) felt like helping them, and he wanted one of the Scotts to help; that Scott did not say whether he would or not, but later wired him he would not; that later still John Scott saw him, and "said he would give them $2,500," while "I gave them $2,500, totaling $5,000," and that he gave them $2,000 later, "which made a total, I think, I was in there of about $16,000 and it's in there to-day." Defendant secured a mortgage on the store and all property of Butler Bros. used in connection with it, and had them transfer to him the capital stock of the corporation which operated the store. Scott had no interest under either of these so far as the face of the papers is concerned. Defendant said Scott's money was intended to be secured also. The Scotts say they authorized defendant, and he agreed to advance to Butler Bros., $2,500 out of profits then due plaintiffs and in defendant's hands, and that the arrangement was made with a view to the increase of the stock of Butler Bros.' organization, and the money they advanced was for such stock. As stated, defendant later secured all the capital stock as security for himself. He says it is worth nothing. That may be due to the existence of the mortgage he holds. On request of plaintiffs, defendant produced from his files a copy of a telegram, dated September 20, 1911, addressed to John R. Scott, Comanche, Tex., in which Scott was asked whether he would take $2,500 stock in "new organization, Butler Bros. Grocery Company. E. J. Scott is taking this amount; Thompson says will advance money for you if you wish it and advise me to wire him. Please answer." This was signed, "Andy Butler." With this defendant also produced a telegram from Scott, dated September 21, 1911, addressed to defendant: "Cannot take Butler stock; tell Andy Sharp has Rock Island Juck's half interest." Defendant, in explanation of his previous testimony that there had been no talk of taking stock when Scott, according to his version, authorized him to advance the Butlers $2,500, said that these telegrams were prior to that authorization "altogether." He had already testified that at the time he had the conversation with Scott, now relied on as authority for paying out the $2,500 for the Butler Bros., he did not agree to put up for the Scotts $2,500 for stock subscription in a company to be organized, "because I didn't know there was going to be any such a company organized." This organization clearly seems to have become a fact some time after September 20, 1911. Ed Scott testified that he agreed at one time to take $2,500 of new stock. Later he agreed with defendant, for himself and John Scott, to put up $2,500, to come out of profits due the Scotts, and then in defendant's hands, and that defendant said that was all right, "was agreeable." John Scott's testimony is to the effect that defendant never asked or received any authority from him to pay out plaintiffs' share of the working capital (on the depot contract) to or for Butlers; that defendant agreed to pay this out of profits he owed plaintiffs at the time the advance was made. Andy Butler, for defendant, testified Ed Scott told him some time in November that "he thought it would be all right; they were going to pay off the creditors"; that one time later, "some time ago," Ed Scott asked him if he knew the Scotts had $2,500 in the store; that was after the creditors were paid off; that the creditors were paid off; defendant put up $8,000 for that purpose; that defendant took a mortgage on all the company's property and all the stock as security for about $16,000 advanced.

Defendant testified John R. Scott was kept continually advised as to the state of the account between the partners, but that no settlement was asked for on a job until it was completed. Defendant thought Scott got statements or memoranda from the bookkeepers.

The bookkeepers and accountants testified the books did not, even after the partnership was dissolved in September, 1913, show the interests of the respective partners. Scott testified he had asked for a statement on the completion of each piece of work, but never had received any. In April, 1913, he requested a statement, and received several sheets with figures on them, but the evidence shows these were incomplete. A copy of this statement remained in defendant's office. No copy of any other statement to plaintiffs was produced by defendant. Defendant had turned over to plaintiffs very considerable sums prior to April, 1913, and, in each instance took an interest-bearing note to cover the amount paid. In March, 1912, he paid plaintiffs $50,000. The receipt shows this payment was not a settlement, but merely a payment on account of "Cotton Belt work." The statement furnished on April 13, 1913, did not purport to show much in detail, except the amounts paid to plaintiffs. The accrued profits were stated in lump sums. Among other things, this statement omitted all notice of the freight depot profits. Scott discovered this, and "took it up with" defendant by telephone, and called his attention to the fact that the statement afforded no real information, and also that the freight depot contract was entirely omitted. He testified that defendant then told him that he (Scott) had no interest in the depot job; witness told defendant that he must be joking, and defendant then said the telephone was not a good means for discussing it. This was at night. Witness went to defendant's office the next day, and asked if he was serious about the matter; defendant said he was; witness told defendant his attitude was ridiculous, and it would be a simple matter to establish his rights; defendant said, "Go ahead and establish them." Witness said defendant's bookkeepers refused him statements and information, and told him defendant desired that witness get his information from him. Sawade, defendant's bookkeeper and later chief clerk, testified that "it was an iron-bound rule with Mr. Thompson, and everybody in the office has understood it, that no one is to see his books or any other books in the office without first getting permission from Mr. Thompson." Defendant testified that the railroad paid "fairly promptly" as the work progressed, but that the $5,000 original capital was wholly insufficient to carry the work. John R. Scott testified that the original capital and accumulated percentages were sufficient to carry the work at all times. Defendant's contention, in this connection, is, in effect, that the evidence shows that plaintiffs did not have in his hands enough money to carry their half of the capital investment by the contractors in the work, and that the reasonable inference from that fact supports his claim that plaintiffs abandoned the contract. For the purpose of examining this contention it is therefore necessary to credit plaintiffs with one-half of percentages paid by the railway on the work and other money, if any, in defendant's hands and belonging to plaintiffs. In July plaintiffs' $2,500 exceeded the amount furnished by defendant. In August, 1911, defendant advanced more than $2,500. In September, also, defendant's "investment," as it is called, somewhat exceeded plaintiffs' $2,500 and percentages theretofore paid on it and in defendant's hands. These months have little bearing on the question at issue. It is not contended plaintiffs withdrew until some time near October 1, 1911. The inference is justified that defendant did not then put such a strict construction on the capital feature of the partnership contract as he now does. In October plaintiffs' $2,500 had grown to $3,047.33. Defendant's investment was $4,922.23, nearly $2,900 less than it had been in August. In November plaintiffs had $3,624.62 in the work, and defendant $4,213.45. In December plaintiffs' $2,500 and accrued percentages in defendant's hands in cash aggregated $4,072.93. In December, 1911, and January, February, and March, 1912, the whole capital in use did not equal plaintiffs' $2,500 and their accumulated percentages in defendant's hands in cash. February 23, 1912, defendant received payment for the firm of a large amount of money. March 1, 1912, he paid the Scotts $50,000, leaving a balance due them of $1,904.30, without crediting them with the sums found due under paragraphs I and II, supra, or any profits on the depot work. These sums, considered in paragraphs I and II, aggregated more than $10,000. Adding the $1,904.30, the total is, in round numbers, $12,000. This does not include percentages on work of mules and carts previously paid defendant and in his hands. With that exception the aggregate in defendant's hands, on March 1, 1912, adding the paid percentages on the depot work to the profits mentioned ($12,000) and the original $2,500, was about $16,850. Defendant contends he paid out $2,500 to Butler Bros. in March, 1912. This would leave $14,350 of plaintiffs' money in his hands. By August 16, 1912, paid percentages in defendant's hands swelled plaintiffs' share to about $19,000. This is exclusive of one-half of the $7,437.80 in profits on the structural steel contract. It is unnecessary to go further. The figures show that for nearly all the time, except in August, 1911, plaintiffs had in defendant's hands cash exceeding one-half of the actual money put in the work and yet unpaid by the railway. Much of the time it exceeded the whole. Defendant asserts he had more than $91,000 in the work in December, 1912. The fact is that this represented all the money then due from the railroad on the contract. It also assumes that all material bills were paid before being billed to the railroad on the contract. This Scott denies, defendant does not affirm, and the steel vouchers show was not true in that case. The $91,000 included all profits to that date and the mule and cart account. Plaintiffs were not concerned with the value of the mules and carts. They were concededly defendant's property. He was receiving a per diem for them on the pay roll, in which per diem plaintiffs claim no interest. This investment was not one of the partnership. In connection with this $91,000 item the defendant's expert shows defendant's "advances" (and he is credited with all advanced; plaintiffs with none) to be $33,260.35, in December, 1912, omitting cart and mule account. One-half of the percentages on payments after August, 1912, and to and including December, 1912, amounted to $7,910.48. Adding this to the sums already in defendant's hands would make plaintiffs' investment equal more than half the sums credited as funds, "advanced" on the depot work in December, 1912. Defendant did not ask plaintiffs for any further advance after the incident preceding the letting of the steel contract.

[4] (a) The referee and trial court found plaintiffs were entitled to participate in the profits of the depot contract. This court is asked to overturn those findings on this question of fact. We are of opinion the evidence does not justify us in doing so. It is undisputed that the contract was that of the partnership, and that the work proceeded for a time as a partnership undertaking. It is now contended plaintiffs withdrew from that contract. The work was admittedly carried out in the firm name; the subcontracts were made in that name throughout the work, as well after as before the time of the alleged withdrawal. Correspondence was evidently carried on under the firm name. Shands, defendant's chief clerk in charge of his office until February, 1913, accepted in the firm's name propositions addressed to Thompson & Scott, and so accepted one addressed to defendant. Large liabilities were incurred on these contracts of the firm. The pay rolls, bills, and vouchers were in the firm name. The laborers each month or week receipted the firm for their wages. Payments were made to Thompson & Scott, and the receipts to the railway (or Gould) were signed by Thompson & Scott. The railway's chief engineer, charged with oversight for it of the work, dealt with the firm and with defendant and Scott as partners all through the work. The superintendent, Samen, employed by the firm, dealt with them the same way at all times, and neither of these men ever learned that defendant claimed plaintiffs had withdrawn. The railway was never advised of this claim. Defendant gives no reasonable explanation of these things.

Defendant's testimony concerning the conversation he says resulted in plaintiffs' withdrawal is not consistent with the facts or itself. One version he gives is that the steel contract alone was discussed. Another is that he brought up "all these contracts," and asked plaintiffs to put up money so "we could draw on it." In September the steel contract apparently was the only contract pending. The proposition was dated September 23, 1911. The next contract was made October 16, 1911, the next October 25, 1911, the next November 8, 1911, the next December 8, 1911, and the next January 27, 1912. The rest were made after February 23, 1912, so far as the record shows. A request of plaintiffs to put up money for all contracts or for any contracts except in reasonable time to meet their half of payments thereunder would not have comported with a reasonable construction of the partnership agreement. Defendant testified he told Scott the steel company's "proposition was to have it in a lump sum, and it was to be paid in a lump sum at that time, and at the time I made the contract." This was assigned by him as a reason for the demand. The steel company's proposal shows the contrary. Dated September 23, 1911, work under it would commence seven weeks after acceptance. If accepted on the 23d of September, the work would have begun November 10, 1911, and the first payment, for 85 per cent. of the work done in November, would have fallen due December 10, 1911. The work was actually paid for in January, February, and March, 1912. The subcontract, therefore, itself contradicts defendant.

His answer also shows he did not have the matter clearly in mind when that pleading was drawn. Defendant admits nothing was said about plaintiffs' accrued profits or capital in the work when the conversation of September, 1911, occurred. The answer avers that it was agreed plaintiffs were to be relieved of further liability. Defendant testifies, at first, that nothing was said at the time about that. Later he said he told Scott he would not be liable. Nevertheless, the work was so carried on thereafter that plaintiffs shared all liability. Further, this alleged withdrawal occurred, if at all, before the steel work was begun. Defendant kept the steel subcontract account separate from the rest of the work and in his individual books. He did not explain why, if plaintiffs had wholly withdrawn, it was necessary to do this. He says the $2,500 plaintiffs advanced in July, 1911, was paid out for the Butlers on an agreement that it should be disposed of in this way. The trial court and referee were unable to take this view. The testimony set out above shows the reason for this too clearly to require discussion. The argument based upon the claim that defendant was not aided by plaintiffs in the matter of capital in use in the work is disproved by the evidence. The fact is that one month before the date of the alleged withdrawal defendant furnished more than one-half, and two months thereafter he did so. After that the discrepancy was the other way. Defendant did not ask for further capital. John R. Scott undoubtedly took an active part in the oversight and management of the work. This was his duty under the partnership agreement, according to his testimony. Defendant's testimony that no such duty was imposed by that agreement upon Scott is difficult to believe, in view of the way the work was done. It is not easy to see how Scott could have exercised the authority he and Purdon and Samen say he did without defendant's knowledge; and it is hard to understand, if defendant knew, why he acquiesced, if plaintiffs had withdrawn from the contract. Without further elaboration, we are unable to find that the record justifies us in overturning the finding of the referee and trial court in this connection. Plaintiffs' version of the agreement of September, 1911, must be accepted.

The agreement to waive profits on the steel contract was based upon a condition which was not fulfilled. The money asked for was never needed, as the payments by the railroad and those to the steel company show. The latter company was not paid until after the railroad paid Thompson & Scott for their work. The trial court's ruling on this assignment was right.

[5] IV. During the progress of the work on the several contracts of Thompson & Scott, defendant paid or advanced to plaintiffs considerable sums, for which, except in one or two instances, he took interest-bearing demand notes. (a) In casting up the account, the referee and trial court determined the amount of profits in defendant's hands on the completion of each contract and payment therefor, and allowed plaintiffs interest at 6 per cent. on their half thereof until the date of dissolution of the partnership, September 23, 1913; then allowed defendant interest at the same rate until the same date on all advances made by him to plaintiffs. According to defendant's counsel the net result of these cross-charges of interest was an interest allowance to plaintiffs of $1,167.04. It is contended no interest was legally allowable to plaintiffs until dissolution. The Thompson & Scott partnership was not a general partnership. Each contract was a separate undertaking. The testimony of John Scott and defendant shows that there was to be no division of the profits on any contract until the work under that contract was completed. The notes given to defendant were for advances out of profits not yet ready for division under the partnership agreement. John

R. Scott testified he asked for statements upon the completion of each job, but never received one. Defendant, in effect, concedes that payment of their share of profits was due plaintiffs at the completion of the respective jobs. Also, he testifies that plaintiffs did not demand settlements of profits arising out of "these separate contracts until they were finished." That he never gave them a correct statement is proved by the evidence. Counsel invoke general rules to the effect that interest is usually not allowed partners on profits left with the firm, on fluctuating balances on advances to the firm, or on periodical balances struck, in the absence of an agreement or course of action justifying it. It is frequently said that no fixed rule can be extracted from the cases. Rowley on Partnership, vol. 1, § 362. With respect to allowances of interest between partners "during the continuance of the firm," it has been said that:

"There are, broadly speaking, three grounds upon which interest is allowable: (1) As the fruit of a contractual provision therefor, express or implied from the situation of the parties or mercantile usage; (2) as damages for the detention of a sum of money after it has become due; (3) as an equitable equivalent for the use of money fraudulently withheld from its rightful owner." Rowley on Partnership, vol. 1, § 359, quoting Kilworth v. Ice, 84 Kan. 458, 114 Pac. 857, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 220.

In this case, in view of the agreement that profits were to be divided on the completion of the separate contracts of the firm, the conceded demands for settlements, which settlements were not made, the withholding from the books of the firm of practically all profits upon which interest to September 23, 1913, was allowed, and the effort of defendant to deprive plaintiffs of these profits without real reason, we are of opinion that interest was allowable. The allowances to defendant upon the sums advanced was merely a method of computing the net interest due plaintiffs on the date of dissolution. The notes themselves were but evidence of payments in advance of the agreed time of distribution.

[6] (b) It is argued that by taking the sums found due on September 23, 1913, and allowing interest thereon until the date of judgment, the court erred, since this included some interest on interest. The balance struck as of September 23, 1913, was then due and unpaid. In view of the fiduciary relations between the partners and the equitable features arising out of the facts of this case, the trial court was well within its powers, in this suit in equity, in computing the interest with a rest at the date of dissolution.

V. Some of defendant's counsel contend the deduction of $1,151.98 from the payment of $4,000 to plaintiffs on October 20, 1911, is error, and wholly unsupported by evidence. Others concede it is correct. The debit and credit account on the Stephenville and Central Arkansas work as it appears in the record shows advances by Scott in excess of receipts to October 20, 1911, of $1,151.93. The exception is overruled.

VI. The railway allowed defendant $3,200 to cover the expense of office work and bookkeeping. Of this sum, defendant paid part to his office force for the extra work they did, and retained the balance. The referee and trial court seem to have found that the amount defendant retained, was $1,200. Plaintiffs were allowed one-half of this sum, $600. Defendant contends this was error. Plaintiffs insist, on their cross-appeal, that they were entitled to one-half of the whole or $1,600, and asked that they be allowed an additional sum of $1000.00.

[7] It was defendant's duty, as between the partners, to keep the books and do the office work. The contract of the firm with the railway did not obligate it to pay any of the bookkeeping or office expense. For some reason it saw fit to pay defendant $3,200 to cover an expense incumbent upon him alone. The case would have been no different had a disinterested fourth party advanced the money for this purpose. Plaintiffs were entitled to no part of this money. The allowance of $600 to them on this account was error.

[8] VII. After the dissolution it was found that the partnership books were not posted to date. Plaintiffs employed an accountant who, under the supervision of the defendant's chief clerk, aided in completing the books. It was shown that the reasonable value of his service in this was $250. The trial court allowed plaintiffs one-half of this sum. Defendant complains of this allowance. In view of what is said in the preceding paragraph, the allowance might well have been for the whole amount. Defendant had not performed his duty in regard to the books, and the work was necessary before the accounts could be put in proper condition. The assignment is overruled.

VIII. The referee allowed plaintiffs credit for the $2,500 paid by them to defendant on July 22, 1911, as their one-half of the capital upon which the firm of Thompson & Scott began the St. Louis freight depot work. To this allowance the trial court sustained defendant's exception, and this ruling is assigned for error by plaintiffs.

On the hearing defendant attempted, in an effort to support his contention that they had withdrawn from the depot work, to show that plaintiffs had withdrawn the capital payment of $2,500 by directing him to pay it on account of Butler Bros. Plaintiffs' position was that they had not authorized the payment as of the capital fund, but that the payment authorized was to be made out of accrued profits, and was not a taking down of their initial capital payment. Defendant did pay $2,500 on Butler Bros.' account under authority from plaintiffs. There was no real controversy about that fact on the hearing. The assignment is overruled.

[9] IX. On the work on which the contractors "carried the estimates" vouchers were issued by the railway company which bore interest until paid. This was in accordance with the contract between the railway and Thompson & Scott. The referee and trial court refused to permit plaintiffs to share in this interest. Of this ruling plaintiffs complain.

As between the railway company and Thompson & Scott, the latter were bound as a copartnership to carry the estimates until the completion of the work, the estimates to bear interest from the fifteenth of the month following that in which the work which the estimates covered was done. As between the partners the burden of financing the contract was imposed upon defendant. The contract between the partners was oral. It is apparent that the case is not one in which interest upon partnership funds has been received by one partner and not accounted for. All the interest in question here accrued on vouchers to cover expenditures advanced by defendant. Defendant testified to an express contract with plaintiffs, as part of the partnership agreement, that he was to have all the interest on the vouchers by reason of his putting up all the money for the work. During the work plaintiffs, without objection or protest, permitted defendant to make use of the vouchers to secure his personal notes to the bank for funds to carry on the work. The whole course of action during that time was in accord with defendant's theory of the interest agreement. John R. Scott testified nothing was said about voucher interest as such; that the agreement was that the profits were to be divided equally when the work was completed. It is not clear from his testimony that even he understood the word "profits" to include this interest. It is true that such interest, in a proper case, would be held to be a part of the profits and subject to division. This is not a case in which it is conceded or shown interest was to be distributable under the term "profits," but one which the referee and trial court found, and we think correctly, that the interest in question was, under the partnership agreement, to go to defendant in consideration of his advancing all the capital, for much of which he was obliged to pay the bank many thousands of dollars in interest. The record does not justify a ruling overturning the decision of the referee and trial court on this assignment.

[10] X. Plaintiffs asked an allowance of interest paid by the bank on daily balances on money of the firm in the hands of defendant. The referee and trial court found against this claim. The judgment allowed plaintiffs interest at a greater rate on all money in defendant's hands from the time it was due and demanded until judgment was rendered. This covered all interest to which plaintiffs were entitled. The interest at 6 per cent was allowed to cover plaintiffs' loss or damage on their funds during the time they were retained by defendant. Perhaps it might have been compounded had plaintiffs asked it. Bobb v. Bobb, 89 Mo. loc. cit. 421, 422, 4 S. W. 511. That question, if ever raised, has not been kept alive. Certainly plaintiffs did not contend for the profits or interest at 3 per cent. on daily balances in lieu of the 6 per cent. interest allowed to them. The point is ruled against plaintiffs.

XI. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain defendant's exception to the $600 item discussed in paragraph VI and then render judgment in accordance with this opinion.

All concur.

HARRISON v. PUNCH et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1. April 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

Appeal and error \S 528(1)—Where the motion for new trial is not properly called for in the bill of exceptions, bill cannot be reviewed.

Where the motion for new trial was set out in the abstract of the record proper, and in the bill of exceptions it was omitted, and there was no proper call for the same, the bill of exceptions cannot be considered.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Stoddard County; W. S. C. Walker, Judge.

Suit by Fred C. Harrison against Soonie Punch and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Samuel A. Punch and others appeal. Affirmed.

Oliver & Oliver, of Cape Girardeau, for appellants.

Walter T. Gunn, of Danville, Ill., and R. P. & C. B. Williams, of St. Louis, for respondent.

GOODE, J. Jasper Newton Punch died intestate in Stoddard county, Mo., on November 5, 1915, seized and possessed of lands in said county of considerable value. He left a widow, Soonie Punch, who is one of the defendants in this action, which was brought by the plaintiff to specifically enforce an oral contract by Jasper Newton Punch to adopt plaintiff and make him his heir; a contract alleged to have been made by Jasper Newton Punch with the mother and grandmother of plaintiff and to have been fully performed by them and by plaintiff. A further purpose of the suit was to have adjudged that the three half-brothers of Jasper Newton Punch had no interest in the lands to which they asserted title. If there was not an adoption of plaintiff as said Jasper Newton's son and heir, the half-brothers were his only heirs, and inherited an undivided one-half interest in the land in controversy, and the widow the other one-half, whereas if there was such a contract, and it is enforced, the half-brothers take nothing. A third object of the suit was to have the lands partitioned between plaintiff and Mrs. Soondie Punch, the widow.

It is needless to state more of the facts, because the abstract of the record is in such condition that we cannot look beyond the record proper, and that is free from error. The bill of exceptions neither sets out the motion for new trial in the case nor calls for it; hence exceptions taken during the trial cannot be considered. The motion for new trial is referred to in the bill of exceptions in practically the same words in which reference was made in a bill of exceptions to the like motion in the case of State ex rel. Peet v. Ellison, 196 S. W. 1103. In said case the effect of omitting to copy or call for the motion for new trial in the bill of exceptions was carefully considered, and the decisions in this state on the subject reviewed. That decision, as well as those referred to in the opinion in the case, determine that with such a reference to the motion as was therein made, and made in the present case, it is not preserved in the bill of exceptions as a part of the bill, and leaves nothing to be examined on the appeal except the record proper.

The judgment, therefore, is affirmed.

All concur, except WOODSON, J., absent.

SANDERS v. KASTER.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied June
2, 1920.)

1. Mortgages §427(2)—Trustee not a necessary party to action to foreclose deed of trust.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 2828, 2829, the trustee named in deed of trust containing power of sale in trustee was not a necessary party to action by cestui que trust to foreclose the deed of trust.

2. Appeal and error §187(3)—Failure to join trustee in action to foreclose not available unless raised by answer or demurrer.

In action by cestui que trust to foreclose deed of trust, defendant could not complain on appeal of failure to make trustee a party to the action, where the question was not raised by demurrer or answer in lower court.

3. Appeal and error §187(1)—Defects of parties must have been raised by demurrer or answer.

The question of whether there are defects of parties plaintiff or defendant should be raised by demurrer or answer, and upon failure to so do the question is waived, and cannot be urged on appeal.

4. Evidence §76—Defendant's failure to testify casts suspicion on his claims.

Defendant's failure to testify to the salient things contained in his answer casts suspicion upon the bona fides of his claims; he having peculiar knowledge as to such facts.

5. Acknowledgment §54—Acknowledged deed of trust and note secured thereby admissible, without proof as to genuineness.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 2818, duly acknowledged deed of trust and note secured thereby were properly admitted in evidence in action to foreclose deed of trust, without proof that defendant had signed the deed of trust; the acknowledgment making the deed of trust evidence of all facts recited therein, including the fact that defendant has signed and delivered note to plaintiff.

6. Appeal and error §232(2)—Objection to introduction does not raise question of want of proof of signature.

In action to foreclose deed of trust, defendant's objections to introduction in evidence of deed of trust and note, "for the reason, under the pleadings, it is irrelevant and incompetent," held insufficient to raise objection on appeal that proof of signature had not been made.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Putnam County; L. B. Woods, Judge.

Action by August Sanders against N. L. Kaster. From an adverse decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Action to foreclose a deed of trust on 160 acres of land in Schuyler county, Mo. The petition is in conventional form, but has therein the allegation that N. L. Kaster, one of the makers of the note secured by the deed of trust, and also one of the makers of the deed of trust, was in 1913 declared by the probate court of Schuyler county to be a person of unsound mind, and that John Sloop was appointed as his guardian. The petition alleges two interest payments upon the note of $7,600, of dates March 8, 1912, and March 17, 1913, and for the sum of $456 each. The note was dated March 10, 1911.

By answer the defendant avers that he was readjudged by the probate court of Schuyler county to be a person of sound mind on March 30, 1916. This was some two weeks after the filing of the suit and service of process in the case. In his answer, after a general denial, defendant, N. L. Kaster, avers that he was a person of unsound mind at the time the note and deed of trust were signed, and had been for some months prior thereto, and continued to be for some months thereafter, all to the full knowledge of the plaintiff. He asks that the deed of trust and note be canceled and for naught held, and in a further count of his answer he asks to be adjudged the two payments of interest mentioned in plaintiff's petition. Defendant also avers that he received no benefit or money from said note and deed of trust. The record shows the filing of a reply. The additional abstract of the record shows the reply, and in it a plea of res adjudicata. Upon a trial the court found the issues for the plaintiff, and ordered defendant's equity of redemption foreclosed, to satisfy an adjudged sum of $10,871.46, including an attorney's fee of $750.

After defendant was adjudged to be of sound mind, he filed answer, and the case proceeded as between plaintiff and defendant. On change of venue the trial was had in Putnam county. From the adverse decree, defendant has appealed. Further detail of facts will be left to the opinion.

A. D. Morris, of Lancaster, and J. M. Jayne, of Memphis (Lozier & Morris, of Carrollton, of counsel), for appellant.

Higbee & Mills, of Lancaster, and Campbell & Ellison, of Kirksville, for respondent.

GRAVES, J. (after stating the facts as above). I. It will be noted that the trustee in the deed of trust was not made a party to this foreclosure proceeding, nor is Bert Kaster, the wife of N. L. Kaster, made a party, although she signed the same, as well as the note secured thereby. It develops in the testimony that Mrs. Kaster is the daughter of plaintiff, and that she had later sued for divorce, and had obtained judgment of divorce and alimony in the sum of $4,000 which judgment was settled during the guardianship of Kaster at the sum of $3,500. Of this we may have occasion to speak later. We mention it now as tending to show the status of the parties at the institution of the suit.

Appellant contends that the failure to make the trustee a party renders this judgment void, and this is the point we have in view now. Kaster was the owner of the land, and during the life of Kaster the wife only had dower initiate. How this was determined by the divorce suit does not appear in this record. There may be something in that decree which precludes her from further interest in Kaster's property. But this is adrift from the point. Can this judgment stand, absent the presence of the trustee as a party? Was his presence as a party so necessary as to render the judgment void? This is the point we now have before us.

The deed of trust in this case is the usual one, with power of sale in the trustee. It occurs to us that the statutes fully answer the contention of the appellant. The pertinent portion of section 2829, R. S. 1909, reads:

"Deeds of trust in the nature of mortgages may, at the option of cestuis que trust, their executors or administrators or assigns, be foreclosed by them, and the property sold in the same manner in all respects as in case of mortgages."

Note that this section authorizes the "cestuis que trust, their executors or administrators or assigns," to foreclose such deed of trust, "and the property sold in the same manner of all respects as in case of mortgages." The foreclosure of mortgages is governed by section 2828, R. S. 1909, which reads:

"All mortgagees of real estate or personal estate, including leasehold interests, when the debt or damages secured amounts to fifty dollars or more, may file a petition in the office of the circuit court against the mortgagor and the actual tenants or occupiers of such real estate, or persons in possession of personal property, setting forth the substance of the mortgage deed, and praying that judgment may be rendered for the debt or damages, and that the equity of redemption may be foreclosed, and the mortgaged property sold to satisfy the amount due."

The parties to this kind of suit are the mortgagee, as plaintiff, and the mortgagor, as defendant. If there are tenants, then the tenants are to be made defendants. In the case before us there was no question of tenants. The maker of the deed of trust and his legal guardian were made the parties defendants. Section 2829, supra, gives to the cestuis que trust in these deeds of trust, the same rights to foreclose as are given to mortgagees in the case of mortgages. In other words they can, in court, do just what they could request their trustee to do by way of a sale under the instrument. The section contemplates two methods of foreclosing the equity of redemption; i. e. (1) by a suit in court by the beneficiary in the deed of trust, as plaintiff, and the maker of a trust deed, as defendant; and (2) by advertisement and sale by the trustee under the terms of the deed of trust.

[1] The reference in section 2829 to foreclosures of mortgages compels us to read sections 2828 and 2829 together in order to get the full meaning of the latter section. When so read together, section 2829 means that, if the beneficiary in the ordinary deed of trust prefers to foreclose by court action, then such beneficiary is the sole necessary party plaintiff, and the maker of the deed of trust the sole necessary party defendant, unless there are tenants (a question not involved here), in which case the tenants should be made parties defendant. The statutes go no further. So that we conclude that it was unnecessary to make the trustee a party under the provisions of these sections. We are cited to the provisions of section 2859, R. S. 1909, but an examination of that section will show that it does not apply to a deed of trust such as we have here under consideration. This statute refers to deeds of trust in which a foreign corporation or individual is a trustee.

It is true that we say in cases that the trustee has the bare naked legal title, but, on the other hand, the trustee cannot divest himself of that bare naked legal title, nor the maker of the deed of trust of his equity of redemption, save and except he be requested so to do by the beneficiary in the instrument. He can only act when he gets the command from the real party in interest; i. e., the beneficiary. But, as said above, the statute (section 2829, supra) contemplates two methods of reaching the same end. In one the trustee is a factor, because at the request of the beneficiary he can sell the property and pass title. In the other the beneficiary is permitted to act for himself and have the sale made under a decree of court. Both sales obtain the same result. In Rogers v. Tucker, 94 Mo. loc. cit. 352, 7 S. W. 417, it is said:

"A complaint is made that the trustee in the Rogers deed of trust was not made a party plaintiff. These trustees in deeds of trust to secure debt generally have no duties to perform, save to sell the property in case of default in the payment of the debt. It is not claimed or shown that Picon, the trustee in the Rogers deed of trust, had or possessed any other power than that of making sale in case of default. He was not the proper party to foreclose by suit the deed of trust. In suits brought to foreclose the state's lien for taxes, it is not sufficient to make such a trustee a defendant. The holder of the secured debt must be made a defendant; otherwise, the deed of trust is not foreclosed, and this because the holder of the secured debt is the real party in interest. Stafford v. Fizer, 82 Mo. 388; Bank v. Grewe, 84 Mo. 478. This is but a suit to have the Rogers deed of trust declared a prior lien, and we can see no reason for making the trustee a party to the suit. He was not a necessary party."

Now, bearing in mind that section 2829, R. S. 1909, by direct reference incorporates therein section 2828, supra, much light is thrown upon the question, by the opinion of Valliant, J., in State ex rel. v. Evans, 176 Mo. loc. cit. 316, 75 S. W. 915, whereat he says:

"The proceeding there contemplated deals with no uncertain parties and no equivocal titles. The parties are the mortgagee on the one side and the mortgagor and the man in possession on the other; the one holding the legal title with a defeasance, the other holding the equity of redemption and the possession. The only duties of the court are to ascertain the amount due on the mortgage debt and pass judgment that the property be sold for the amount so ascertained and that execution issue for the balance, if any, against the mortgagor's other property."

He was discussing section 4342, R. S. 1899, which is section 2828, R. S. 1909, which we have quoted, supra; but as the method of procedure under section 2829, the section under which this action is brought, is to be determined by section 2828, by direct reference thereto, the language used is of high import here. But why go further? The terms of the statutes (sections 2828 and 2829, when construed together, as they must be, because that latter refers to the former) settle the matter. The trustee might be a proper party, but by no means a necessary party, in a proceeding under section 2829, supra. The statute precludes him from being a party plaintiff, and he serves no useful purpose as a party defendant. This point is therefore ruled against the appellant.

[2] But in addition to this, be it said, the defendant in this case did not raise the question either by demurrer or answer. He is in no position to raise it now.

[3] II. It is urged that Bert Kaster, the wife of the defendant, should have been made a party defendant. If there were defects of parties plaintiff or defendants, such should have been raised either by demurrer or answer; otherwise, the question is waived, and cannot be urged in this court. The question was nowhere raised below. It is an afterthought in this court. In the recent case of Kideout v. Burkhardt, 255 Mo. loc. cit. 124, 164 S. W. 508, it is said:

"The only remaining proposition urged by appellants is that A. Kuns, trustee in the deed of trust executed by appellants, was a necessary party, and, since he is not made a party, there is a defect of parties defendant. As to this proposition, it is sufficient to say that, appellants having failed to raise the point either by demurrer or answer in the trial court, the point is deemed to have been waived. R. S. 1909, § 1804."

What is here said applies with equal force to the trustee, as indicated in the close of our point 1, supra.

[4] III. The answer upon which the case was tried was an amended answer, and was verified by affidavit, and it is urged that it in effect was a non est factum plea. In this answer there is a general denial, but nowhere in it is there a specific averment that the defendant did not in fact sign such note. On the contrary, the remainder of the answer proceeds upon the theory that the defendant did sign such note, but was mentally incapacitated at the time. The whole defense was conducted upon that theory. During the whole trial defendant sat mute, and never took the stand to deny his signature to the note. He was not a witness in his own behalf. By proper legal action he had been determined to be a person of sound mind long before the trial. His failure to testify to the salient things contained in his answer casts suspicion, at least, upon the bona fides of his claims. Kame v. Railroad, 254 Mo. loc. cit. 195, 162 S. W. 240; Bryant v. Lazarus, 235

Mo. loc. cit. 612, 130 S. W. 558; 16 Cyc. 1062. Of whether the signature to the note was his signature the defendant had peculiar knowledge. Whether he secured the consideration for the note was within his peculiar knowledge. Yet, with the latter question fully within his answer, he stood mute throughout.

But the foregoing is but preliminary to the question which appellant urges. The plaintiff offered the deed of trust, and the note, and rested his cause. The defendant then placed upon the stand a number of witnesses in an attempt to show that he was mentally incapacitated at the time of the execution of these instruments, and that plaintiff had knowledge of his condition. We use the words "in an attempt to show," supra, advisedly and purposely. He nowhere attempts to show that his signatures to the two instruments were not genuine. He proceeds throughout on the theory that they were genuine, but not binding, because of his mental incapacity. The note introduced was the note described in the deed of trust, and the deed of trust was duly acknowledged before a notary public. Upon the close of defendant's evidence, the trial court refused to allow plaintiff to introduce evidence upon mental capacity, stating that defendant's evidence failed to show mental incapacity, and entered judgment for plaintiff as heretofore stated. Now, when the deed of trust was offered, the following occurred:

"By Mr. Campbell: Plaintiff offers in evidence Plaintiff's Exhibit A, being the deed of trust in suit.

"By Mr. Jayne: Defendants object to the introduction of Plaintiff's Exhibit A, for the reason under the pleadings it is irrelevant and incompetent.

"By the Court: Objection overruled.

"(To which ruling on the part of the court, the defendants, by counsel, then and there duly excepted at the time, and still excepts.)"

When the note was offered, the following occurred:

"By Mr. Campbell: Plaintiff offers in evidence Plaintiff's Exhibit A1, being the note described in the deed of trust.

"By Mr. Jayne: Defendant objects to the introduction of Plaintiff's Exhibit A1, for the reason stated. It is irrelevant and incompetent, and not proper to introduce Exhibit A1 under the pleadings.

"By the Court: Objection overruled.

"(To which ruling on the part of the court the defendants, by counsel, then and there duly excepted at the time, and still excepts.)"

[5] Upon this status of the record the defendant now maintains that there was error in admitting these two instruments in evidence. There was no oral proof that defendant signed either instrument. The deed of trust was duly acknowledged, and no proof of signature was required. Barbee v. Bank, 240 Mo. loc. cit. 306, 144 S. W. 839; R. S. 1909, § 2818.

The deed of trust, when in evidence, furnished proof of the fact that the note therein described was signed by the defendant, because there was such recitation in the deed of trust over the signature of the defendant. The certificate of the notary as to defendant's signature to the deed made the deed evidence of all the facts recited therein. Among the recited facts was that he had signed and delivered this note to plaintiff. This made a prima facie case for the plaintiff.

[6] In addition to this the objections to the introduction of these instruments are not specific, and insufficient to raise the point made here. The point made here is that plaintiff should have proved the signatures. Such objections should have been made to the trial court. Those made are insufficient to raise the point. Williams v. Williams, 259 Mo. loc. cit. 250, 168 S. W. 618. In that case it is said:

"The above was not a sufficient objection upon which to base error. An objection to a question should be specific, so that the trial court may have a chance to pass upon the exact point which is intended to be urged. Kinlen v. Railroad, 216 Mo. 145; O'Neill v. Kansas City, 178 Mo. 91; Schmidt v. St. Louis Ry. Co., 163 Mo. 645; Primm v. Raboteau, 56 Mo. 407."

In the instant case the objections made should have pointed out to the court that proof of signatures had not been made. The objections are in the most general language. A trial court would have to think long before (if ever) he would conclude that the real objections were no proofs of signature had been made. Trial courts are entitled to know the real objections to the introduction of evidence, and cannot be ambushed by such general language as here used.

IV. We are asked (in a general way) to read the record from pages 30 to 168, for the evidence as to the mental condition of the defendant prior to the execution of the deed of trust. We have read it with care, although the brief filed makes but little point on this evidence. There were a number of witnesses examined. Many were indefinite as to dates, and whilst they concluded that defendant was incapable of transacting business, yet when pressed for facts, the facts related were trivial. Defendant drank liquor, and many of his alleged statements were no doubt due to that fact. They all had to admit that defendant had conducted a large business, and so far as they knew a successful business. The testimony was all oral, and the witnesses before the court, and in such case we will yield to his judgment.

But in addition to all this it appears that defendant's wife had procured a judgment for divorce and alimony. The alimony was in the sum of $4,000. In this status of affairs the defendant, through his guardian, brought a suit to set aside the very deed of trust and note here in suit. The present defendant, through his guardian and curator, was the plaintiff in that suit, and the present plaintiff, Sanders, was the defendant. Before the trial of the case there was an adjustment of difficulties. It was agreed that the wife should reduce her judgment to $3,500, instead of the $4,000 allowed her, and that the parties would close all litigation. Pursuant to this understanding, the following judgment of dismissal was entered in the suit to cancel the deed of trust and note:

"By agreement, order granting change of venue is set aside and plaintiff enters nonsuit, and by agreement it is found and adjudged that Nathan Kaster executed the deed of trust mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and same is adjudged to be a valid lien on the lands mentioned in said petition, and it is ordered by the court all costs heretofore be taxed against plaintiff herein, and execution issue therefor."

The reduced judgment of $3,500 was paid, and apparently all matters were adjusted until this case was instituted. The pleadings in that case are not fully set out in this record, but the substance of the petition is set out, and its allegations were substantially those of the answer in this case. It occurs to us that the question in this case has been adjudicated by this agreed judgment. But, whether so or not, there is no substance in this appeal, and the judgment below is affirmed.

BLAIR, P. J., concurs.
WOODSON, J., absent.

GOODE, J. (concurring). In this case the omission to make the trustee a party was not raised in the court below, and cannot be raised for the first time in this court; so whether, if the point had been made below, it would have been good, need not be considered here. 2 Jones, Mortgages (7th Ed.) 1397; Shelby v. Burtis, 18 Tex. 644.

ST. PAUL FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. et al.
v. AMERICAN TRUST CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2,
1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐719(4)—Appeal from judgment sustaining demurrers not dismissible because of absence of formal assignment of errors.

Plaintiffs' appeal from judgment following the sustaining of demurrers to the petition will not be dismissed because of lack of formal assignment of errors, where the case is one on the record proper, and appellants have, under their head of points and authorities, succinctly and definitely pointed out the reasons why they think the court erred in sustaining the demurrers.

2. Usury ⇐127—Owner of securities contracting with pledgor not to be personally liable not in privity, and entitled to raise question of usury.

Where bondholders of an insolvent railroad assigned their bonds to a bondholders' committee, empowering the committee to pledge the bonds, but expressly stipulating that the bondholders should not be personally liable on any loan, the bondholders could not recover the securities, when pledged, from the pledgee on the ground that the loan made was usurious, under the rule that the plea of usury is a privilege personal to the debtor or his privies, having, in effect, cut off their privity by their agreement, turning over the securities to the committee with plenary power and disclaiming personal liability on any contract for a loan.

3. Usury ⇐111(1)—Pleading held insufficient as not showing time that loan, for which commission was paid, had to run.

Usury was not sufficiently pleaded, where the only allegation of fact as to a $50,000 loan as to which usury was charged was that there was paid a commission of $1,000 and interest at the rate of 7 per cent. and the length of time the loan was to run was not stated; for mere conclusions are not sufficient, and the pleadings should show that the length of time the loan was to run was not such that, even with the $1,000 commission, the actual rate of interest would not exceed the legal rate, 8 per cent.

4. Usury ⇐92—To recover property pledged to secure loan usurious only in part, the valid portion of loan must be tendered.

Railroad bondholders could not recover from pledgee on ground of usury securities which had been pledged by bondholders' committee, as authorized by plaintiffs, where one of the loans for which the securities were pledged was not usurious, but was a valid lien upon the securities, and the plaintiff bondholders did not tender the amount of such loan, but merely offered to pay their pro rata share; the pledgee having the right to hold all the security until the payment of the debt.

5. Account ⇐4—No action lies for accounting by bondholders against committee, in absence of showing of insolvency.

Suit for accounting by railroad bondholders against bondholders' committee, on the ground the committee violated their duties to the bondholders' damage, held not to lie, in the absence of a showing of insolvency; there being a remedy at law.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Vital W. Garesche, Judge.

Action by the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company and others against the American Trust Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Kinealy & Kinealy, of St. Louis, for appellants.

Wildley, McIntyre, Nardin & Nelson, of St. Louis, for respondents.

GRAVES, J. Action in equity for an accounting. The petition only covers 50 closely printed pages. Defendants filed separate demurrers to the petition, each of which was sustained, and, plaintiffs refusing to plead further, judgment was entered against them, and from such judgment they have appealed. Counsel do not agree as to the substance and effect of the divers allegations of the voluminous petition. We give plaintiff's outline thereof, and can in the course of the opinion note the points of the divergent views of counsel. Plaintiffs' outline will at least convey the general idea of the case, and plaintiffs' contentions. In their statement of the case counsel for plaintiffs say:

"The case made by the petition is as follows:

"The Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company, owned and operated an electric railroad from Alton to Godfrey, a distance of some five miles, in Madison county, Ill., with the right to extend same to Jerseyville, Jacksonville, and Peoria. On July 1, 1910, the company executed a mortgage upon all its property to secure an issue of $600,000 of bonds, and nearly the whole amount of the bonds were issued and sold. Thereupon the company entered into a contract with Grommet Bros. and John Scott & Sons to construct the roadbed for an extension of the road from Godfrey to Jerseyville, and that being completed in May, 1911, there was due the contractors some $10,000, for which, under the laws of Illinois, they had a lien. For the finishing of that portion of the road the company entered into a contract with Grommet & Johnston to surface the roadbed, lay the steel, and put up the overhead structure, and under that the contractors did work until August, 1911, when it was stopped by the railroad company, at which time the contractors claimed a balance of about $40,000 due, for which, under the laws of Illinois, they claimed a lien. In the fall of 1911, one Davis filed a suit in the circuit court of Madison county, Ill., for the appointment of a receiver for the road, and in that suit one Butler was appointed receiver, with authority to take possession of and operate the railroad. Thereupon the holders of the bonds of the railroad company entered into a written agreement dated December 4, 1911, between themselves as parties of the first part and W. C. Fordyce, George L. Edwards, and J. C. Van Riper, of St. Louis, C. A. Caldwell, of Alton, and John J. Cummings, of Chicago, as a bondholders' committee, parties of the second part, which recited the execution of the mortgage and the receivership proceedings and the desirability that the property and franchises of the road should be sold either at receiver's sale or under foreclosure of the mortgage and that the interest of the bondholders should be protected and that that could best be done by a committee, and therefore it is agreed between the parties as follows:

"First. That the above-named parties should constitute a committee to represent all the subscribers to the agreement with power to take such measures and do such things to effectuate the above purposes and to protect the interests of the subscribers as the committee deemed advisable.

"Second. Each subscriber sets opposite his name the face value of the bonds owned by him, and agrees to deposit same with the Commonwealth Trust Company for the use of the committee, and assigns to the committee for the purposes of the agreement all his bonds and his rights as bondholder.

"Third. The committee shall represent the subscribers in all rights as such bondholders, and the action of the committee shall be deemed the action of the subscribers. The committee shall have the sole management of matters arising under the agreement and may pay out such sums as they deem necessary, including a reasonable compensation to themselves. The committee may take such steps as they deem for the best interest of the subscribers towards causing a sale of the property and to protect the interests of the subscribers.

"Fourth. In case of a sale of the property of the railroad the committee is authorized to purchase same, and to use the bonds and coupons in payment therefor.

"Fifth. The committee shall have power to borrow money required to be put up in case of a sale of the property in order to pay the costs and expenses of the receivership and of the sale, including all allowances to receivers, attorneys, etc. The committee shall have power to execute a mortgage on the properties bought at any such sale, and is authorized to mortgage or pledge all the rights of the bondholders, or which they may have to any of the proceeds of the sale of the railroad property, and also all the rights of every kind which the subscribers may have as bondholders; it being understood, however, that for reimbursements for money borrowed the committee must look solely to the property transferred to the committee, and that there shall be no personal liability on the part of the bondholders.

"Sixth. In case the committee should purchase the property of the railroad company, it is authorized to organize a new corporation and to transfer same to it.

"Seventh. The committee shall exercise all the rights and powers of the several owners of the bonds, and shall take such measures and do such acts as it appears proper to the interests of the subscribers. The Commonwealth Trust Company is authorized to deliver all the bonds to the committee. The committee shall have all powers necessary or incident or which appear expedient for carrying out the purposes of the agreement.

"Eighth. Any person loaning money to the committee shall not be required to look to the application thereof.

"Ninth. In case any question arises as to the construction of the agreement, same shall be decided by the written instructions of three-fourths in value of the bonds represented by the subscribers. The committee shall not be liable for any errors of judgment. The death, resignation, or disability of any member of the committee shall not dissolve it, but the remaining members shall appoint a successor. The agreement shall continue in force until the matters therein provided for shall have been carried out. The trust company shall give a receipt for all bonds deposited under the agreement, and the agreement shall be for the benefit of the parties, their executors and assigns. The death of a subscriber shall not revoke the powers of the committee, nor shall such powers be revoked during the existence of the agreement. The vote of a majority of the committee shall control its action.

"Tenth. The failure of any subscriber to perform any part of his undertaking shall not release any other subscriber.

"Eleventh. Upon the winding up of the matters covered by the agreement, all moneys, properties, and securities held by the committee shall, after payment of all expenses and liabilities incurred by the committee, be divided ratably among the holders of the depositary receipts.

"Twelfth. Since certain of the subscribers hold bonds in pledge, they shall be entitled to participate on the understanding that they shall later on perfect their title to the bonds held by them.

"This bondholders' agreement was signed by the holders of a total of $589,750, face value out of the total of $600,000 of bonds issued, and each signer deposited his bonds with the Commonwealth Trust Company in accordance with the agreement. Amongst such signers and depositors were T. J. Scott, $20,000; Hearne Timber Company, $9,500; S. H. Wyss, who later assigned his rights to plaintiff, Khlmler, $54,000; Frank Blake, who later assigned his rights to plaintiff, St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Co., $55,500.

"On May 16, 1912, a written agreement was made between John J. Cummings on the one part and the other members of the bondholders' committee on the other part to the effect that the parties should co-operate in causing the Madison county circuit court to authorize the receiver to issue receiver's certificates to finish the road to Jerseyville and for equipment, and that efforts should be made to have the road sold and purchased by the committee, and that thereupon the parties to the agreement should cause a new railroad corporation to be formed, with a capital stock of $500,000, and which should issue $500,000 in bonds. Thereupon the bondholders' committee and Cummings filed a petition in the receivership case, asking that the receiver be authorized to issue receiver's certificates for the purposes aforesaid, and the court made an order, granting the request and ordering that the certificates should be a first lien upon the property of the railroad company. From this order Grommet & Johnston, Grommet Bros., and John Scott & Sons, the lien-claiming contractors, appealed, and the appellate court affirmed the order authorizing the issue of the receiver's certificates, but reversed it so far as the order undertook to make the receiver's certificates a lien prior or superior to the mechanics' liens of the contractors. The receiver's certificates were issued and used in completing the construction of the road to Jerseyville and in purchasing certain cars and other equipment.

"Under date of February 20, 1914, a contract was made between John J. Cummings as party of the first part and the remaining members of the bondholders' committee as a committee, which recites that whereas, various agreements had been made between the parties; and whereas, negotiations are now being concluded whereby those agreements are to be abrogated and adjustments made disposing of the various interests of the bondholders, lien claimants and others interested in the property and the litigation: Therefore it is agreed between the parties as follows:

"(1) The prior agreements between the parties shall be deemed abrogated upon the taking effect of this agreement.

"(2) The parties agree to co-operate to procure an order of sale of the railroad company's property from the circuit court of Madison county, and to bid in the property at such price as shall be agreed upon.

"(3) The bonds deposited for the use of the committee shall be used and deposited in payment of the purchase price of the property, if bought by the committee, and, if deemed advisable, the receivers' certificates may also be used for that purpose, Cummings agreeing to procure the same for the committee; the committee to issue to him a participation certificate evidencing the amount of such receiver's certificates.

"(4) The committee agrees to raise sufficient money by pleading the securities in their possession to pay all the necessary incidental expenses, the receiver's salary, and any cash that may be necessary to be expended in compromising the lien claims.

"(5) Before participation certificates shall be issued to parties whose claims are compromised, such parties shall agree to release their pending proceeds and discharge the company and its property from liability.

"(6) In case the property is purchased at the contemplated sale by the committee, a corporation shall be organized by the parties to the agreement, with a capital stock to be later determined, and with authority to issue $2,000,000 of first mortgage bonds of which $450,000 shall be issued and the remainder held to be used for extensions and betterments; the general form of the mortgage deed to be satisfactory to Cummings and the committee, as well as to E. W. Clarke & Co. of Philadelphia; the $450,000 of bonds to be delivered to the committee and all the stock to Cummings; the reorganization to be subject to the orders of the Public Utilities Commission of Illinois.

"(7) In case any question arises as to the relative amount of stock and bond issue, the stock issue shall be reduced instead of the bond issue, so that $450,000 of bonds may be issued.

"(8) Cummings agrees to cause said $450,000 of bonds to be guaranteed by the East St. Louis & Suburban Railroad Company or any of the associated companies controlled by E. W. Clarke & Co.

"(9) It is understood that Cummings represents that he has a valid agreement with E. W. Clarke & Co., under and by the terms of which they undertake to guarantee at least $450,000, par value, of the bonds of the company to be organized as herein provided, and it is agreed that the only liability that Cummings assumes relating to the procurement of the guaranty is his obligation to enforce at his own expense the agreement with E. W. Clarke & Co. and he agrees that he will perform the several provisions of his contract with those parties, and in the event of the failure of Clarke & Co. to fulfill the terms of their agreement and guarantee the bonds the committee may be subrogated to the rights of Cummings in his agreement with Clarke & Co. Cummings represents that he has not, since the execution of his contract with Clarke & Co., permitted anything to be done which would impair his right to enforce that contract, and agrees that if there are any equities to that effect of which he has no cognizance he will at once remove or satisfy same so that the contract may be enforced.

"(10) It is agreed that all bonds which shall be issued by the reorganized company shall be held by the committee for the purpose of conserving the rights of all parties, and participation certificates shall be issued by the committee as evidence of the interest of the respective parties, and the committee agrees that there shall be issued to Cummings, to evidence the lien of the receiver's certificates aggregating $100,000, and which were purchased by him, a participation certificate, entitling him to receive $90,000 in cash from the committee within five years from the date hereof, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum. None of the bonds of the reorganized company shall be distributed or sold until the amount for which the new bonds are pledged have been paid, and until the said sum of $90,000 is paid to Cummings on his participation certificate. The committee agrees to try to sell within five years enough of the bonds to realize said sum of $90,000.

"(11) If bonds sufficient in number are not sold to realize the amount due Cummings within five years, then the committee shall deliver to him bonds which, at their market value shall equal $90,000, and in case of a difference of opinion as to the market value of the bond same shall be determined by arbitration.

"(12) In case settlement cannot be made with the lien claimants, and others, so as to permit an adjustment of those claims for less than $90,000, this agreement shall be void.

"(13) Cummings agrees to accept the participation certificate mentioned in clause 10 in exchange for the receiver's certificates, and will on demand secure said certificates and assign them to the committee.

"(14) Cummings pledges certain bonds belonging to him in the possession of the committee under the bondholders' agreement for the faithful performance of the terms and conditions of this contract.

"Upon the execution of that agreement between Cummings and the bondholders' committee the latter compromised and settled the lien claims of the contractors. The agreement for such compromise was made on the faith of Cummings' statement that the new bonds would be guaranteed by E. W. Clarke & Co., and were all in the same form, and the following, with Grommet & Johnston, may be taken as a sample:

"In consideration of the bondholders' committee using their best endeavors to effect a settlement of all matters involved in the receivership of the Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company, and in order to bring about an early settlement for the benefit of all parties concerned, we, the undersigned, hereby agree to accept in full settlement of all claims, and liens which we have against the Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company, and all other persons, firms and corporations, a participation certificate, to be issued by the bondholders' committee (appointed under agreement of December 4, 1911), which shall represent nine thousand dollars ($9,000) par value of five per cent. bonds of a new railway company with an authorized issue of bonds aggregating two million dollars, of which amount four hundred fifty thousand dollars ($450,000) are to be issued at the time of making the new mortgage. The participation certificate shall be issued under the terms and conditions set forth in the agreement between John J. Cummings and the bondholders' committee, dated February 20, 1914.

"It is understood that the bondholders' committee have secured the obligation of E. W. Clarke & Co. that said four hundred fifty thousand dollars ($450,000) of bonds, principal and interest shall be guaranteed by the East St. Louis & Suburban Railway, or any of the associated companies controlled by E. W. Clarke & Co. of Philadelphia, said company to be satisfactory to the bondholders' committee and John J. Cummings.

"We further agree to dismiss all our suits now pending against said railway company and all others, and pay the court costs incurred by us and taxable against us in connection with our litigation, not including any attorneys' or receivers' fees or allowances; we, however, to pay our own attorneys' fees. And we hereby fully completely release and discharge all claims and causes of action which we have against the Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company or the bondholders of said company and the properties involved in said receivership, and all liens and claims of every kind whatsoever against said parties and said properties.

"It is further understood and agreed that we will co-operate with your bondholders' committee in an effort to procure as speedily as possible an order of the circuit court of Madison county, Illinois, directing the sale of the property of the Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company.

"It is understood that the participation certificates shall be issued to us as soon as the agreement between Mr. John J. Cummings and the bondholders' committee, dated February 20, 1914, goes into effect, as provided in said agreement and if said participation certificates be not so issued, this agreement shall be null and void and all rights under same canceled and held of no effect.

"On the execution of these agreements with the lien claimants the participation certificates, in accordance with the terms of the agreements, were issued to them, and they dismissed their lien proceedings.

"When these agreements had been all made, Cummings and the committee took such steps in the receivership case as resulted in a sale of the road under an order of the court, and upon such sale J. O. Van Riper of the committee became the purchaser of the road, and in payment for same surrendered and canceled all of the receiver's certificates, and $589,750 worth of the bonds. In order to pay the allowances made the attorneys and the receiver, the commissioner and other incidental expenses attending the sale, the committee borrowed from the American Trust Company of St. Louis $50,000 and by reason of an agreement to pay a commission of $1,000, as well as 7 per cent. interest, this loan was usurious. Later on, the committee, requiring other funds, borrowed an additional amount of $7,000 from the trust company.

"After Van Riper had bought the road, Cummings and the committee caused a new corporation to be organized under the laws of Illinois, known as the Alton & Jacksonville Railroad Company, and to this company Van Riper transferred the property purchased by him at the sale. The directors of this new company are Van Riper, Edwards, Fordyce and Caldwell, of the bondholders' committee, John J. Cummings, John L. Butler, and Edward P. Keshner, Mr. Van Riper being president. The capital stock of the corporation as organized was originally $1,000, and thereupon an application was made to the Public Utilities Commission of Illinois for leave to issue bonds and stocks. Several hearings were had upon this application, and several orders made, but the whole proceeding culminated in a final order, made on December 2, 1915, in lieu of all other orders and findings of the commission. That order recited the sale of the property under the decree of the circuit court of Madison county, in pursuance of the reorganization agreement, and it set forth a finding by the commission that the total amount of the bonds and stock of the new company should not exceed $642,000, and authorized the railroad company to increase its capital stock to $142,000, and to issue $500,000 of first mortgage bonds, of which the stock and $450,000 of the bonds should be issued for the acquisition of the Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company property, and the remaining $50,000 in bonds should be sold at not less than 85 cents on the dollar, and the proceeds used as a working capital for the company and for improving the roadbed. All of the stock permitted by this order was issued and delivered to the directors, who delivered same to the American Trust Company, and all of the bonds were issued and delivered to the American Trust Company, but none of the bonds were guaranteed by E. W. Clarke & Co. or by any of the companies controlled by them, and they refused to make such guaranty.

"Although Cummings in his agreement with the bondholders' committee contracted on the express agreement that he had a contract with E. W. Clarke & Co., by which they pledged themselves to guarantee the bonds, and although the lien claimants gave up their prior liens on the faith of that statement of Cummings, yet he never exhibited the alleged contract to the committee, and as a matter of fact he had no such agreement with E. W. Clarke & Co. Plaintiffs are informed that he was interested in some contract of somebody with Clarke & Co., wherein they, under certain conditions, agreed to guarantee such bonds, but they claimed that those conditions were never fulfilled. At any rate Clarke & Co. never guaranteed the bonds, and all idea of procuring their guaranty was dropped by Cummings and the committee.

"Plaintiffs, lien claimants and holders of participation certificates as well as certain of the original bondholders of the old Alton, Jacksonville & Peoria Railway Company, made demand upon the American Trust Company for the distribution of the bonds and stocks of the Alton & Jacksonville Railroad in its possession, offering to pay their pro rata share of any valid indebtedness for which they were pledged to the trust company. The trust company refused to do this, and claimed that it was holding the bonds and stocks of the Alton & Jacksonville road, first, to secure an indebtedness due itself of $57,000; and, secondly, to secure an indebtedness of $90,000 due to John J. Cummings for his receiver's certificates.

"The prayer of the petition is that Cummings, by reason of his default in regard to the procuring of the guaranty of the bonds by Clarke & Co., be decreed to have no lien or claim against the bonds and stocks of the Alton & Jacksonville Railroad Company prior and superior to that of plaintiffs; that an account be taken of the amount of such bonds and stocks in the possession of the American Trust Company which plaintiffs are entitled to receive, respectively, as their proportionate part thereof; that the American Trust Company be decreed to deliver to plaintiffs their said proportionate part thereof upon the payment of their respective proportionate part of any valid indebtedness for which they are pledged, and for general relief."

The demurrers were alike in form and language, and that of one of them reads:

"Now comes the American Trust Company, defendant in the above-entitled cause, and demurs to the petition filed herein, and for grounds for demurrer states:

"First. That said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against this defendant.

"Second. That this defendant is not a necessary party to this action.

"Third. That this court has no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action complained of in the petition.

"Fourth. That there is no equity in the petition."

As stated, the divergent views of counsel as to the substance and effect of the averments of the petition can be best noted in the course of the opinion. This outlines the case.

[1] I. In brief of respondents is a motion to dismiss the appeal because appellant has not made a formal assignment of errors. This point is not well taken. The brief of appellant contains several distinctly and clearly made points, with cited authorities, and this has always been held sufficient, although there might not be a formal assignment of errors. The only formal assignment of error that could be made in this case is that the court erred in sustaining the several demurrers. The case is one on the record proper; and, as said appellants have, under their head of points and authorities, succinctly and definitely pointed out the reasons why they think the court erred in sustaining the demurrers, under both the old and new rules of this court, we have held this a sufficient compliance with our rules. This point is ruled against respondent.

[2] II. Going to appellant's brief, the first and really a pivotal point, in their view, is that the American Trust Company cannot hold these securities against these plaintiffs (the alleged beneficial owners of a part thereof) because such company holds them as a pledgee under an usurious contract. They do not deny that the American Trust Company loaned the bondholders' committee the money claimed, but they say that by reason of the fact that the American Trust Company charged 7 per cent. on the loan, and an additional $1,000 commission, they exceeded the lawful rate of 8 per cent. and the contract was usurious. To our mind there are several answers to this contention. First the contract for the loan was made between the bondholders' committee and the trust company. The plaintiffs were not parties to the contract. By their agreement they had expressly excluded themselves from making such contracts, and had provided against any personal liability thereon. That under the contracts this committee had the right to borrow money, provided they only used the property as security, there is no question. That they did borrow the money there is no question. That the property in dispute is being held as security for this money there is no question. That these plaintiffs by their agreement refused to become parties to this loan agreement, or otherwise become parties to the loans which were to be made, stands out in bold type, on the face of the petition. They declined to be parties to this or any other loan to the committee. The committee was placed in charge of certain securities, to be used by it, but with the express understanding and agreement that these plaintiffs and others interested in the work of the committee would not negotiate loans or be responsible personally for loans.

So that the first question arising upon these facts, is whether or not these plaintiffs are in position to raise the question of usury. The loan was made between the committee and the trust company. These are the parties to the contract. The committee was forbidden to make plaintiffs and those similarly situated parties to such a contract. Under this status of pleaded facts, can plaintiffs raise the question of usury? We think not. The general rule is:

"The plea of usury is a privilege personal to the debtor or his privies in blood, contract or representation, and an attaching creditor of the mortgagor is a privy in representation with the mortgagor, and hence can interpose the defense." Coleman v. Cole, 158 Mo. 253, 59 S. W. 106; Marx v. Hart, 166 Mo. loc. cit. 524, 66 S. W. 260, 89 Am. St. Rep. 715.

So in the case at bar these plaintiffs might be in position to challenge this contract but for the fact that they, in effect, cut off their privy by the bondholders' agreement, by which they turned over the securities to such committee to be used as their own, and with the express reservation that they should not be obligated by any contract made for a loan. They are in the attitude of the man who stands by and sees a third party sell his horse without objection. Their mouths are closed, and their remedy is elsewhere, if any they have. They turned over these securities with the express understanding that they would be pledged, and the further express understanding that they must not be made liable in any contract of pledge. This contract of pledge is one solely between the bondholders' committee and the trust company, and these plaintiffs are in no position to urge usury. They cut off their own privy to the contract as successfully as it could be done, by the bondholders' agreement. By that contract the matter passed beyond their control as to future contracts. The powers of the committee were plenary.

[3] III. There is another reason for the failure of the petition in this case as to the matter of interest. The allegations are that the American Trust Company made at least two loans of money to the committee, one for $50,000 and another for $7,000. The usury is charged as to the first. As to this loan the only allegation is that for it there was paid a commission of $1,000 and interest at the rate of 7 per cent. Eight per cent. is the allowable interest. The length of time this loan was to run is not stated. This is important in the charge of usury. Mere conclusions of fact should not suffice. Had the time the loan was to run been stated it might appear that even with the $1,000 commission, the actual rate of interest would not exceed the 8 per cent. allowed by law. The facts should have been pleaded, and not mere conclusions.

[4] IV. No charge of usury is made as to the second $7,000 loan. This is clearly a valid lien upon all the property sought in this action. Under the bondholders' agreement, the committee was authorized to make the loan and pledge all the property. Until this debt is paid, or tendered, the plaintiffs have no standing. They only offer to pay their pro rata share. This will not suffice. The American Trust Company has a valid lien for at least the whole of this $7,000, as against all and each part of the property, and a mere offer to pay a small pro rata part of the debt is not sufficient. As to this $7,000 the American Trust Company had the right to hold all the security until the debt was paid. Plaintiffs should at least have tendered the payment of this full sum. This they did not do.

[5] V. Other matters pleaded go to mere irregular conduct upon the part of the committee, now claimed to be their agents. With these the American Trust Company had no part nor parcel. If the committee violated their duties, if they were the agents of the plaintiffs, and if plaintiffs were damaged or injured thereby, there is no action in equity, unless there be a showing of insolvency, so as to avoid a perfect remedy at law. No such showing is made in the petition. The demurrers were well taken, and the judgment nisi is affirmed.

(No. 21141.)

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
April 10, 1920. Motion for Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error §1009(4)—Findings not disturbed in equity cases unless clearly against weight of evidence.

In equity cases, the Supreme Court will not disturb lower court's findings of facts unless clearly satisfied they are against the weight of the evidence, especially where there is a volume of conflicting testimony by oral witnesses on each side of every issue.

2. Trusts §48—That one trustee shared in cash commission with another trustee held not to invalidate deed of trust.

That one trustee shared with the other in a cash commission in addition to regular commission provided for by deed of trust, pursuant to letter prepared by former trustee and signed by trustor after former trustee had told trustor that latter trustee demanded the cash commission, did not impair validity of deed of trust, even though trustor did not read, or read carefully, such letter, where former trustees did nothing to prevent him from so doing.

3. Evidence §271(7), 317(4)—Trustor's declarations as to contents of deed held inadmissible as hearsay and self-serving.

In action to cancel deed of trust on ground that trustees misled trustor as to contents thereof, evidence offered by plaintiffs as to trustor's declarations to witnesses as to contents of deed of trust held inadmissible to show that trustor made a mistake, or did not know contents thereof, being hearsay and self-serving.

4. Fraudulent conveyances §110(6)—Deed of trust held not void in so far as to use of grantor's children.

Father's deed of trust providing for monthly payment by trustees of specified amount to him during his lifetime and thereafter to his children, and providing for payment of principal to children upon their reaching specified age, was void, under Rev. St. 1909, § 2880, making conveyances to use of grantor void as to creditors and purchasers, as to father's subsequent purchasers or creditors who could reach such specified amount in a proper proceeding, but was not void as to children's remainder, being a valid conveyance, so far as it was for use of the children, even as to creditors and purchasers.

5. Fraudulent conveyances §172(2) — Deed of trust to grantor's use will not be canceled in action for grantor's benefit.

Deed of trust will not be canceled in action therefor brought for grantor's benefit under Rev. St. 1909, § 2880, making conveyance to use of grantor void as to creditors and purchasers; such statute not being for benefit of grantor, but for purchasers and creditors.

6. Deeds §7—Parent can deed children a contingent remainder.

A parent can by deed give his children a contingent remainder; such conveyance not being void or for grantor's use.

7. Remainders §1—Contingent remainder an "interest in real estate."

A contingent remainder is an "interest in real estate."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interest.]

8. Trusts §140(3)—Deed of trust held to create vested remainder in trustor's children.

Father's deed of trust, providing for monthly payment to him of specified amount out of income or principal during his lifetime and thereafter to his children born or to be born, and providing for payment of principal to children upon their reaching specified age, created a vested, and not merely a contingent, remainder in the children, notwithstanding after-born children were to share in remainder, and notwithstanding that amount annually payable to father was payable out of principal.

9. Fraudulent conveyances §172(1)—Deed of trust not void as a conveyance to grantor's use.

Father's deed of trust, providing for monthly payment of $500 to him, with such further sum as in trustees' discretion became necessary for medical and other extraordinary expenses, with remainder over to children, held not void as a conveyance to father's use on theory that entire estate might be appropriated for such extraordinary expenses, where income was $5,000 per month, since if the contingency of father being entitled to anything for medical expenses, etc., in addition to regular allowance to the detriment of creditors or purchasers ever happened, equity would determine the amount to which he would be so entitled, and award it to creditors or purchasers.

10. Equity §65(2)—He who comes into equity must come with clean hands.

Equity will not cancel deed of trust on ground that by fraud or mistake certain clauses had been omitted therefrom, when purpose of omitted clauses had been to enable grantor, a married man, to carry out an illegal agreement with a married woman, whereby they were each to procure divorces and marry each other, though in fact grantor, when divorced, married a third person, since he who comes into equity must come with clean hands.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Wm. T. Jones, Judge.

Action by Bates H. McFarland and another, trustees for Henry B. Graham and Georgine M. Graham, against John E. Bishop and another, trustees for Henry B. Graham, Dorothy M. Graham, Marjorie P. Graham, and Henry B. Graham, III, and others. Judgment for defendants and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Koerner, Fahey & Young and Jourdan, Ras-sieur & Pierce, all of St. Louis, for appellants.

Wilfey, McIntyre, Nardin & Nelson, of St. Louis, for respondents Bishop and American Trust Co.

T. J. Rowe, of St. Louis, guardian ad litem of infant respondents Marjorie P. Graham and Henry B. Graham, III.

SMALL, C. I. On May 24, 1916, Henry B. Graham of that city, then about 41 years of age, signed and delivered an agreement dated May 23, 1916, which is sought to be set aside by this proceeding. By said agreement Graham conveyed to the defendants John E. Bishop, his attorney, and the American Trust Company, as joint trustees, all of his estate, consisting of both real and personal property, all located in St. Louis. The real estate was incumbered and the equities were of the estimated value of $87,200. The personal property, consisting mostly of stocks and bonds, was of the value of about $513,351.81. The yearly gross income from the personal estate was about $32,420. Not including the deeds of trust on the real estate, the amount of his indebtedness was $168,000, and the total yearly fixed charges, including interest, amounted to $23,246.22. In addition, he owed sundry current bills, amounting to $2,772. The larger part of this indebtedness was held by W. K. Bixby, all of which was secured by stock in the Graham Paper Company, a very prosperous concern, the common stock of which was then paying 27 per cent. annual dividends. Afterwards, such dividends were greatly increased, so that from the time the deed of trust was made, until the trial, a period of less than 2 years, the aggregate dividends on such common stock, of which the trustees held 700 shares, was $220 on each share. His net income at the time the first deed of trust was made, over interest and other charges, was about $9,000 per annum, and at the time the petition was filed it alleges the gross income from the estate was $5,000 per month.

The deed of trust by which the property was conveyed to the defendants Bishop and the American Trust Company, as trustees, after reciting that it was made "to make provision for the party of the first part and his children, Dorothy, Marjorie, and Henry B., III, and any child or children that may hereafter be born to the party of the first part," and with the power and obligation on the part of the trustees to hold, sell, manage, invest, and reinvest said property, and to that end to undertake to provide for the payment of the then existing debts and obligations of the said Graham, and of all liens and incumbrances upon said property from either sale or by pledging said property, provided that "from the property hereby conveyed to said trustees, or from the income or proceeds of sale of said property, or from any property or proceeds thereof, acquired by the trustees, under the provisions and powers hereof, the said trustees shall pay or provide for the payment of the fixed charges," etc. And also by paragraph 4 it was provided that—

"From said estate, or from the income or proceeds thereof, said trustees shall during the lifetime of the party of the first part (said Graham), and the continuance of this trust, pay to the party of the first part, the sum of $500.00 per month * * * and in addition thereto, such further sums, as in the sole discretion of the said trustees, may be necessary and proper to provide for medical and hospital care and treatment, and such extraordinary care and expenses as may arise from bodily injury, sickness or ill health of the party of the first part."

Then follows a provision that after all the debts of said Graham have been paid, together with all expenses and indebtedness incurred by the trustees, the said Graham shall receive "all of the income from said estate." It was also then provided as follows in said agreement:

"The trust hereby created shall be a continuing one, and the trust estate shall be held intact subject to the payments hereinabove provided, during the life of the party of the first part, and after his death, the same shall be held for his children in equal parts, and as they severally arrive at the age of twenty-five (25) years the proportionate part of the estate then held by the trustees hereunder shall be paid to said children, except that no child shall receive his or her proportionate part of said estate until one year after the death of the party of the first part. And providing further that the trustees are authorized after the death of the party of the first part from said estate to pay to or on behalf of each of said children such amount as in the judgment of said trustees may be necessary and proper for the support, maintenance, education and comforts of said children."

At the time said agreement was executed and delivered, the trust company agreed to and did advance some $15,000 or $16,000 to pay off pressing debts secured thereby, and at the time of the trial, had paid off about one-half of the total indebtedness, leaving about one-half thereof unpaid, and had also, in the meantime, paid the said Graham $500 per month.

On March 12, 1917, Graham and his then wife made another deed of trust, revoking the deed of trust of May 23, 1916, made to the defendants Bishop and American Trust Company, and conveying to the plaintiffs McFarland and Janis, as trustees, all of his property, real and personal, including that in possession of the defendants, and authorizing them to take possession thereof, and, if necessary, to resort to the courts for that purpose. Plaintiffs thereupon, on March 14, 1917, demanded of said defendants, trustees, the possession of all the property conveyed to them, and then in their hands, with which demand they refused to comply. Thereupon, on March 17, 1917, this suit was brought.

The deed of trust executed to the plaintiffs on March 12, 1917, after conveying all said property, provided that the much larger part thereof in value should be held by said trustees for the joint use and benefit of the said Henry B. Graham and Georgine Graham, his wife, and to the survivor of them, and also contained the following clause:

"In case of the death or divorcement of my wife, prior to my decease, said estate shall vest automatically in said trustees and be thereafter held and administered by them as part of my general estate, under paragraph second hereof, subject to the order, as to alimony, of the court granting such divorce and said joint estate may be changed or revoked at any time prior to such death or divorcement by joint action of myself and my wife, Georgine Graham."

The balance of the property, not included in the joint estate in case he died before his wife, was to be held in trust and paid to his children then living and afterwards born in practically the same manner as in the deed of trust of May 23, 1916. As to this part of the trust estate, a power of revocation was vested in Graham alone. There was also a similar provision for the payment of all existing creditors by the trustees, and like powers of management, control, sale, investment, and reinvestment, as in the conveyance of May 23, 1916. Also a provision for a payment of $1,000 per month to said Graham, until all debts were paid, and then the whole income from the joint estate was to be paid to his wife and himself jointly, and the income on the balance of his estate to himself. The instrument further provided that in consideration of the creation of the joint estate in the wife and the husband, the wife relinquished all her rights of dower to her husband in said estate. It was signed by Graham and his wife, Georgine Graham.

The petition, after setting up the execution of these two deeds of trust, charged that the deed of trust of May 23, 1916, made to the defendants Bishop and American Trust Company, as trustees, was void under section 2880, R. S. 1909, which provides that all conveyances for the use of the grantor shall be void as to existing creditors and subsequent creditors and purchasers. The petition further alleged that the plaintiffs, as trustees, were purchasers, in that they were trustees for the wife, and also represented the creditors of said Graham. That it was also void because it was procured by the fraud of the defendant Bishop, in inducing said Graham by false representations as to its contents to execute it. Also, because it was procured by accident and mistake, in that the said Graham, at the time he executed it, supposed that it contained a clause authorizing him to revoke it and change it, and for the return of his property to him, when his debts were paid.

That it was also void because said Graham was intoxicated at the time he executed it, and was mentally incapacitated on account of his indulgence in strong drink, and by reason of worry over his daughter's illness, his own bad health, and the trouble with his then wife.

The prayer of the petition is that the agreement of May 23, 1916, be canceled, and an order be made, compelling defendants Bishop and the American Trust Company, trustees, to deliver possession of the estate to the plaintiffs. The answer of the defendants put the allegations of the petition in issue.

It appeared from the evidence that said Graham, at the time the suit was commenced, had been married four times. His first wife had died, leaving two children, Dorothy and Marjorie. In 1912 his second wife was divorced; she had one child, Henry B. Graham, III. He afterwards married a third time, and in February, 1916, his third wife left him, and went to New York City, where she lived in adultery with another man. By her Graham had no children.

In March, 1916, he became engaged to marry Mrs. Snowden, who was then living with her husband in St. Louis, as soon as he should be divorced from his wife and she from her husband. Both of them employed the same lawyer in St. Louis to bring their divorce suits for them. Graham's divorce suit was brought in the county of St. Louis, his wife coming on from New York City and being served with process in that county. She failed to appear at the trial. A divorce was granted to him on the 3d of June, 1916. The wife received $2,500 in money, for which she released her rights in his homestead, and made no defense to his suit. Mrs. Snowden brought her suit in the city of St. Louis, and her divorce was granted on the 30th day of June, 1916. On the 1st of July, Graham eloped with Mrs. Snowden's sister. They went to Decatur, Ill. They tarried there a day or so, and then went to Indianapolis, where they remained a few days. They then proceeded to Pearl Beach, Mich., where Graham had a summer home, and the next day they were married. They returned to St. Louis about the 26th of July, in order that Graham might attend a meeting of the Graham Paper Company, in which he was a director. Mrs. Snowden then sued him for breach of promise for $100,000 which he compromised for $4,000.

The evidence showed that Graham was a hard drinker, but it was conflicting as to whether or not it incapacitated him from business. Much testimony was introduced pro and con on this issue. The same is true as to whether or not he was drunk at the time he executed the instrument of May 23, 1916.

There was evidence on the part of the plaintiffs tending to support the allegations of the petition that Graham supposed that said instrument of May 23, 1916, contained a clause giving him the right to revoke it, and providing that his property should be returned to him, when his debts were paid, for the reason, among other things, that he was engaged to marry Mrs. Snowden, when he should be divorced from his then wife, and Mrs. Snowden should be divorced from her husband, and he desired to make a provision for her of greater value than he would be able to do from the $500 per month and the income of his property, after his debts were paid, reserved to him by said agreement. On the other hand, there was evidence to show that while Graham wanted this reservation in said deed of trust, he was notified a day or so before it was executed by defendant Bishop that the trust company would not consent to any such reservation, and would not act as trustee except on condition that the said deed of trust was irrevocable; that Mr. Bishop fully explained the deed of trust, as it was made, to Graham before he executed it, and that he fully understood its contents, and was sober and in his right mind when he executed and delivered it.

Likewise, on all other issues in the case, there was much evidence, and it was conflicting. The evidence was all practically oral, and delivered in open court before the judge below, who decided all the issues of fact in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment against the plaintiffs and for the defendants. After unsuccessfully moving for a new trial, the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

In the view we take of this case, it is not necessary for us to set out the proceedings at the trial, or refer to the very voluminous testimony to any greater extent than we have done, or shall do in the course of this opinion.

[1] II. The record is very voluminous. It would be wholly impracticable to attempt to set out even the substance of the evidence of the various witnesses. The testimony was practically all oral. It was heard by the learned chancellor below, who had a better opportunity to observe the witnesses and judge of the weight of their testimony than we have from the cold type of the record. He found all the issues of fact for the respondents and against the appellants. Even had we some doubt as to the correctness of his conclusion on the facts, we should not be inclined to disturb his rulings, because our rule in equity cases is to defer somewhat to the findings of the lower court as to the facts, and not to disturb such findings unless we are clearly satisfied that they are against the weight of the evidence. This rule is especially applicable when there is such volume of conflicting testimony by oral witnesses on each side of every issue as is the case here. But in this case the evidence has not awakened any doubt in our minds as to the soundness of the conclusion on the facts of the learned chancellor below. On the other hand, we entirely agree with him that the weight of the evidence is clearly in favor of the respondents on the issues in the case. That there was no fraud or misrepresentation practiced by any one to induce Graham to execute the instrument of May 23, 1916, mentioned in the petition; that he was a hard drinker, but was not drunk when he executed said instrument; that he was not incapacitated by drink or otherwise so that he did not understand it; and that he was fully informed as to its contents and made no mistake, when he signed and delivered it. We are also satisfied that it was a wise, timely, and provident disposition for him to make of his property, under all the circumstances of the case. His affairs, owing to his dissipated habits, were drifting towards bankruptcy, and he wisely determined to turn his property over to competent and responsible trustees to manage and control it and hold it, so that he could not further waste or dissipate it, and thereby his existing creditors would be paid and he would be assured a sufficient support for life, and the children of his blood and bone would receive the corpus of his estate at his death. We find that he, himself, first thought of and suggested a trusteeship, as admitted by appellants. This shows that while, in his dissipated condition, he did not think he was competent to successfully handle his affairs, in which we agree with him, he was competent enough to know that fact and to understand and appreciate it, and sensible and sound-minded enough to conclude to put his affairs in competent hands. The agreement itself is strong evidence that he was in his right mind. It is true that at first he desired to have a power of revocation in the trust deed, but when he found he could not obtain a satisfactory trustee without making the trust irrevocable, he concluded, and we think wisely under the circumstances surrounding him, to make the trust irrevocable. In any event, we find he did so with full knowledge and appreciation of the fact, and we see no reason in the proofs to set aside his action or that of the lower court in refusing his demand in that behalf.

[2] III. But, independent of all other considerations, it is said by appellants that the evidence shows that defendant Bishop misled Graham, as to his receiving one-third of the $3,000 cash commission paid by Graham to the trustees, in addition to the regular commission provided for in the deed of trust. The evidence shows that Bishop told Graham that the American Trust Company wanted a cash commission of $3,000, besides the regular commission, and did not inform him that he (Bishop) was to get any part of it. The regular commission was to be 5 per cent., of which Bishop was to receive 2 per cent. and the trust company 3 per cent. This was provided for in the deed of trust. Both were trustees. It is not claimed that Bishop told Graham that he was not to receive any part of the $3,000 cash commission, but that he told him (Graham) that the trust company wanted the $3,000 extra commission. This was true. Bishop did not ask for it. It was the trust company which demanded it. But, as there were two trustees, and the commission provided for in the deed of trust was to be divided between them, Graham was, at least, put upon inquiry by Bishop as to whether he would receive a part of the $3,000 commission, when he told Graham that the trust company demanded such commission. The presumption was natural, it seems to us, that this commission would also be divided between the trustees. Furthermore, Bishop prepared and Graham signed the following letter, directed to both the trust company and himself, with reference thereto:

"St. Louis, Missouri. American Trust Co., and John E. Bishop. St. Louis, Mo.—Gentlemen: In view of the proposed contract contemplated to be entered into between you and myself for the purpose of handling my property and disposing of it in accordance with that contract, and, as an inducement and additional compensation for handling the matter, I hereby authorize you to pay to yourselves the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) in addition to the compensation provided for in said contract, the same to be paid out of the property transferred to you by said contract.

"Yours truly, H. B. Graham."

It may be that Graham did not read, or read carefully, this letter, but Bishop did nothing to prevent him from so doing, and it shows he intended to do nothing to mislead him. We hold, there was nothing improper in the conduct of Mr. Bishop in this regard, and that the deed of trust assailed is in no way impaired thereby.

[3] IV. It is also asserted that the lower court erroneously excluded certain declarations alleged to have been made by Graham to third parties, in the absence of defendants, before and after the deed of trust to them was executed and delivered, as to the contents of said instrument; that he told said parties he had made, or was going to make, an instrument which placed his property in the hands of trustees until his debts were paid and the property was returned to him. The evidence was offered on the theory that it tended to show that Graham made a mistake or did not know the contents of the instrument he made. It was therefore to prove the truth of the plaintiffs' assertions. The court rejected this testimony, as hearsay and self-serving. We know of no authority holding that a party can make declarations to third parties in his own favor, and then have such parties testify to such declarations to sustain the truth of his allegations in the case. The rule is elementary that such declarations are inadmissible. Gibson v. Gibson, 24 Mo. 227; Bush v. Bush, 87 Mo. 485; Hammond v. Beeson, 112 Mo. 201, 20 S. W. 474; Teckenbreck v. McLaughlin, 209 Mo. loc. cit. 546-549, 108 S. W. 46; Weber v. Strobel, 236 Mo. loc. cit. 663, 139 S. W. 188.

V. But, it is claimed that section 2880, R. S. 1909, makes the trust deed to defendants null and void. That section is as follows:

"Every deed of gift and conveyance of goods and chattels, in trust, to the use of the person so making such deed of gift or conveyance, is declared to be void as against creditors, existing and subsequent, and purchasers."

[4] It may be admitted that this section makes the conveyance, so far as it is to the use of Graham, null and void as to creditors and purchasers. But the statute does not make it null and void, even as to creditors and purchasers, so far as it is for the use and benefit of Graham's children. This deed provided for the payment of his then existing debts, and there is nothing in the statute preventing Graham from giving or conveying the remainder of his property to his children or others as against subsequent creditors and purchasers.

[5] Furthermore, this statute does not provide that a conveyance to one's own use shall be void as to him, but only void as to purchasers and creditors. This proceeding is more for the benefit of Graham than for either creditors or his wife, even conceding she is a purchaser. The plaintiffs are not purchasers nor creditors, but simply agents or trustees. This case is therefore not bottomed upon the statute relied on, because said statute is not for the benefit of the party making the conveyance. Sauter v. Leveridge, 103 Mo. loc. cit. top page 624, 15 S. W. 981.

[6, 7] VI. We hold said deed of trust to defendants is valid as to the defendant trustees and Graham's children. It is said the remainder to Graham's children is a contingent remainder, void and ineffectual, and that the conveyance to them was, in effect, but for the use and benefit of Graham. We know of no reason why a man cannot by deed give a contingent remainder in his property to his children, or why such conveyance should be deemed void or for the grantor's use. A contingent remainder is an interest in real estate. Godman v. Simmons, 113 Mo. 123, 20 S. W. 972; Sikemeier v. Galvin, 124 Mo. 367, 27 S. W. 551.

[8] But, it is plain enough that the remainder to Graham's children created by the deed of trust assailed is a vested remainder. The children to whom the remainder is given were living and are named, and the fact that the remainder opens to let in after-born children does not make it a contingent remainder. All the children, not simply those living at his death, are to take upon Graham's death, which is sure to occur. The vesting of the title is not postponed after Graham's death, until they reach the age of 25 years, but only the enjoyment of the possession of the property is thus postponed. This does not make the remainder contingent, or in any manner militate against its character as a vested remainder. Barkhoefer v. Barkhoefer, 204 S. W. loc. cit. 910 (Division 1, this court); Waddell v. Waddell, 99 Mo. loc. cit. 345, 12 S. W. 349, 17 Am. St. Rep. 575; Thomas v. Thomas, 149 Mo. loc. cit. 433, 51 S. W. 111, 73 Am. St. Rep. 405; Doerner v. Doerner, 161 Mo. 406, 61 S. W. 801; Carter v. Long, 181 Mo. loc. cit. 709, 81 S. W. 162; Warne v. Sorge, 258 Mo. 162, 167 S. W. 967; Eckle v. Ryland, 256 Mo. 424, 165 S. W. 1035; Buxton v. Kroeger, 219 Mo. loc. cit. 261, 117 S. W. 1147; Heady v. Hollman, 251 Mo. 632, 158 S. W. 19.

It is also urged that the remainder is contingent in the children and void because Graham's $500 per month is payable out of the principal, as well as the income, and therefore might absorb the whole estate. In effect, this monthly charge is but an incumbrance on the property, and simply makes the remainder subject thereto. It does not change the nature of the title of the remaindermen any more than an incumbrance on a fee simple would change the fee-simple title. Both remain unchanged, except they are subject to the incumbrance. They are in no way made void thereby.

But, we hold that the remainder to Graham's children, whether vested or contingent, was a valid conveyance for the benefit of said children, and not for Graham's use. It is immaterial, therefore, so far as this case is concerned, whether said remainder was vested or contingent.

VII. The deed of trust, being valid as to the provision for the children, may, no doubt, be avoided by subsequent purchasers or subsequent creditors of Graham, in so far, and so far only, as it is for Graham's use. In a proper proceeding, subsequent creditors or purchasers might therefore reach and appropriate the monthly sum of $500 and the income reserved to Graham. Authorities, infra.

[9] VIII. But, it is said by learned counsel that it is possible that the vicissitudes of fortune might so reduce the income and value of the property, or might so afflict Graham personally, that the trustees, in the exercise of their honest discretion, might appropriate, or be compelled to appropriate, the entire estate to the payment of doctor bills and extraordinary expenses for the care of Graham, on account of personal injury or sickness; that even if the creditors or purchasers might secure his monthly stipend, they could not reach that part of the fund necessary to be reserved for Graham's benefit, in case of injury or sickness, because that amount is uncertain. The law is a practical science. There is no allegation in the petition, and no proof that it will ever be necessary for the trustees, in their honest discretion, to advance more than $500 per month, or than all the income after Graham's debts are paid, to pay his doctor bills. The petition alleges that the income was $5,000 per month when the suit was brought. At this rate, the debts will all soon be paid, if they have not already been paid, when Graham is entitled to the entire income. The doctor bills are only payable when necessary, and the amount so payable is in the sole discretion of the trustees. It is not presumable that they would determine to pay such bills, or any part thereof, if Graham wasted his income in riotous living, so that he would not have enough left to pay doctor bills. The contingency of Graham ever receiving or being entitled to anything for doctor bills, in addition to his regular allowance provided for by the deed of trust, to the detriment of creditors or purchasers, is a most remote possibility, and will not, in a court of equity, be presumed, against the allegations of the petition and the evidence in the case, to destroy an estate created in good faith for the benefit of his children. But, if this contingency should ever happen, it is not beyond the power of a court of equity to determine the amount Graham would be entitled to for such doctor bills and extraordinary expenses on account of sickness or personal injury, or require the trustees to do so, and award it to such creditors or purchasers instead of to Graham. We must rule this contention also against the appellants.

IX. But, it is strenuously argued that the case of Jamison v. Mississippi Valley Trust Co., 207 S. W. 788, decided by Division No. 2 of this court, is decisively in favor of the claim of learned counsel for appellants that under section 2880, R. S. 1909, the deed of trust of May 23, 1916, to defendant trustees, is void. We are not of that opinion. That was a proceeding by judgment creditors, and could have no application here for that reason alone, as we have already indicated. In that case, there was no provision for the security of creditors, as in the case at bar. But the grantor conveyed his property to trustees: First, for the benefit of the grantor for 5 years, and if he died during that time, and in the absence of a will, to his heirs at law, under the laws of Missouri; second, the trustees were to pay to the grantor the net income, as he might demand; third and fourth, the trustees were authorized to sell and manage the property in their discretion; fifth, the trustees were not to pay the grantor more than the income, "except that in case of extremity of the beneficiaries, or if by misfortune or unavoidable accident the value of the trust estate shall become greatly diminished and imperative necessity affecting the then beneficiary * * * should, in the judgment of the trustees, render it proper to use additional amounts out of the trust estate * * * as to what is such extremity or imperious necessity and what amount of the principal is necessary to be used, the trustees shall exercise their best discretion, and their decision shall be absolute"; sixth, the grantor was prohibited from anticipating the income payable to himself, and prohibited from selling or encumbering it, and both principal and income were declared not subject to his debts or liabilities.

The court held the conveyance to the trustees was wholly for the use of the grantor, and was therefore void as to the plaintiffs, under said section 2880 of the statutes. White, C., delivering the opinion of the court, said (207 S. W. 790):

"It was not shown that Bell [the grantor] had any children, or that there was any one answering the description of 'his heirs' in case he should die. This contingent estate, if it may be so construed, depends upon several contingencies: The contingency that he die within 5 years; the contingency that he leave no will; and the contingency that he have heirs capable of taking. In case of his death without a will, the property would go to his heirs precisely as if no trust had been created; that is, the trust would terminate at the end of 5 years, or sooner in the case of his death. He retained control of the contingency by which the title might vest by purchase in his heirs. The restraining barrier set to prevent assault upon the corpus of the estate contained an elastic panel euphemistically designated as 'imperious necessity,' which had already yielded under pressure so as to permit the escape of something near 10 per cent. of the amount in the trustee's hands."

The cases cited by the court from other states, including also McIlvaine v. Smith, 42 Mo. 45, were all cases where the intent was apparent that the transfer was intended to be and was wholly for the grantor's use, and not, as in the case before us, for his use for life with a clear vested remainder in his children.

Nolan v. Nolan, 218 Pa. loc. cit. 140, 67 Atl. 52, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 369, cited by the court was like the case before Commissioner White, and the court in that case clearly distinguishes it from cases like the one we have to pass upon, by saying (218 Pa. 141, 67 Atl. 54, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 374):

"What has been said does not in any way disturb the rule in Potter v. Fidelity Ins. Trust & S. D. Co., 190 Pa. 360, 49 Atl. 85, wherein it was held that, where a voluntary, active trust by express terms is made irrevocable, and there has been no failure of the purpose of the trust, and it is not shown that the deed was procured by fraud or imposition, or executed under a misapprehension of the facts or the law, the trust cannot be revoked at the instance of the settlor, but will be enforced in favor of the beneficiaries. That was a controversy between the settlor and the beneficiaries, and the rights of the creditors were not considered. Even in that case it was said that one of the reasons for setting aside a voluntary settlement of this character was when it appeared that the design of the deed was to give the settlor full enjoyment of his property for life, with power of testamentary disposition, and at the same time protect it from his creditors. This is exactly what the learned court below held the present deed to be, and we concur in that conclusion."

When, however, as in the case at bar, conveyances have been made without power of revocation, and reserving a life estate to the grantor, with remainder over, the conveyances have uniformly been held valid, except as to the income or part reserved to the grantor, which is held subject to the rights of creditors and purchasers. Brown v. McGill, 87 Md. 161, 39 Atl. 613, 39 L. R. A. 806, 67 Am. St. Rep. 804; Bank v. Windram, 133 Mass. 175; Schenck v. Barnes, 156 N. Y. 316, 50 N. E. 967, 41 L. R. A. 395; Low v. Carter, 21 N. H. 433; De Hierapolis v. Lawrence (C. C.) 115 Fed. 761; Sloan v. Birdsall, 58 Hun, 317, 11 N. Y. Supp. 814; Jones v. Clifton, 101 U. S. 225, 25 L. Ed. 908; Curtis v. Leavitt, 15 N. Y. 9.

X. But there is another reason which would lead to an affirmance of this judgment. The principal complaint in the petition is that a clause in the agreement of May 23, 1916, making defendants Bishop and American Trust Company trustees, reserving to said Henry B. Graham the right of revoking said trust and terminating it upon the payment of his debts and the restoring his property to him, was omitted through the incompetency, mistake, or accident of Graham, or fraud of the defendant Bishop, who drew up said agreement, as the attorney of said Graham. The evidence shows that if said Graham desired any such clause of revocation in said agreement of May 23, 1916, or a clause restoring said property to him, it was principally for the purpose of enabling him to provide more abundantly than he otherwise could for Mrs. Snowden as his future wife. Mrs. Snowden then was a married woman, living with her husband in St. Louis. Graham had for some time visited her almost daily, and was engaged to marry her when he should be divorced from his wife, who was then living in adultery with another man in New York City, and Mrs. Snowden should be divorced from her husband, with whom she was then living in the house where Graham visited her. In fact, the appellants claim in their brief that such was the purpose of said Graham in desiring to have the revocation and return clause inserted in the deed of trust now assailed. Appellants' learned counsel say in their brief:

"Despite the numerous sharp conflicts, certain facts stand out clearly in the record. Mr.

Graham was intending to get a divorce and to marry Mrs. Snowden. He was heavily in debt, and had the idea that the very existence of his estate was threatened by a pending foreclosure of collateral then in the hands of W. K. Bixby. It was clearly his intention to dispose of his property so that his wife would not be able to assert a claim against it, and that the collateral in Bixby's hands should be protected, and to have the conveyance in such shape that he could modify it to provide for Mrs. Snowden as soon as he was married to her. This was his general purpose."

[10] We are asked, therefore, to exert the powers of a court of equity to set aside an agreement which said Graham made, because by fraud and mistake it omitted certain clauses which he desired inserted to enable him to carry out an illegal agreement with Mrs. Snowden to marry and provide for her when both he and she were divorced. It is true that he deserted Mrs. Snowden and eloped with and married her sister, as soon as he and Mrs. Snowden were divorced, and seeks now to have said deed of trust to defendants set aside, not for Mrs. Snowden's benefit, but for her sister's. But the clauses he desired to have inserted in, but which were omitted from said agreement, being designed to carry out a wholly unlawful contract, he could not have been heard to complain of their omission at the time the agreement was made, and the fact that they would be used for a lawful purpose now (if such were the fact), had they been so inserted, would not purge the plaintiffs' case of its original vice and immorality. He who comes into a court of equity for relief must come with clean hands. Gilmore v. Thomas, 252 Mo. 147, 158 S. W. 577; Creamer v. Bivert, 214 Mo. 485, 113 S. W. 1118; Stillwell v. Bell, 248 Mo. 61, 154 S. W. 85.

XI. Complaint is also made of the allowance of $18,000 as compensation to defendants' attorneys for their services in the circuit court trying this cause. There was evidence taken by the learned court below, which we have examined, as to the value of such services. It abundantly supported the allowance. The deed of trust to defendants authorized the charge of necessary counsel fees to the trust estate. The lower court, who not only heard the evidence as to the value of such services, but by optical and long-continued oral demonstration knew what such services were, made such allowance as a reasonable charge for such services. We shall not disturb it.

The judgment of the lower court, being without error, is in all things affirmed.

BROWN and RAGLAND, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion by SMALL, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

BUERGER v. WELLS. (No. 2623.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

1. Garnishment §1—Statute must be strictly followed.

Garnishment is merely a species of attachment, being a summary proceeding, and the statute governing it should be followed with strictness.

2. Garnishment §9, 88—Affidavit in suit against two defendants must allege neither has property within state.

Under the statute plaintiff in a suit for debt against more than one defendant, as a suit against maker and indorser of notes, cannot call a stranger into court on writ of garnishment of a fund as the maker's, subjecting such stranger to inconvenience of proceeding and possible hazard, if either defendant has property within the state subject to execution from which the demand may be made; it being requisite that affidavit state "defendants" (not merely defendant) have no property within state.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by H. C. Wells against Fred Buerger and another, in which writ of garnishment issued against an insurance company. From an order dismissing the writ, plaintiff appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and remanded (157 S. W. 289), and the named defendant brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of the district court affirmed.

J. L. Lackey, of Burkburnett, for plaintiff in error.

R. H. Templeton, of Wellington, and C. L. Black, of Austin, for defendant in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The suit was one by H. C. Wells against Fred Buerger as maker, and Mrs. Martha Mooney as endorser, of certain notes. A garnishment was sued out against an insurance company to reach a fund in its hands due Buerger. The affidavit for the garnishment only stated that Buerger did not have property in his possession within the State, subject to execution, sufficient to satisfy the plaintiff's debt, omitting to negative such ownership of property by the other defendant. The honorable Court of Civil Appeals for the Seventh District held that the motion to quash the affidavit was improperly sustained by the trial court. We granted the writ of error because of the probable conflict between this holding and that of the Court of Civil Appeals for the Sixth District in Smith v. City National Bank, 140 S. W. 1145.

[1, 2] The plain effect of the statute is that a plaintiff in a suit for debt against more than one defendant, cannot call strangers into court on a writ of garnishment, subjecting them to the inconvenience of the proceeding and possible hazard, if either of the defendants has property within the State subject to execution from which he may make his debt. Garnishment is but a species of attachment. It is a summary proceeding. The statutes governing it should be followed with strictness. The statute requires that the affidavit state that "the defendant" has not, within the affiant's knowledge, property, etc. Where there are two defendants, or more, in the suit, this clearly means the affidavit shall state that "the defendants" have not such property. Garnishment is not intended as a remedy for one able to make his debt of the property of one of his debtors in the suit, whether such debtor be primarily liable or not. The question is ruled by Willis v. Lyman, 22 Tex. 268.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and the judgment of the District Court affirmed.

KANAMAN v. HUBBARD et al. (No. 2669.)
(Supreme Court of Texas. May 19, 1920.)1. Attachment §175—Levy creates a lien, but there is no satisfaction of plaintiff's debt until property is sold.

Under Rev. St. 1911, arts. 257, 268, the effect of a levy of attachment is to create a lien upon the property, but there is no satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt until the property is sold under the judgment foreclosing the lien.

2. Attachment §186—Plaintiff not liable for injuries to attached property caused by negligence or misconduct of sheriff.

As under Rev. St. 1911, arts. 252, 255, 256, the sheriff's possession of property attached at the instance of the plaintiff is no more subject to control of the plaintiff as to the manner in which he keeps the same than to direction of defendant, and as levy of a writ of attachment does not satisfy the debt, plaintiff is not responsible to defendant for injury to the attached party due to misconduct or negligence of the sheriff; but the sheriff's wrong is an injury to both parties to whom the sheriff and the sureties on his bond may be caused to respond.

3. Sales §38(9)—Slight loss will be sufficient to justify rescission of purchase induced by fraud.

Slight loss is sufficient to justify a court of equity in rescinding a contract of purchase and sale where the purchase was induced by the seller's fraud.

4. Sales §52(7)—Finding that buyer, who was induced by deceit to purchase, was injured, held warranted.

In a suit by the buyer to rescind a contract for purchase of an automobile, finding that the buyer was injured held warranted in view of the fact that deceit was necessary to effect the sale of the machine, and that the seller resisted the refund of the purchase money on tender to him of the car.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. McK. Hubbard and others against W. I. Kanaman. Judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed in part and reversed and remanded in part by the Court of Civil Appeals (160 S. W. 304), and defendant brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals affirmed.

Robt. B. Allen and A. B. Flanary, both of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

K. R. Craig, of Dallas, for defendants in error.

GREENWOOD, J. The writ of error was granted because of the conflict between the decision of the Galveston Court of Civil Appeals in the case of Taylor v. Felder, 23 S. W. 483, with the decision herein of the Dallas Court of Civil Appeals.

In the former case it was held to be the duty of a plaintiff, causing a distress warrant to be levied on personal property, to see that the property seized was properly treated by the officer and applied to the discharge of the debt sued on, and that hence the defendant whose property was seized could have his debt to the plaintiff credited with any loss incurred through the default or negligence of the officer in the execution of the distress warrant.

In this case it was decided that the plaintiffs in attachment were not liable to the defendant for damages to an automobile of the defendant, occasioned by the wrongful acts of the sheriff, while he held the automobile under the attachment. 160 S. W. 307. The holding herein was in accordance with the conclusion of the Galveston Court of Civil Appeals in a later case than Taylor v. Felder, to the effect that where a horse died, while in the possession of a sheriff under a writ of attachment, not wrongfully issued, as the result of negligence on the part of the sheriff, there was no liability on the part of the plaintiff in attachment to the defendant in attachment. McFaddin v. Sims, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 598, 97 S. W. 337.

The liability of an attaching plaintiff for a sheriff's tort to property held under attachment, rightfully issued, must rest on the assumption either that the sheriff in proceeding under the writ acts as the agent or servant of the plaintiff or that the levy operates as a satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt to the extent of the value of the seized property.

[1, 2] Our statutes negative either assumption. The sheriff derives his power to seize and hold the attached property, not from the plaintiff nor from the defendant, but from the statutes, which declare the will of the state. The sheriff is no more subject to direction or control from the plaintiff than from the defendant as to the manner in which he keeps personal property, under levy of a writ of attachment, until final judgment. Articles 252, 255, 256, R. S. The effect of the levy is to create a lien on the attached property, but there is no satisfaction of the plaintiff's debt until the property is sold under the judgment foreclosing the lien. Articles 257, 268, R. S.; Cravens v. Wilson, 48 Tex. 339.

This case discloses a tort committed by the sheriff when he was under a duty to both the plaintiffs and defendant in the attachment suit. The tort resulted in injury to both the plaintiffs and the defendant, but the tort was a breach of a duty owing by the sheriff and not by the plaintiff in attachment. He, who owed the duty, and his sureties, who were responsible for its faithful performance, must be held accountable for the breach of the duty, and not another who was a stranger to the duty.

The plaintiffs in attachment, according to the facts in this record, have done nothing save to enforce a righteous demand conformably to law. The tort of the sheriff has not relieved the defendant in attachment of his obligation to satisfy the demand to secure which the attachment was issued. Should the defendant satisfy the plaintiffs' demand, he will then be alone entitled to enforce and collect the liability of the sheriff and his sureties. Otherwise, any recovery for the sheriff's tort will be applicable first to the payment of the plaintiffs' debt.

[3, 4] In the face of plaintiff in error's resistance to the return of the sum received for the car, when it was tendered back to him, and of the deceit which appears to have been necessary to negotiate a sale at that price, we do not think the conclusion of the Court of Civil Appeals should be disturbed that some pecuniary injury from the fraud was shown to have been sustained by defendants in error. It is therefore unnecessary for us to determine whether a court of equity would not order a rescission for fraud in the absence of a showing of actual pecuniary loss, for, were the necessity recognized for the showing of such loss to warrant the relief of rescission in equity, certainly any appreciable prejudice, though slight in amount, would be sufficient. 12 R. C. L. § 139; Pomeroy on Contracts, § 227.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is affirmed.

PYE et al. v. CARDWELL. (No. 2766.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

1. Malicious prosecution ~~§~~—Interference with person or property essential.

Damages will not be awarded for the prosecution of civil suits with malice and without probable cause, unless the party sued suffers from interference by reason of the suits with his person or property.

2. Malicious prosecution ~~§~~—Complaint alleging series of suits without probable cause pursuant to conspiracy held bad.

A petition, alleging institution against plaintiff of seven successive chattel mortgage foreclosure suits in furtherance of a conspiracy by defendants to unlawfully extort money from plaintiff, causing plaintiff worry, annoyance, and physical inconvenience, loss of sleep, peace of mind, and business, and certain expenses for attorney's fees, held not to state cause of action in absence of allegation of facts showing that plaintiff suffered by such suits interfering with her person or property.

Certified Question from Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Margaret Cardwell against B. F. Pye and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed to Court of Civil Appeals. Question certified in Supreme Court. Question answered.

See, also, 179 S. W. 683.

Lewis Fisher, of Galveston, and B. F. Pye and Lipscomb & Lipscomb, all of Beaumont, for appellants.

George Clough, of Houston, and Aubrey Fuller, of Galveston, for appellee.

GREENWOOD, J. The question certified is whether a cause of action was alleged by appellee for damages, actual and exemplary, resulting from the institution against her of seven suits at the instigation of appellants. It was averred that the suits were brought in furtherance of a conspiracy by the three appellants to unlawfully extort money from appellee, which appellants knew she did not owe; that appellants used the names of other persons in bringing the suits; that, as fast as appellee employed counsel to present her defense in each suit, it was dismissed and a new suit was filed in a different place; that the suits caused appellee great worry, annoyance and physical inconvenience, and also caused her to lose sleep, peace of mind, and business; and that she incurred $50 attorney's fees; and she prayed for the recovery of $250 actual damages and $700 exemplary damages.

[1] The rule is firmly established in Texas which denies an award of damages for the prosecution of civil suits, with malice and without probable cause, unless the party sued suffers some interference, by reason of the the suits, with his person or property. Smith v. Adams, 27 Tex. 30; Salado College v. Davis, 47 Tex. 134; Johnson v. King, 64 Tex. 226.

[2] It is claimed that the rule stated should not govern this case for two reasons: First, that since in each suit a foreclosure was sought of an alleged chattel mortgage lien, there existed the requisite interference with appellee's property; and, second, that, the rule should not be applied to a series of unfounded and malicious suits, brought in furtherance of a conspiracy, in the names of third persons as well as of the conspirators.

It is obvious that the attempt to foreclose the chattel mortgage caused no seizure of any property. Besides in Johnson v. King, supra, where there was an actual issuance of an attachment, the failure to seize any property under it was held fatal to the recovery of damages for maliciously suing out the attachment, without probable cause.

Under the rule, each suit could be maintained without liability to appellee save for the costs. Judge Gould, speaking for the court in Salado College v. Davis, supra, said:

"In ordinary cases, where no further wrongful act is complained of than the institution of a groundless suit, though done knowingly and with intent to harass, the award of costs is, in contemplation of law, full compensation for the unjust vexation. (Cotterell v. Jones, 73 Eng. Com. L. 727.)

"In such cases, the defendant recovers his costs 'but no allowance is made for his time, indirect loss, annoyance, or counsel fees.' (Sedg. on Dam. 38.) He proceeds: 'Every defendant against whom an action is "unnecessarily" brought, experiences some injury or inconvenience beyond what the costs will compensate him for.' This injury or inconvenience results from a resort to the legally constituted tribunals; and it seems to be the policy of the law to content itself with meting out something less than our ideas of natural justice would demand, rather than to increase the risks attending and discouraging such a resort, and at the same time add to the difficulties and intricacies of ordinary litigation."

If it is not an actionable wrong for one person to bring an unfounded suit, to harass a defendant and extort money from him, it cannot be actionable for two or more to join in the same sort of suit. The single actor is certainly no less culpable when he proceeds alone and the injury is the same when he acts alone or with others. As long as the law makes the imposition of the costs the sole penalty for the wrongful prosecution of civil litigation, without seizure of person or property, no greater penalty can be rightly imposed for a series of wrongful suits of that character than the imposition on the wrongful plaintiff of the accumulation of costs in the series of suits. Smith v. Adams, 27 Tex. 30.

The sound reasoning of Judge Stayton, in Johnson v. King, in discussing the opinion of the Supreme Court of Vermont in Closson v. Staples, 42 Vt. 209, 1 Am. Rep. 316, is conclusive against the contention that appellee ought to recover because appellants used the names of other parties in some of the suits against her; for Judge Stayton points out that, where Staples caused Burnham to prosecute a suit against Closson in the name of Burnham on a note which had been paid to Staples, the true foundation for a cause of action in favor of Closson, against Staples, was his use of an irresponsible person to bring the suit, so as to shield himself from the judgment for costs; that being the relief which the law affords for such a wrong. 64 Tex. 230.

Here, there is no allegation that any person, whose name was used in the suits against appellee, was not as solvent as appellants, and it is fairly inferable from the petition that all costs were paid by the plaintiffs in the several suits or were adjudged against them alone.

We answer that, as held in the original opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals, the petition of appellee presented no cause of action for damages by reason of the mentioned suits.

CORSICANA PETROLEUM CO. v. OWENS et al. (No. 2716.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

1. Mines and minerals — 78(7)—Evidence held insufficient to raise issue of abandonment of oil lease.

In a suit to forfeit an oil lease, evidence held insufficient to raise the issue of abandonment.

2. Mines and minerals — 58—Oil and gas lease held not invalid, because allowing lessor to pay rent, instead of drilling a well.

An oil and gas lease, granted for valuable consideration, though the sum was small, which gave the lessee the right to prospect on the land and to seven-eighths of oil, etc., found, and also in lieu of the lessee's completion of a well within one year, the right to extend time for completion by making quarterly payments of approximately $30, is not invalid, even though the lessee had the option of abandonment on payment of a nominal sum.

3. Mines and minerals — 57—Option to abandon oil lease, based on independent consideration, not unilateral.

An option contract, based on an independent consideration, is not invalid, as unilateral; hence where an oil and gas lease was supported by an independent consideration, an option of abandonment on payment of $5 is not invalid.

4. Mines and minerals — 58—Option to abandon oil and gas lease held valid.

Where an oil and gas lease, executed on an independent consideration, gave lessee option of abandoning the same on payment of $5, the lease is not invalid, as inequitable or unilateral, where it was distinctly provided that the surrender should not affect existing rights.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by Mrs. M. J. Owens, as surviving wife, in her own behalf and for her children, against the Corsicana Petroleum Company. On plaintiff's appeal, judgment for defendant was reversed, and cause remanded, by the Court of Civil Appeals (169 S. W. 192), and defendant brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of trial court affirmed.

Geo. O. Greer and W. H. Francis, both of Dallas, and Carrigan, Montgomery & Britain, of Wichita Falls, for plaintiff in error.

Slay & Simon, of Ft. Worth, for defendants in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The suit of the plaintiff, Mrs. M. J. Owens as surviving wife of M. J. Owens, deceased, and in her own behalf and for their children, was to cancel a mineral or oil lease upon 188 acres of land executed by herself and husband, June 6, 1911, in favor of the Corsicana Petroleum Company, upon the several grounds: (1) That it was a unilateral agreement and therefore void; (2) that the lessee had breached it by failing to complete an oil well on the premises within one year from the date of the instrument; and (3) that the lease had been abandoned by the lessee.

In the trial court, a verdict was directed for the defendants. The honorable Court of Civil Appeals, on the appeal, held the lease to be void because unilateral; but in reversing the judgment, remanded the case for trial upon the issue of estoppel made by the Petroleum Company.

The lease recited that the grantors, in consideration of $28.20 paid by the grantee, the receipt being acknowledged, had granted, sold, etc., unto the grantee all the oil, gas, coal and other minerals in and under the land described, with the exclusive right to drill, mine and operate thereon for producing oil, gas, coal and other minerals; to be held by the grantee for the term of ten years from the date of the instrument and as much longer as oil, gas or other minerals were produced in paying quantities; yielding to the grantors the 1/8 part of all oil produced and saved from the premises. The grantee agreed in the instrument to complete a well on the premises within one year from the date of the instrument, or pay to the grantors as lease rental, $28.20 each three months in advance from the 6th day of June, 1912, from quarter to quarter, to the end of the term, or until the well was completed, or the lease surrendered as elsewhere stipulated in the instrument; the drilling of such well to be full consideration of the grant made by the instrument. A further clause provided that in consideration of the payment of the $28.20 and the quarterly amounts, just mentioned, the grantee acquired and had the right and option either to surrender the grant at any time upon the payment of the sum of $5.00 and all amounts then due under the instrument and thereby be discharged from all further obligation, the grant thereby becoming null and void, or to continue the grant in full force and effect from quarter to quarter and from year to year by making the stipulated quarterly payments which the grantors bound themselves to accept when tendered, it being further recited that such option was granted for a valuable and satisfactory consideration.

Before the end of the first year of the lease, M. J. Owens died, leaving his wife and ten children surviving. There was no administration upon his estate. On June 6, 1912, one year from the date of the instrument, Mrs. Owens was paid and accepted the stipulated quarterly lease rental, $28.20, further quarterly payments in that amount being regularly paid to and accepted by her down to and including the payment due December 6, 1912. This extended and carried the lease, according to its terms, to March 6, 1913. On this latter date, a further quarterly payment was duly tendered Mrs. Owens, but its acceptance was refused. On March 28, 1913, the Petroleum Company began preparations to drill a well on the premises. Actual drilling of the well began on April 7, 1913, at an expense of $14,000.00 in that connection up to the time the present suit was filed on May 14, 1913. The well was completed July 5, 1913, producing oil in paying quantities, with an average of 117 barrels of oil per day.

[1] The issue of abandonment of the lease was, in our opinion, not raised by the evidence. The parties to the lease were competent to contract. No fraud or imposition of any kind is charged. The question in the case, therefore, is simply whether the terms of the lease are such as to make it unenforceable.

[2] We fail to see anything in the terms of the several agreements evidenced by the instrument which invalidates it. The finding of oil upon the land was merely prospective. For a valuable consideration, satisfactory to themselves, the grantors by the instrument gave the grantee the right to prospect upon the land for a definite period; the right to seven-eighths of the oil if found; the right, in lieu of its completing a well within the first year, to extend the time for its completion, within the term of the grant, by its making the quarterly payments; and the right or option to surrender the lease by paying the sum of $5.00 and all other amounts due under it up to that time. There is nothing unlawful about such a contract, and the parties were privileged to make it. If the grantors were willing to accept the quarterly payments instead of the completion of a well within the original period stipulated for its completion, that was their affair. They contracted to that effect by the instrument. The contract being fair, there can be no reason for a court's striking down that part of it.

[3, 4] The grant of the right to the grantee to surrender the lease by the payment of an amount in addition to the original consideration and all other amounts then due under the instrument, relieved the grantee of any requirement to complete a well. But the grantors, for an independent consideration, by their contract agreed that the grantee should have that option. The unilateral character of the agreement for the option, is of no consequence. A contract for the grant of an option is necessarily unilateral. An option is granted for the purpose of enabling the grantee to exercise the particular right or not, as he may elect. The value of it consists in that privilege. Owners of property have the unquestioned power to grant such rights with respect to it. They are free to validly make such contracts. When so made, it is the duty of courts to uphold and enforce them. A contract for the grant of an option, limited to a definite time, is therefore valid and enforceable if supported by an independent consideration. National Oil & Pipe Line Co. v. Teel, 95 Tex. 586, 86 S. W. 979. In many valid contracts the promise is only on one side. They are unilateral. As to them, the inquiry is not whether they are of that character, but whether they are supported by a consideration. In return for the consideration paid them, the grantors here agreed that the grantee should have the right to surrender the lease on the terms stated. If the right was not exercised, the grantee would remain bound by its covenants. If exercised, the grantors would be free to deal with the premises. A surrender was not to affect any existing liability. There is nothing inequitable about such an agreement. Its presence in the instrument did not invalidate it. Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 35 Sup. Ct. 526, 59 L. Ed. 856; Rich v. Doneghey, 177 Pac. 86, 3 A. L. R. 352.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

COLLINS v. PECOS & N. T. RY. CO.
(No. 2807.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

Appeal and error ¶114—Cause remanded to appellate court to determine unconsidered assignments.

Where the Court of Civil Appeals erroneously reversed the judgment of the district court on one assignment of error without considering the other assignments presenting questions on which its jurisdiction was final, the Supreme Court will not affirm the judgment of the district court, but will remand the case to the Court of Civil Appeals for the determination of those assignments.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

On motion for rehearing. Motion overruled.

For former opinion, see 212 S. W. 477.

J. Marvin Jones, L. C. Barrett, and Jas. N. Browning, all of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error. Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, Madden, Trulove & Kimbrough, of Amarillo, Carl Gilliland, of Hereford, and Black & Spedley, of Austin, for defendant in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The Railway Company's motion for rehearing is overruled. Whether the injuries of the plaintiff were proximately caused by the Railway Company's negligence, was a question of fact and for the jury's decision. The holding of the Commission of Appeals on the question, as reflected in its opinion, is in our view correct.

The Railway Company presented a number of assignments in the Court of Civil Appeals (173 S. W. 250), but that court disposed of the appeal on only one of them. Its decision made consideration of the other assignments unnecessary. A number of those assignments present questions of which the jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals is final. The Railway Company is entitled to have those assignments determined. Instead, therefore, of affirming the judgment of the District Court, as was done on the original report of the Commission of Appeals, the cause will be remanded to the Court of Civil Appeals for the determination of those assignments.

PARK v. SWARTZ et al. (No. 2596.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

Brokers ¶11—Breach of contract for exclusive agency entitles plaintiff to probable earnings.

Where defendants breached a contract giving plaintiff the exclusive agency for the sale of a number of lots, plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount which under the contract he would presumably have earned in the absence of showing by defendants that plaintiffs could not or would not have performed the contract, regardless of its breach by defendants.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by A. F. Park against C. A. Swartz and others. Judgment of the district court for the plaintiff was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (159 S. W. 338), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of the district court affirmed.

Alexander, Power & Ridgway, of Ft. Worth, for plaintiff in error.

Gover & Turner, of Ft. Worth, for defendants in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. The defendants Swartz and Harris entered into a written contract with the plaintiff Park whereby he was to have the exclusive agency for the sale of certain lots belonging to the defendants in a town in Oklahoma for a stipulated compensation for each sale. According to the findings of the trial court the plaintiff entered upon the performance of the contract, expending about $1,000.00 in advertising the lots, for traveling expenses, etc., in carrying out the contract; and making a number of sales. While the contract was in full force, the defendants breached it and made its further performance by the plaintiff impossible by selling the remaining lots themselves or through other means. The plaintiff, on his part, had faithfully performed the contract up to that time. His suit was for the breach of the contract. He was awarded judgment in the amount as fixed by the contract for the sales which the action of the defendants deprived him from making.

On the appeal, the judgment was reversed by the honorable Court of Civil Appeals for the Second District, Chief Justice Conner dissenting. Because of the dissent and our belief that the judgment should have been affirmed, we granted the writ of error.

The loss suffered by the plaintiff is the measure of his damages. That loss is the amount as fixed by the contract which he would have earned but for the wrongful conduct of the defendants in preventing him from earning it. Upon establishing the contract, his readiness and willingness to perform it, and that he was denied opportunity to perform it through its wrongful breach by the defendants, rendering its performance by him impossible, the plaintiff made out his case; and prima facie was entitled as damages to the amount which under the contract he would, presumably, have earned if his rights had been respected. If the plaintiff could not or would not have performed the contract, regardless of its breach by the defendants, it was incumbent upon them to make the proof. This, they failed to do. Their action alone, according to the record here, was responsible for the plaintiff's being unable to perform it fully and completely. They denied him the right to perform it and are in no position to complain of the judgment.

We think Judge Conner's view of the case was correct.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

WARREN HARDWARE CO. v. DODSON et al. (No. 2677.)

(Supreme Court of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨64—Decision of Court of Civil Appeals held final.

The decision of the Court of Civil Appeals in a garnishment proceeding based on a judgment is final, where the amount in controversy in the original suit was within the jurisdiction of the county court, and the case does not fall within any of the exceptions provided in Rev. St. art. 1591.

2. Courts ⇨247(7)—Supreme Court cannot grant writ of error, where Court of Civil Appeals has final jurisdiction.

In a case of which the Court of Civil Appeals has final jurisdiction, the Supreme Court has no authority to grant a writ of error because of conflict between the decision in such case and the decision of another Court of Civil Appeals.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Garnishment proceeding by the Warren Hardware Company against S. J. Dodson and others. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed, and a judgment rendered in favor of certain defendants, by the Court of Civil Appeals (162 S. W. 952), and plaintiff brings error. Writ of error dismissed.

Knight & Slaton, of Hereford, and Moseley & Barcus, of Weatherford, for plaintiff in error.

Carl Gilliland, of Hereford, and S. J. Dodson, of El Paso, for defendants in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. [1,2] The suit was a garnishment proceeding based upon a judgment. The amount in controversy in the original suit was within the jurisdiction of the County Court. The case does not fall within any of the exceptions provided in Article 1591, and the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals is therefore final. The writ of error was granted because of probable conflict between the decision and that of another Court of Civil Appeals. But the Supreme Court has no authority to grant a writ of error because of such conflict in a case of which the Court of Civil Appeals has final jurisdiction. Gallagher v. Rahm, 88 Tex. 514, 32 S. W. 523.

The writ was granted before the decision of Cole v. State of Texas, 106 Tex. 472, 170 S. W. 1036.

The case is accordingly dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

FITTS v. PANHANDLE & S. F. RY. CO.
(No. 139-3053.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 2, 1920.)

Release \Leftrightarrow 13(6)—Promise to employ and to pay $1 not consideration where money not paid.

Plaintiff's release of liability for personal injuries, made on a recited consideration of $1 and defendant's promise to employ plaintiff as a trucker for one day at the usual rate of pay, was without consideration where the $1 was not paid, and was properly excluded in plaintiff's action.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by C. I. Fitts against the Panhandle & Santa Fe Railway Company. From judgment for plaintiff; defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and remanded (188 S. W. 528), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of the district court affirmed, on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

E. T. Miller, J. N. Browning, L. C. Barrett, and Marvin Jones, all of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error.

Madden, Trulove, Ryburn & Pipkin, of Amarillo, for defendant in error.

McLENDON, J. C. I. Fitts, the plaintiff, recovered judgment against the Panhandle & Santa Fe Railway Company, defendant, for the loss of his eye, alleged to have been caused by the actionable negligence of defendant. Among other defenses to the suit, defendant pleaded a release in full, the recited consideration whereof being: "An order on the treasurer of said company for $1, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged," and "the promise of said company to employ me for one day as trucker at the usual rate of pay, the execution thereof being conclusive evidence that said company has made me such promise." Plaintiff alleged the invalidity of said release upon several grounds, one of which was that it was without consideration. Upon the trial, plaintiff having testified that he never received the $1 recited in the release, the court declined to admit the release in evidence. The Court of Civil Appeals reversed and remanded the cause, holding this ruling to be erroneous. 188 S. W. 528. Writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges, in the view that the Court of Civil Appeals committed error in this holding.

The full review and discussion by the Court of Civil Appeals of the authorities upon the question at issue renders unnecessary any extended observations thereupon. The release in question is identical in its language with that in the case of Quebe v. Railway, 98 Tex. 6, 81 S. W. 20, 66 L. R. A. 734, 4 Ann. Cas. 545, except as to the subject-matter dealt with. The cases are practically on all fours in every particular, except that in the Quebe Case the $1 was paid, whereas in the case at bar it was not paid. In the Quebe Case the Supreme Court, speaking through Judge Williams, says:

"The consideration was a valuable and legal one, though small. Considering the fact that the matter settled was regarded by both parties as involving no large amount, it cannot be said the smallness of the consideration, by itself, furnishes grounds for disregarding the release."

The distinguishing element in the two cases is the failure in the instant case to pay the dollar. We have the views of the Supreme Court upon the question thus presented, expressed in the following language:

"Since the recited consideration of $1 in the release in this case was not paid, it is our opinion that the release was wholly without consideration. It seems to us that a mere promise to re-employ for one day, paying for the work done for that one day no more than the ordinary or customary rate of wages, conferred, in practical effect, no benefit upon the plaintiff, and the railway company thereby suffered no detriment, since inevitably it was to receive the day's work for the re-employment."

We conclude that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

TEXAS EMPLOYERS' INS. ASS'N v.
ROACH et ux. (No. 142-3073.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)

Master and servant 416—Right to sue on claim under Compensation Act does not depend on notice of intent not to abide by award.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 5246q), right to sue, or to require suit to be brought on a claim for compensation, is not dependent on a party, before final determination by the Industrial Accident Board, giving notice that he does not consent to abide thereby; but the board's decision is not conclusive, though the parties agree to submit the matters pertaining to the injury to it, and the right to sue or require suit is by way of appeal.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by T. W. Roach and wife against the Texas Employers' Insurance Association and another. Judgment for defendants was reversed as to the named defendant, by the Court of Civil Appeals (195 S. W. 328), and said defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Lawther, Pope & Mays, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

R. D. Allen, of Sulphur Springs, for defendants in error.

TAYLOR, J. T. W. Roach and wife, defendants in error, filed this suit against the Texas Employers' Insurance Association, plaintiff in error, for compensation under the Employers' Liability Act of 1913 (Laws 1913, c. 179 [Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 5246h-5246zzzz]), claimed to have accrued to them by reason of the death of their minor son. The son's death was alleged to have resulted from injuries received while in the course of his employment as an employé of the Gulf Pipe Line Company, a subscriber to the insurance association.

Prior to filing suit, defendants in error filed their claim for compensation with the Industrial Accident Board as provided by the Liability Act. Plaintiff in error and the Gulf Pipe Line Company, outside of and independent of the act, agreed with defendants in error to submit all matters pertaining to the injuries of the deceased to the Industrial Accident Board. Upon a hearing before the board, and by its final ruling and decision, defendants in error, as beneficiaries of their son, secured an award of $5 per week for a period of 360 weeks, against plaintiff in error.

The main object of this suit (so stated to be by defendants in error) was the enforcement of the award by "mandamus, mandatory injunction, or weekly executions, as the court might determine"; the allegation relied upon as warranting its enforcement being that the award is res judicata between defendants in error and the insurance association.

Defendants in error pleaded in the alternative that, if it should be held that they were not entitled to the enforcement of the award, they should recover judgment against plaintiff in error on the facts in accordance with the terms of the Liability Act. Defendants in error joined the Pipe Line Company as a party defendant, and further pleaded in the alternative against it for damages under the statutes and common law.

A general demurrer on behalf of the Pipe Line Company was sustained. Plaintiff in error's demurrer to the allegations that the award of the Industrial Accident Board was res judicata was also sustained. The case was tried upon that count of the petition, seeking a recovery of compensation on the facts under the Liability Act.

The court submitted to the jury only two issues, to wit: (1) Whether plaintiff in error's son was injured while in the employment of the Gulf Pipe Line Company; and (2) whether the son's death was caused by injuries so received. The jury found upon the first issue that the son was injured while in the employ of the company, but found upon the second that his death was not due to the injuries received. Judgment was rendered upon the findings in favor of both the Pipe Line Company and plaintiff in error.

The Court of Civil Appeals held that the trial court did not err in sustaining the demurrer as to the alleged cause of action against the Pipe Line Company, and as to it affirmed the judgment, but further held that the trial court was in error in sustaining the demurrer to that count of the petition alleging that the award of the Industrial Accident Board was res judicata between the insurance association and defendants in error. 195 S. W. 328.

Writ of error was granted upon application of the association referred to the committee of judges. Two grounds of error are alleged in the application. The first relates to the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals on the question of res judicata, and the second to the question of whether the trial court had jurisdiction to try the case.

The case turns upon the construction of section 5, pt. 2, of the Employers' Liability Act, incorporated into Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes as article 5246q, which is as follows:

"All questions arising under this act, if not settled by agreement of the parties interested therein, shall, except as otherwise herein provided, be determined by the Industrial Accident Board. Any interested party who is not willing, and does not consent to abide by the final ruling and decision of said board on any disputed claim may sue on such claim or may require suit to be brought thereon in some court of competent jurisdiction, and the board shall proceed no further toward the adjustment of such claim; provided, however, that whenever any such suit is brought, the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto shall be determined by the provisions of this act, and the suit of the injured employé, or persons suing on account of the death of such employé, shall be against the association, if the employer of such injured or deceased employé is at the time of such injury or death a subscriber, as defined in this act, in which case the recovery shall not exceed the maximum compensation allowed under the provisions of this act, and the court shall determine the issues in such cause instead of said board."

The Court of Civil Appeals in this case, as well as in Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. House, 191 S. W. 155, construe the article quoted as providing that the parties at interest may have either the courts or the Industrial Accident Board determine the merits of the claim for compensation made under the act, and that when claim is filed, unless one of the interested parties, prior to the final decision of the board, gives notice to the adverse party that he does not consent to abide thereby, he shall not be entitled to sue or require suit to be brought on the claim. In other words, that under the terms of the article quoted, the right to sue or require suit to be brought in the courts upon any disputed claim is not one by way of appeal from the final ruling of the board, but is in the nature of an option, extended to any interested party, either to have the questions arising under the act determined by the board or have them litigated in the courts. This holding is followed in Southwestern Sur. Ins. Co. v. Curtis et al., 200 S. W. 1162, and in Gen. Acc. Fire & Life Assur. Corp. v. Evans, 201 S. W. 705.

The Court of Civil Appeals in this case say:

"When the parties at interest in the claim made under the act consent for the Industrial Accident Board to take proceedings under the act and finally determine the claim for compensation under the act, and do not withdraw consent before there has been final ruling and decision by the said board upon such claim, then in virtue of the exercise by the parties of their option, the decision of said board upon the said claim is, by the terms of the act, final."

We cannot concur in this conclusion of the court. By the provisions of the Employers' Liability Act, every employer within its terms is required to keep a record of all injuries received by his employés in the course of their employment, and to make a report thereof to the Industrial Accident Board within eight days after its occurrence. Vernon's Sayles' Civ. Stats., art. 5246qqq. The board is authorized to make rules for carrying out and enforcing the provisions of the act, and authority is conferred upon the board to require injured claimants to submit themselves before it, or some one acting under its authority, for examination. Summary process and procedure is authorized; and the board is given power to subpoena witnesses, administer oaths, and to perform those acts necessary to a determination of all questions preliminary to the making of final rulings and decisions on disputed claims. Thus an administrative agency is created for carrying out the provisions of the act. Id. 5246pp. The decision of the agency, or board, is not conclusive, nor does the fact that the parties agree to submit the matters pertaining to the injuries of the claimant to the board estop them from resorting to the courts. Under the express provisions of the article quoted, if the claimant "is not willing and does not consent to abide by the final ruling and decision of the board," he may sue on the claim; or if the association is not willing to abide by the decision, it may require suit to be brought.

The Court of Civil Appeals, in the House Case, supra, says:

"The right 'to sue on such claim' in the courts was intended to be made dependent upon the want of consent or objection of either party to the board's further acting and making 'final ruling and decision' being made or entered before the board in the first instance, before the final ruling and decision is made." (Italics ours.)

There is no express provision in the act to this effect; nor is there in the language of the act any clear implication that the right to sue, or require suit to be brought, is dependent upon the interested party's giving notice prior to the rendering of a final decision of whether he will abide by it. In the absence of both such provision and implication there is no warrant for such limitation with respect to the right of suit.

Whether the right to require suit upon disputed claims was, under the 1913 act, in the nature of an option to be exercised prior to the final decision by the board, or was to be exercised by way of appeal from such decision, is, in our opinion, not an open question.

Middleton v. Texas Power & Light Co., 108 Tex. 96, 185 S. W. 559, states in clear and concise terms the purpose, operation, and effect of the act. The following excerpts from the opinion make clear that in the view of the court it is not necessary as a prerequisite to suit under the act, that the interested party shall give notice in limine that he is unwilling to abide by the final decision of the board:

"There is also created by the act and charged with its administration, a board of three members, whose duties are defined. In general, its province is the determination of disputed claims arising under the act. If its decision is not accepted, suit may be brought upon the claim, or be required to be brought, against the association if the employer of the injured or deceased employé was a subscriber at the time of his injury or death, in a court of competent jurisdiction, which, however, shall adjudicate the questions of liability and compensation according to the provisions of the act. * * *

"Nor does the act impair the right of trial by jury. Trial by jury cannot be claimed in an inquiry that is nonjudicial in its character, or with respect to proceedings before an administrative board. The Accident Board charged with the administration of the act is, as we have said, not a court. In its determination of disputed claims there could be no right to a jury trial. The act authorizes appeals from the decisions of the board to the courts, where a jury trial of the matters in dispute, under the law as embodied in the act, may be had. * * *

The view that the act requires notice in limine as a prerequisite to suit is inconsistent with that of the Supreme Court as to its purpose and operation. The right to sue is by way of an appeal, and until final decision is rendered by the board there is nothing from which an appeal can be prosecuted.

Following the decision in the Middleton Case, supra, the Thirty-Fifth Legislature (Vernon's Sayles' Civ. Stats. 1918 Supp. vol. 2, arts. 5264-5244) amended section 5 of the 1913 act above quoted so as to provide that any interested party who does not consent to abide by the final decision of the board shall, within 20 days after the rendition of such decision, give notice to the adverse party and to the board that he will not abide by the ruling, etc., and used the same language in the amendment with respect to the consent of the parties as was used in the amended act.

The trial court was not in error in holding that the award made by the Industrial Accident Board was not res judicata between the parties, and the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should, in our opinion, be reversed.

The remaining assignment of error grows out of the suggestion in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals that, inasmuch as defendants in error were not entitled to recover the compensation sued for in a "lump sum," the trial court may not have had jurisdiction to try the case. The suggestion was made under the view that defendants in error were entitled to recover on that count of the petition under which they sought to enforce the award of the Industrial Accident Board, and that the amount thereof alleged to be due at the rate of $5 per week was less than $500.

In that count of the petition upon which the case was tried, defendants in error alleged that compensation had accrued for a period of more than 50 weeks at the rate of $15 per week, the total sum alleged to be due being an amount within the court's jurisdiction. It is therefore unnecessary, in view of our holding that the award of the board was not res judicata, to determine the question raised by the second assignment of error.

Defendants in error in their brief filed in the Court of Civil Appeals present as their fifth assignment of error that the findings and verdict of the jury are contrary to the great preponderance of the evidence. Inasmuch as this and other assignments relating to the trial of the case on the facts were not passed upon by the Court of Civil Appeals, we recommend that the cause be remanded to that court for such action as may be deemed proper following its disposition of the assignments referred to.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

DURHAM et al. v. HOUSTON OIL CO. OF TEXAS. (No. 151-3110.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Injunction \S 35(2) — Party having prior possession under deed may enjoin naked trespasses.

One having actual prior possession of land under a deed fully descriptive thereof, under which it claimed title, was entitled to recover against naked trespassers in a suit for injunction to prevent trespasses and the cutting of timber.

2. Adverse possession \S 98 — Possession of improvements on league of land held not to extend beyond improvements.

One taking possession of a league of land of which 15½ acres were improved, and claiming an indefinite 640 acres not designated, but not exercising any control over, or adverse possession of, any part of the league other than that covered by the actual improvements, acquired no title by limitation to any part of the league outside of the improved land.

3. Adverse possession \S 112 — Presumption not indulged in support of party having burden.

Where the burden rests upon one asserting limitation, a presumption supporting the claim should not be indulged, especially when the evidence will not more certainly support a presumption in consonance with the right than in derogation thereof.

4. Adverse possession \S 85(3) — Evidence of taking possession under some sort of trade will not warrant finding of adverse possession.

Evidence that K. took possession of land owned by S. under some sort of a trade, the character of which is not shown, does not warrant the jury in finding that the possession was taken under such circumstances as to set in motion the bar of limitations, especially where K. subsequently abandoned any character of occupancy for more than half a century.

5. Adverse possession §85(1) — Absence of party under whom another took possession and failure to claim raises no presumption of adverse holding.

Where K.'s possession of land owned by S. was under some sort of a trade with S., S.'s absence and failure to assert his right in opposition to K. raised no presumption of K.'s adverse right.

6. Evidence §219(1) — Absence of vendor may be considered in proper case as evidence.

Where K. took possession of S.'s land under some sort of a trade, the absence of S., who asserted no right in opposition to K., might be considered, in a proper case, by the jury as tending to show payment of the purchase money.

7. Adverse possession §60(4) — Possession by consent remains such until repudiation brought home to owner.

Where possession of land is taken with the consent of the owner, the possession is the owner's possession until repudiation is brought home to him.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Ninth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by the Houston Oil Company of Texas against Ralph Durham and others. A judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (193 S. W. 211), and the defendants and certain interveners bring error. Affirmed.

O. W. Howth, W. R. Blain, R. L. Durham, and E. E. Easterling, all of Beaumont, for plaintiffs in error.

Parker & Kennerly, of Houston, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. This suit was instituted May 18, 1914, by the Houston Oil Company of Texas against Ralph Durham, C. F. Howth, W. S. Bruce, and L. G. Roberts, for an injunction to prevent the defendants from trespassing upon the A. W. Smith league of land in Hardin county, and to prohibit them from cutting or removing timber therefrom, or from procuring or conspiring with others to do so.

On September 3, 1914, Mary Stockholm et al., as heirs of George Keith, intervened, setting up title in themselves to an undefined 640 acres of the league, and alleging that as such owners they placed the original defendants in possession. They made Manor Hanks, S. O. Hanks, J. S. Rice, and Hezekiah Rice defendants, but later dismissed as to them. These interveners disclaimed all title to the league against the Houston Oil Company, except the undivided 640 acres which they claimed under the 10-year statute of limitation. The petition contains no description of the 640 acres, further than that it should be so surveyed as to include the improvements.

On June 29, 1915, George Womack and others intervened, claiming the same 640 acres under George Keith. They later dismissed their plea of intervention.

August 2, 1915, the original defendants and the interveners Mary Stockholm et al. filed their first amended answer and plea of intervention. After numerous exceptions, they specially alleged that the original defendants were in possession of the land as tenants and cotenants of such interveners, and pleaded the title in themselves to 640 acres of the league, to be so taken as to include the improvements of George Keith made on 15½ acres. They described the latter tract by metes and bounds as inclusive of the improvements. They pleaded not guilty and general denial. They prayed for a recovery of the 640 acres out of the league, and that the court have same surveyed so as to include the land on which the improvements were alleged to have been situated.

August 2, 1915, the oil company filed its supplemental petition and answer to the cross-action by these parties, wherein they set up the 5 and 10 year statutes in bar. The 10-year statute was asserted under recorded memorandum describing the whole league. The cause went to trial between the oil company on one part and the original defendants and first interveners on the other. After hearing the evidence, the court gave a peremptory instruction for the oil company, and upon verdict returned in its favor judgment was accordingly rendered. The losing parties appealed, and the judgment of the trial court was affirmed. 193 S. W. 211.

As the statement of the evidence given in the opinion by the Court of Civil Appeals is sufficient to an understanding of the questions discussed, we deem it unnecessary to restate it, further than attention may be called to it in the opinion.

The propositions which are presented by the plaintiffs in error are: First, that it was error to peremptorily charge for the oil company, because the evidence wholly failed to show title by limitation in the company as to the 640 acres claimed by plaintiffs in error; second, that there was error in not submitting to the jury the issue of title in the petitioners under the 10-year statute as to 640 acres of the survey, because the facts showed that this ancestor had perfected title to 640 acres prior to 1860, and the evidence wholly failed, to show an invasion of petitioners' possession in support of limitation title in the oil company to any part of the 640 acres; and, third, that under any view of the record, they showed title by limitation against the oil company as to the 15½ acres.

Opinion.

A statement of the respective positions of the parties and their rights furnishes a complete answer to the propositions urged in support of the errors assigned.

[1] By the pleading and facts adduced, the Houston Oil Company was shown to have had the actual prior possession of the whole league under a deed fully descriptive thereof, under which it claimed title to the land. The plaintiffs in error subsequently invaded that possession without apparent claim. Under this state of facts, the oil company was entitled to recover against the naked trespassers. House v. Reavis, 89 Tex. 626, 35 S. W. 1063.

To defeat the effect of prior possession, plaintiffs in error sought to show title in themselves under George Keith by limitation as to 640 acres. They took the burden of proof. To meet this duty, they sought to show that in 1837 Smith, the patentee, was in possession of the league, living in a house situated on the 15½ acres described in their intervention; that George Keith moved on the league under some kind of a trade with Smith; that Smith moved away when Keith moved in; and that Keith held that tract, claiming 640 acres, until 1860, when it was vacated.

[2] The only evidence showing, or tending to show, any claim by Keith is that he went into possession with the consent of Smith, settled on the improvements made by Smith—being the tract of 15½ acres described by metes and bounds in the intervention—and claimed an indefinite 640 acres out of the league. There is an absence of pleading or evidence showing any character of act by Keith designating the particular 640 acres claimed, or that he ever exercised any control over or adverse possession of any part of the league, other than that covered by the actual improvements. No character of possession or occupancy by Keith or plaintiffs in error is shown subsequent to 1859, until in the spring of 1914. The plaintiffs in error showed no title by limitation to any part of the league outside of the land covered by the improvements. Lumber Co. v. Kennedy, 103 Tex. 297, 126 S. W. 1110; Titel v. Garland, 99 Tex. 201, 87 S. W. 1152; Giddings v. Fischer, 97 Tex. 184, 77 S. W. 209; McAdams v. Hooks, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 79, 104 S. W. 432; Rice, Executor, v. Goolsbee, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 254, 99 S. W. 1031.

We now come to consider the serious question raised by the record: Is there any evidence raising the issue of title in plaintiffs in error as to the 15½ acres alleged to have been covered by the improvements? The only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that A. W. Smith had already improved the 15½ acres when Keith went into possession. The evidence shows that Smith was living on the land at the time Keith went into the occupancy of the house. How long Smith had been on the league, or the extent to which he had improved the same, does not appear. No additional improvements are shown to have been made by Keith after taking possession. It is not made to appear that he fenced any additional land after taking possession. He went into possession of this improved land with the consent of Smith. The bar of the statute is not made to appear, unless Keith's occupancy for 20 or more years under claim to the undefined 640 acres can be construed into such open and notorious adverse possession of the improved tract as charged Smith or his vendees with notice of the repudiation and adverse claim of Keith.

[3] Where the burden rests upon one asserting limitation, presumption supporting the claim should not be indulged, and more especially when the evidence will not more certainly support a presumption in consonance with the right than in derogation thereof.

[4-6] Keith took possession under some sort of trade. What was the trade? Was it some executory contract, the complete performance of which would have to be shown? Or was it a definite purchase of the 15½ acres by executed contract? Browning v. Estes, 3 Tex. 462, 49 Am. Dec. 760. We are left to grope in the maze of speculation as to the character of the contract under which possession was taken. Is it within the field of possibilities that a jury can, upon any reasonable hypothesis, say that Keith's possession was taken under such circumstances as to set in motion the bar of the statute? It is said that Smith's absence and want of assertion of right in opposition to Keith is presumptive of Keith's adverse right. We do not think this a sound proposition. Smith was not called upon to act until there was certainly an invasion of his possession in repudiation of the entry by consent, and notice brought home to him of such repudiation and adverse possession. His absence in proper case might be considered by a jury as tending to show payment of purchase money. Secrest v. Jones, 21 Tex. 121.

[7] If Keith took possession with the consent of Smith, that possession was Smith's possession until repudiation was brought home to Smith. Certainly the jury may not disregard the fact that possession was taken under some sort of trade, and treat the original entry as adverse.

We would have an entirely different question had the evidence simply showed naked possession by Keith for the statutory period under an assertion of claim to the land, or with an intention to occupy and hold it until his possession ripened into title. The presumption of claim arising from the continued occupancy, in satisfaction of the statutory prerequisites, is destroyed when the claimants' own evidence, on which they depend for the establishment of title, discloses facts which militate against the possession of the ancestor as being in opposition to and against the consent of the original title holder, and shows the abandonment by the claimant of any character of occupancy for more than a half century. The evidence shows that from 1859 to 1914 no character of occupancy was held by Keith or any claimant under him. It is shown that the improvements on the 15½ acres had disappeared, with the possible exception of some débris of an old chimney. Before the oil company took possession, nature had asserted dominion and clothed the remains of civilized occupancy in the habiliments of the forest.

Having made proper disposition of the case, the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

DAWSON v. KING et al. (No. 144-3078.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. May 26, 1920.)

1. Master and servant ¶114—Employé entitled to safe way of reaching floor used.

It is the duty of an employer to exercise ordinary care to furnish an employé a reasonably safe place in which to work, including a reasonably safe way or method of ascent and descent to and from a second floor, where it was necessary for him to go.

2. Master and servant ¶129(1)—Injury must be probable consequence of negligence, which ought to have been foreseen.

To entitle an employé to recover for the employer's negligence, it must appear that the injury, not necessarily the precise actual injury, but some like injury, was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances.

3. Master and servant ¶129(1)—Omission to provide way of reaching upper floor held not cause of injury.

Where no stairway or method of ascent to an upper floor of a building was provided, and an employé attempted to reach the upper floor through a hole in the floor, by climbing a post on which were cleats, and in doing so placed his hand against a rolling door to brace or balance himself, and the door fell on him, the employer's negligence did not consist in providing an unsafe way, but in failing to provide any way, and was not the proximate cause of the injury, which was due to the unsafe way provided by the employé.

4. Master and servant ¶107(2)—Employer's duty to secure rolling door defined.

An employer owed to employés generally the duty of blocking a rolling door, to prevent its falling while being used by them for its intended purpose, or to prevent its falling upon any employé working near it; and a like duty would arise toward an employé, if the employer should have anticipated that he would probably use it for other than its primary purpose in the performance of his work.

5. Master and servant ¶107(2) — Duty to provide safe place applies only to place intended for use.

The employer's duty in respect to a safe place extends only to such parts of premises as he had prepared for the employé's occupancy or use in the performance of his work, and such other parts as he knows or ought to know such employé is accustomed or likely to use in performing his work.

6. Master and servant ¶128—Employer held to owe no duty respecting door not used for intended purposes.

An employer owed an employé no duty to secure a rolling door, so that he could safely use it to brace or balance himself in climbing through an opening leading to an upper floor, unless the employer knew or should have known that he did so use it; it not being intended for that use.

7. Master and servant ¶278(3)—Evidence insufficient to show employer should have known or anticipated use of door.

Evidence held insufficient to show that an employer should have known or anticipated that a rolling door which it failed to block would be used by an employé in climbing through a nearby opening in the floor, to brace or balance himself.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Ed. Dawson against Mrs. H. M. King and another. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed, and judgment rendered for defendants, by the Court of Civil Appeals (192 S. W. 271), and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. C. Scott, of Corpus Christi, Geo. P. Brown, of Edinburg, and El. B. Ward, of Corpus Christi, for plaintiff in error.

Jas. B. Wells, J. K. Wells, and Herbert Davenport, all of Brownsville, and H. R. Sutherland, of Corpus Christi, for defendants in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. Ed. Dawson, plaintiff, brought this action against Mrs. H. M. King and the Murray Company, defendants, to recover damages for personal injuries received by him while in their employ. The case was submitted on special issues, and on the findings of the jury judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff. On appeal, the judgment of the district court was reversed, and judgment rendered in favor of defendants. (Civ. App.) 192 S. W. 271. This is the third appeal in this case. (Civ. App.) 121 S. W. 917; 171 S. W. 257. Writ of error was granted herein by the Committee of Judges.

As grounds of recovery, plaintiff alleged in substance: That he was injured while engaged in installing for defendants a cotton gin and cotton press in a building at Kingsville, through their failure to provide him with a safe place in which to prosecute his work; that in the part of the building where plaintiff was engaged in his work there was an elevated floor, about 7 feet 2 inches from the ground; that in this floor, next to the wall of the building, there was an opening, which had been made or left for a flight of steps as means of ascent and descent to and from this floor; that steps at this place were necessary to enable plaintiff to properly prosecute his work with safety, and that defendants negligently failed to provide them, or any means of ascent and descent. It was further alleged that there was a large doorway through a side or wall of the building, the lower edge of which was about on the same level with, or just above, the surface of the upper floor, which doorway was closed by a large rolling door; that, prior to the time of plaintiff's injury, defendants had negligently rolled the door along its runway from the doorway, so that, at the time plaintiff was injured, and many days prior thereto, it remained suspended, or hung, from its runway against the wall above one of the sides of the opening through the floor; that defendants, after so placing and leaving the door above the opening, negligently failed to securely fasten it, so that it would not fall from its runway and injure plaintiff while he was engaged in the prosecution of his work; that, while he was engaged in his work in the building underneath this floor, it became necessary for him to get a hammer, which lay on the floor overhead, near one side of the edge or opening; that defendants had not provided steps or other means of ascent whereby he could have easily secured the hammer, and, in an effort to get the hammer, and in the exercise of due care and caution, and without knowing, or having reason to believe, that the door was not securely fastened, and that he was thereby incurring danger, but, on the contrary, believing that the door was securely fastened in the place where it hung, he placed one foot on a piece of plank nailed on an upright near the edge of the opening left for the stairway, caught hold of the rolling door with one hand, and slightly pulled on the door to assist him in an effort to reach the hammer with the other hand; that, as he did so, the door, or one side or end of it, gave way and fell from its runway, causing plaintiff to fall.

Defendants answered separately, urging a general demurrer and many special exceptions. They each denied that plaintiff was in his employ, and each pleaded contributory negligence and assumed risk. We will assume, without deciding, that plaintiff was in the employ of both defendants. Plaintiff's petition properly reflects the manner and construction of the building and of the rolling door. We make this further statement of facts established by the evidence:

There was a post, 6x6, at the corner of the opening left for the stairway, running up from the first and through the second floor. Cleats or wooden crosspieces were nailed to the post by plaintiff, or under his direction, as a means or method of ascending to the second floor. On the occasion of his injury, plaintiff ascended the post to secure a hammer which he had left on the upper floor, and which was lying about 18 inches from the left edge of the opening. He did not purpose to go to the second floor, but only to ascend a sufficient height to enable him to reach the hammer. He stood with his left foot on the cleat, his right foot suspended in the air, and his left arm clasped about the post from the front. In this position, he reached over and placed his right hand on the rolling door, some 3 feet distant, and released his left arm from the post, intending to secure the hammer with his left hand. The pressure against the door, used by plaintiff as a brace or balance while he was thus suspended, caused it to roll off its track and fall; it not having been properly blocked or secured. Plaintiff had a large and extended experience in the work of installing gins and presses. He was well acquainted with the construction of buildings of the kind in question, and was in full charge and control of the work of installation in which he was engaged.

[1, 2] The duty devolved upon defendants to exercise ordinary care to furnish plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work, which, under the facts, would include a reasonably safe way or method of ascent and descent to and from the second floor. If the breach of this duty was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, defendants are liable. In this, as in all cases involving negligence, in order to liability, it must appear that the injury, not necessarily the precise actual injury, but some like injury, "was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances." Milwaukee Ry. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. Ed. 256; T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 223, 38 S. W. 162.

[3] No stairway was built, and no method of ascent provided, by defendants. In view of this negligent omission, plaintiff could have declined to enter upon or continue in the work. He could have insisted upon the performance of the duty imposed upon them in this particular. He did complain of the absence of the stairway, but continued in the work; and, acting upon his own independent judgment, without the direction or instruction of defendants, adopted a way in the use of which he was injured. The negligence of defendants was negative. They omitted performance of a duty. They were negligent, not in providing an unsafe way, but in failing to provide any way. The place, in the condition in which plaintiff found it, was perfectly safe. The various parts, together constituting the place, used in the manner and for the purpose intended, in no wise imperiled plaintiff in the performance of his work. He, without the instruction or authority of defendants, knowingly—and, as we shall presently see, unnecessarily—used the door for a purpose other than that for which it was intended. Through his own act he rendered the theretofore safe place unsafe. It is obvious that plaintiff's injury was not the proximate result of the failure of defendants to provide a way, but of the unsafe way he himself provided. Having assumed to provide the way, instead of waiting upon defendants to do so, plaintiff's injury must be charged to his own conduct. He is therefore in the attitude of seeking a recovery for an act, not done or caused by defendants, but by himself. St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Highnote, 99 Tex. 23, 86 S. W. 924; M. & T. Ry. Co. of Tex. v. Graham, 209 S. W. 399.

Plaintiff asserts that, in the absence of a way, he was within his right in devising one, and the way so devised would have been safe, but for the negligence of defendants, of which he had no knowledge. The negligence complained of was the failure to properly block the rolling door.

[4] Defendants owed to their employees generally the duty of safely securing the door, by proper blocking, to prevent its falling while used by them for its intended purpose, or to prevent its falling upon any employee whose work required him to be in proximity thereto. Under some circumstances, a like duty would arise toward an employee who it should be anticipated would probably use the door for other than its primary purpose in the performance of work to which he has been assigned.

[5, 6] The employer's duty in respect to a safe place extends only to such parts of the premises as he has prepared for the employee's occupancy or use in the performance of his work, and to such other parts as he knows, or ought to know, such employee is accustomed, or is likely, to use in the performance of his work. Considered as a part of the place, the door was not intended for use by plaintiff in ascending to the second floor, and defendants owed him no duty to so secure it that he could safely use it as he did, unless they knew, or should have known, that he would so use it. Morrison v. Burgess Sulphite Fiber Co., 70 N. H. 406, 47 Atl. 412, 85 Am. St. Rep. 634.

[7] The purpose of the door was well known to plaintiff. He testified that doors of this character were found in practically all ginhouses. Its mere presence near the opening was not evidence either that defendants intended that plaintiff should use it as he did, or that they were at fault in not knowing that he was likely to or might probably do so. The evidence wholly negatives the duty of knowledge or anticipation on the part of defendants, in that the method devised by plaintiff did not require the use of the door. He testified:

"If I had thought that the door was going to fall, I would have put my right foot on that cleat, and put my left arm around the south side of that 6x6, and pulled myself against the post, and have reached over with my right hand, and have gotten the hammer. * * * I could have gone upstairs and gotten the hammer. * * * I could have climbed up the post, and have gone on the floor myself."

From the record it is clear that defendants did not know, and cannot be charged with knowledge, or a duty to anticipate, that plaintiff would make use of the door in making ascent to the second floor, especially in view of the fact that the use of the door for such purpose, even by the method provided by plaintiff himself, was not necessary. We are constrained to hold, for the reasons stated, that as a matter of law the negligence of defendants in failing to block or secure the door was not the proximate cause of the injury sustained by plaintiff, and therefore gave him no right of action. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bigham, supra.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

HALL v. EDWARDS. (No. 133-3028.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser §39—Conveyance of land for immoral purposes held illegal.

Where grantee immediately conveyed the premises to a third person by whom the house was to be used for purposes of prostitution, and where grantee, by agreement of the parties, was a mere conduit through whom the title was to pass from grantors, who had built house to be used for such purposes, to third person, to circumvent any adverse action arising out of the immoral contract, the transaction, including grantee's execution of deed in trust to secure payment of purchase money, was in contravention of public morals, and therefore an illegal contract.

2. Contracts §138(1)—Illegal transaction does not preclude recovery unless part of cause of action.

The plaintiff cannot recover when it is necessary for him to prove, as a part of his cause of action, his own illegal contract, or other illegal transaction, but if he can show a complete cause of action without being obliged to prove his own illegal act, although such illegal act incidentally appears and may be important even as explanatory of other facts in the case, he may recover.

3. Contracts §138(2)—Immoral contracts, when executed by parties, may confer rights upon the parties.

Contracts which are illegal because of their immoral character are void in the sense that they are incapable of enforcement in courts of justice and will not support a remedy and in that no legal obligation is incurred by either party, but are not void in the sense that they can confer no rights, since they can be executed by the voluntary acts of the parties or through some means or agency other than courts, agreed upon by the parties, and, when so executed, they may confer actual and irrevocable rights upon the parties.

4. Contracts §138(2)—Where immoral contract fully executed, courts will enforce rights resulting therefrom.

When an illegal contract entered into for immoral purposes has been fully executed, and suit is not brought for the purpose of its enforcement, the courts will recognize and enforce any new contract right or title resulting from its execution.

5. Trespass to try title §6(1)—Plaintiff must establish his title.

In an action in trespass to try title, plaintiff, to recover, must establish his title.

6. Appeal and error §909(2)—Court denying foreclosure purchaser relief because of illegality of mortgage is presumed to have found that purchaser bought for mortgagee.

In mortgage sale purchaser's action in trespass to try title against mortgagor, where court denied purchaser relief on ground that mortgage was a part of an immoral transaction, it will be presumed in support of the judgment that purchaser bought the property for mortgagee.

7. Contracts §138(3)—Vendor cannot foreclose lien or recover title where land was sold to be used for immoral purposes.

Where property was sold to be used for purposes of prostitution, vendors, having secured payment of purchase-money notes by a vendor's lien and by deed in trust, were precluded, because of illegality of the transaction, from foreclosing the liens upon or recovering title to the land through the courts.

8. Trespass to try title §6(1)—Trustee's sale executes immoral mortgage contract so as to entitle purchaser to relief.

Refusal of defendant, who had purchased property for immoral purposes, to yield possession to plaintiff, who had purchased at trustee's sale under deed in trust executed as a part of the immoral transaction, did not render the illegal deed of trust an unexecuted contract so as to preclude court from giving plaintiff relief in action in trespass to try title, the contract having been executed by the trustee's sale giving plaintiff a complete title, with the right of possession as an incident thereto, without reference to the original illegal contract.

9. Property §7—Right of possession an incident of title.

Actual entry upon land is not necessary to give seisin or investiture or to give a more perfect title; the right of possession being an incident to and growing out of the title.

10. Fraudulent conveyances §174(1)—Grantee may recover possession though conveyance fraudulent.

Where a conveyance has been made in fraud of creditors, and possession remains with grantor, the grantee may recover possession.

11. Deeds §17(1)—Reconveyance by grantee in deed executed for immoral purpose on cancellation of purchase-money notes is valid.

If land is conveyed to be used for immoral purposes, and notes are executed for purchase money, a conveyance of the land by grantee to a third party or a reconveyance to grantors in consideration of cancellation of notes would be valid and binding, and would divest grantee of all title and right to possession; the moral obligation to pay the notes or reconvey being a sufficient consideration.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. M. Hall against Lula Edwards. Judgment for defendant was reformed and affirmed by Court of Civil Appeals (194 S. W. 674), and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff.

Nelson & Hunter, of Wichita Falls, for plaintiff in error.

T. R. Boone, of Wichita Falls, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. Action in trespass to try title by W. M. Hall, plaintiff in error, against Lula Edwards, defendant in error.

By deed dated August 20, 1913, P. H. Pennington and Charles Hill deeded to Everett Hughes a lot in Wichita Falls upon which was situate a seven-room house. The recited consideration was $150 cash, 56 notes for $60 each, payable monthly, and one note for $37, secured by vendor's lien, retained in the deed and by a deed in trust dated August 21, 1913. On August 21, 1913, Hughes conveyed the property to Lula Edwards, in consideration of $150 cash and the assumption of payment of the notes above described. The first 13 of the notes were paid, and, default having been made in the payment of the notes subsequently maturing, the trustee sold the property under the trust deed. Plaintiff in error, Hall, was the purchaser under the trustee's sale, and the trustee delivered to him a proper deed of conveyance to the property.

The cause was submitted to a jury upon special issues. In response to such issues, the jury found that Pennington and Hill sold the property to be used for immoral purposes; that it was used for immoral purposes; that at the time plaintiff in error purchased the property under the trustee's sale he knew that the property had been sold by Pennington and Hill for immoral purposes, and was then being used for such purposes.

The Court of Civil Appeals finds further that Pennington and Hill built the house to be used for prostitution and for sale to those engaged in that business; the terms of sale being so arranged that payments might be made out of the profits of the business conducted on the premises. The evidence establishes that the property was deeded to Hughes with the understanding that it be conveyed by him to defendant in error; the object being to circumvent any adverse action arising out of the immoral and illegal contract. There is evidence that in purchasing the property at the trustee's sale plaintiff in error acted for and in behalf of Pennington and Hill, and that the purchase by him was for the use of Pennington and Hill.

The trial court rendered judgment that plaintiff take nothing by his suit, and further decreed that the cloud upon defendant's title, by reason of plaintiff's claim, be removed. The Court of Civil Appeals reformed the judgment of the district court by omitting therefrom the affirmative relief granted defendant in error, and as reformed affirmed the judgment. 194 S. W. 674. Writ of error was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

[1] As held by the Court of Civil Appeals, the transaction involving the conveyance of the property by Pennington and Hill to Hughes, the execution of the deed in trust by Hughes, and his conveyance to defendant in error, was in contravention of public morals, and therefore an illegal contract. It is apparent that Hughes was a mere conduit through whom, by agreement of the parties, the title was to pass to defendant in error.

The authorities are agreed that a court will not lend its aid, in any manner, toward carrying out the terms of an illegal contract, and, when a plaintiff cannot establish his cause of action without relying upon such contract, he cannot recover. Read v. Smith, 60 Tex. 379; Beer v. Landman, 88 Tex. 450, 31 S. W. 805; Wiggins v. Bisso, 92 Tex. 219, 47 S. W. 637, 71 Am. St. Rep. 837.

[2] As stated in Frost v. Plumb, 40 Conn. 111, 16 Am. Rep. 18, quoted in Beer v. Landman, supra:

"We understand the rule to be this: The plaintiff cannot recover whenever it is necessary for him to prove, as a part of his cause of action, his own illegal contract, or other illegal transaction; but if he can show a complete cause of action without being obliged to prove his own illegal act, although such illegal act may incidentally appear, and may be important even as explanatory of other facts in the case, he may recover. It is sufficient if his cause of action is not essentially founded upon something which is illegal. If it is, whatever may be the form of the action, he cannot recover."

[3] Illegal contracts of this character are said to be void. The use of the term "void" in this connection tends to confusion. Such contracts are void in the sense that they are incapable of enforcement in courts of justice, and will not support a remedy. No legal obligation is incurred by either party. But such contracts are not void in the sense that they can confer no rights. They can be executed by the voluntary acts of the parties, or through some means or agency, other than the courts, agreed upon between the parties; and if, and when, so executed, they may confer actual and irrevocable rights upon the parties. 2 Elliott, Con. § 1061; McBlair v. Gibbes, 17 How. 232, 15 L. Ed. 132.

From the fact alone that a contract is unenforceable in the courts, it does not follow that an enforceable right or estate cannot result therefrom. This is illustrated in the case of a creditor who, prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, had acquired a properly executed deed in trust upon the homestead of the debtor. The Constitution prohibited a forced sale of the homestead. This was the only method by which the courts could subject such property to the payment of the debt, and the lien was, therefore, unenforceable through the courts. Yet a sale made by the trustee under the deed in trust was valid and binding. Again, where a debt secured by a deed in trust was barred by limitation, the lien could not be foreclosed by the courts; but, until recent legislation, a sale under the deed in trust conveyed good title to the property. Goldfrank v. Young, 64 Tex. 432.

[4] When an illegal contract, of the character here in question, has been fully executed, and suit is not brought for the purpose of its enforcement, the courts will recognize and enforce any new contract, right, or title resulting from its execution by the parties themselves. Wagner v. Biering, 65 Tex. 506; Floyd v. Patterson, 72 Tex. 202, 10 S. W. 526, 13 Am. St. Rep. 787; De Leon v. Trevino, 49 Tex. 88, 30 Am. Rep. 101; Brooks v. Martin, 2 Wall. 70, 17 L. Ed. 732. And, to use the language of the court in Wegner v. Biering, supra:

"When the contract has been executed without the aid of courts by the voluntary acts of the parties, the profit or estate * * * is not contaminated."

[5, 6] This action is in trespass to try title. In order to a recovery, it was essential that plaintiff establish his title. He purchased under the trustee's sale with full knowledge of the illegality of the contract. It may be that there was evidence sufficient to raise the issue that he purchased for Pennington and Hill. This issue was not submitted, nor its submission requested; and, to sustain the judgment of the trial court, the presumption obtains that the court so found. In the further consideration of the case we will regard plaintiff in error as occupying the same position that Pennington and Hill would occupy, according him no different or higher rights.

[7] The deed from Pennington and Hill to Hughes reserved a vendor's lien to secure payment of the purchase-money notes; and thereby the superior title remained in them. To further secure payment of the notes, Hughes executed the deed in trust. Defendant in error took the property subject to these liens. The transaction being illegal, Pennington and Hill were precluded from foreclosing the liens upon or recovering title to the land through the courts.

[8] But the illegality of the transaction did not prevent the exercise of the power of sale conferred upon the trustee, by agreement of the parties, through the deed in trust. At this sale plaintiff in error became the purchaser, and acquired the title remaining in Pennington and Hill through the retention of the vendor's lien and that of defendant in error acquired by her deed from Hughes. The sale put an end to the illegal contract. It was fully executed by the parties themselves, acting through the trustee, who, in the execution of the trust, was the agent of all the parties thereto. Plaintiff in error's title, though arising out of the illegal contract, was not dependent upon it; that is, no action of the court was necessary to enforce the contract, or any of its terms, in order to make the title perfect or complete.

A title or estate so resulting from, and arising out of, the illegal contract, fully executed, will be recognized by the courts; the recognition involving no reference to, or action upon, the contract itself.

Plaintiff in error not seeking the enforcement of the contract, and not invoking it to sustain a remedy, its illegality is no defense. To permit this defense, under the facts herein, would be to create a right or title in defendant in error dependent entirely upon such contract. It would, in effect, be to enforce the contract on her behalf, enabling her to reap a benefit thereunder. The same principles which govern courts in declining to enforce an illegal contract in aid of a plaintiff's title inhibit its use to create a title in a defendant. Wooden v. Shotwell, 24 N. J. Law, 789.

From the fact that defendant in error did not yield possession, the Court of Civil Appeals concluded that the contract was not fully executed, and that plaintiff in error, in seeking recovery of possession, invokes the aid of the court in carrying into final effect the illegal contract. We think this conclusion erroneous.

[9] Where parties to such an illegal contract, in dependence thereon, seek the aid of the court to create in them the right of possession, the court will refuse its aid. But where such parties establish an existent right of possession, needing the aid of the court, not for its creation but only for its enforcement, such aid will not be denied them. The right of possession is an incident to, and grows out of, the title. The title vested in plaintiff in error through the trustee's deed. It was as perfect, upon the due execution and delivery of the deed, as though he had been placed in actual, pedal possession of the land. Actual entry upon land is not necessary to give seisin or investiture, or to give a more perfect title. The title draws to it the legal seisin and possession. Horton v. Crawford, 10 Tex. 382; Titus v. Johnson, 50 Tex. 224. Exhibiting a perfect title, plaintiff in error established an existing right of possession in no manner dependent upon the action of the court, and sought only an enforcement of this right.

[10] Where a conveyance has been in fraud of creditors and possession remains with the grantor, the grantee may recover possession. Hoeser v. Kraeka, 29 Tex. 450; Lemp Brewing Co. v. La Rose, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 575, 50 S. W. 460.

This holding is predicated upon the fact that the conveyance, though void as to creditors, was valid and binding as between the parties and those claiming under them. The title having vested, the right of possession followed. Herein the deed in trust was void only in the sense that it could not be enforced through the courts. It could be, and was, executed in the manner agreed upon between the parties, without the aid of the court; and thereby the title passed, and with it the right of possession.

[11] It cannot be doubted that, had Pennington and Hill conveyed the land to defendant in error, she executing notes for the purchase price, a conveyance of the land by her to plaintiff in error, or a reconveyance by her to Pennington and Hill, in consideration of the cancellation of the notes, would have been, in all things, valid and binding. In such case, had she remained in possession of the property, there would be nothing to preclude her grantee from recovering possession. The execution of the deed would be clearly within the right of defendant in error, and through its execution she would be divested of all title and the resultant right of possession. Conceding to her the right to attack the validity of the deed on the ground that it was founded upon an illegal consideration, as in the case of Medearis v. Granberry, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 187, 84 S. W. 1070, cited and discussed by the Court of Civil Appeals, such defense would be groundless. Despite the illegality of the transaction, there was a moral obligation resting upon defendant in error to pay the purchase-money notes or reconvey the land. While courts will not enforce the moral obligation, they will recognize it as a valuable and sufficient consideration to support the deed. Bicocchi v. Casey-Swasey Co., 91 Tex. 259, 42 S. W. 963, 66 Am. St. Rep. 875; McBlair v. Gibbs, supra.

The deed under the trustee's sale had precisely the same legal effect as a deed executed by defendant in error would have had. As said by the Court of Civil Appeals:

"The trustee's deed executed under the authority of the deed of trust is in legal effect a conveyance by Lula Edwards herself."

There is no attack upon the regularity of the sale by the trustee, or the deed executed by him to plaintiff in error. Though the execution of the deed in trust was illegal, the sale thereunder had in it no element of illegality. It was not in contravention of public morals, nor contrary to any public policy, and the title vesting in plaintiff in error was complete without reference to the original illegal contract.

We are of opinion that the judgments of the district court and the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and judgment here rendered for plaintiff in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

PECOS & N. T. RY. CO. v. HALL.
(No. 125-3004.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Commerce §8(3)—State cattle quarantine regulations held not in conflict with or superseded by federal regulations as to interstate shipment.

State regulations for moving cattle from pasture in quarantined territory to station are not in conflict with, and so not superseded by, federal regulations, under the national quarantine act, relating solely to their movement in interstate shipment.

2. Carriers §215(1)—Not liable for damage from dipping cattle because of advance notice that it would not transport them unless dipped, as required by quarantine regulations before taking them to station.

Where plaintiff without dipping his cattle, in pasture in territory under quarantine, could not have taken them to defendant's station for interstate shipment, without violating quarantine regulations, defendant, because notifying plaintiff in advance that it would not transport them unless they were dipped, was not liable for the damage from dipping them, which plaintiff thereupon had done, irrespective of whether under regulations, under the national quarantine act, it would have been defendant's duty to receive them for shipment had they been moved and tendered for shipment without dipping.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. F. Hall against the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (189 S. W. 535), and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, and Madden, Trulove, Ryburn & Pipkin, of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error.

R. R. Hazelwood and J. M. Jones, both of Amarillo, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. J. F. Hall early in October, 1913, entered into a contract with Warren & Son, ranchmen, by which he agreed to take from them all their heifers of a certain class, less a 10 per cent. cut back. The cattle were located on a ranch in Farmer and Bailey counties, Tex., and by the terms of Hall's contract of purchase were to be by the owners rounded up at Cyclone Well, where Hall was to make his cut back. Following this, the cattle to be received by Hall were to be taken to Bovina, a station on the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company's line about five miles from Cyclone Well, and there delivered to Hall on October 24th. Hall was purchasing the cattle for shipment from Bovina to Kansas City for immediate slaughter, and on October 14th ordered cars in which to move the shipment on the 24th.

The territory, including all of Bailey and Parmer counties, as well as the ranch upon which the cattle were located, was then under quarantine established by both state and federal authorities on account of the prevalence of a disease known as scabies.

On October 22d, before the cattle were to be rounded up for Hall to make his cut back, L. L. Jones, an inspector for both the Live Stock Sanitary Commission of Texas and the Bureau of Animal Industry for the federal government, informed the station agent at Bovina, John Lucas, that he would not issue a shipping permit for the cattle, unless they were dipped. Lucas thereupon communicated by wire with the company's general freight agent, and was advised not to receive the cattle for transportation unless they were accompanied by a shipping permit. Following this, Lucas attempted to get in telephone communication with Warren & Son's foreman, Mr. Morehead, for the purpose, according to his statement, "of not having him go to the trouble of bringing in the cattle without knowing they would be clear for shipment." Lucas failed to get in communication with Morehead, but later in the day talked to Inspector Jones, who volunteered his services in the matter of either seeing Morehead direct, or sending him word that Lucas would not receive the cattle for shipment until a permit had been issued. Morehead testified that he received the message from Jones that the cattle would not be received for shipment until they had been dipped. For that reason, he testified, he did not take the heifers to Bovina on the 24th for delivery. The night following the conversation between Jones and Morehead the latter talked with Hall over the telephone, with the result that the cattle were dipped the next day under Hall's instructions. A shipping permit was issued, and on October 31st the cattle were delivered to Hall at Bovina, and by Hall to the railway company, and shipped.

Hall sued the railway company for the damages sustained by the cattle resulting from the dipping. He states in his first supplemental petition that the gist of his cause of action "is the unlawful, illegal, and negligent requirement by the defendant that plaintiff procure a certificate of the inspection and permit, which would require dipping of the cattle in question before it would accept them for shipment."

Rule 19 of the Live Stock Sanitary Commission of Texas, promulgated under the quarantine laws of the state, and in force at the time of the transactions above detailed, recites that, whereas it had been ascertained by the Live Stock Sanitary Commission that scabies, a contagious, communicable disease, was prevalent among the cattle in the counties named, including the counties of Parmer and Bailey, that to the end the disease be eradicated from among the cattle of Texas, the movement of any cattle from, through, or into the counties named should be made in the manner and under the conditions thereafter prescribed.

The conditions prescribed by rule 20 of the commission were, in effect, that no cattle held in the counties named should be moved from the pastures where located for any purpose whatsoever without a permit issued by a duly authorized inspector of the commission, and that no cattle within the territory designated should be tendered for inspection to a federal inspector for interstate movement, unless the owner of the cattle was in possession of a certificate signed by an inspector for the commission, stating that the owner of the cattle tendered had complied with the state laws, rules, and regulations of the commission, and that his range and cattle were free of infection.

Regulation No. 21 of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the federal government, promulgated and in force at the same time, provides that cattle not visibly diseased, but which may be part of a diseased herd, may, without inspection, be shipped interstate as "uninspected exposed cattle" for immediate slaughter, from points in the quarantined area to any recognized slaughtering center where pens were provided for yarding exposed cattle, provided the officers of the transportation company fixed to both sides of the cars carrying such cattle a durable placard on which was printed in the type prescribed the words, "uninspected exposed cattle." Plaintiff contended that, inasmuch as his cattle were of the class designated, they were eligible to shipment under the federal regulation, without dipping and without the issuance of a certificate or permit.

The court received in evidence the rules of the Live Stock Sanitary Commission offered by defendant, but after the evidence was concluded withdrew them from the consideration of the jury. The charge was, in substance, that if the cattle were uninspected exposed cattle, but not diseased, and plaintiff ordered cars for their transportation on October 24th from Bovina to Kansas City for immediate slaughter, and that prior to the time for shipment defendant announced it would not receive and transport the cattle without a certificate or permit, or unless they were first dipped, and that such announcement, if any, was communicated to plaintiff, and that the only lawful way by which a shipping permit or certificate could be obtained was for the cattle to be dipped, and that in compliance with the announcement the cattle were dipped, and from the dipping as a proximate cause sustained the injuries alleged, to find for plaintiff.

The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment. 189 S. W. 535. The writ was granted upon application referred to the committee of judges.

[1] Plaintiff seeks to predicate liability upon the station agent's statement that he would not receive the cattle for transportation unless they were dipped and the subsequent act of dipping resulting in their injury, and attempts to discharge the burden of showing that plaintiff could have lawfully tendered the cattle for shipment without dipping on the date the cars were due to be furnished at Bovina, by invoking federal regulation No. 21.

The difficulty arises from the fact that at the time of the agent's statement, by which it is claimed he waived the company's right to an actual tender of the cattle for shipment, they were in the custody of Warren & Son in their pasture several miles distant from Bovina. They were at that time also a part of a diseased herd in infected territory, and had not been tendered to a federal inspector for interstate movement; nor had a permit or certificate been issued preliminary to such movement, as required by the state quarantine rules.

Defendant in error questions the validity of the state rules, and points out that in 1905 Congress enacted sections 8703, 8704, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1916, relating to the interstate shipment of diseased and exposed cattle from quarantine districts; that under section 8703 it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to promulgate rules and regulations governing the inspection, certification, treatment, handling, and the method and manner of delivering and shipping of cattle from a quarantined state, or any portion thereof, into any other state; that section 8704 provides that cattle may be moved from such area in compliance with the rules and regulations promulgated pursuant to the provisions of section 8703, and that cattle may lawfully be moved only in compliance with the rules and regulations so promulgated. The contention is made that upon such enactment by Congress the national quarantine laws superseded those of the state.

The state quarantine laws and regulations are superseded by the federal only in case of conflict, or in the event the state rules are unreasonable and impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce. St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 451, 49 S. W. 627; Id., 181 U. S. 248, 21 Sup. Ct. 603, 45 L. Ed. 847; Evans v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 109 Minn. 64, 122 N. W. 876, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 278; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. Ed. 527; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 10 Sup. Ct. 862, 34 L. Ed. 455, 3 Interst. Com. Com'n R. 185; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 18

Sup. Ct. 488, 42 L. Ed. 878; Rasmussen v. Idaho, 181 U. S. 198, 21 Sup. Ct. 594, 45 L. Ed. 820. Whether the state and federal regulations are in conflict must be determined by reference to the regulations themselves.

The federal regulation invoked relates wholly to safeguards provided to prevent the spread of the disease after the cattle have been received by the carrier and are in the process of interstate shipment. State rules Nos. 19 and 20 have to do with precautions to be exercised in moving the cattle from the pastures in which located, and the tendering of them to a federal inspector for interstate movement. They are supplemental rather than in conflict.

The state's jurisdiction over its exports until they are committed to the carrier for transportation when they are to be transported by rail, and, in any event, until they are started upon their ultimate passage from the state, is recognized by both the federal and state decisions.

In Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. 475, 29 L. Ed. 715, the court say:

"When the products of the farm or the forest are collected and brought in from the surrounding country to a town or station serving as an entrepôt for that particular region, whether on a river or a line of railroad, such products are not yet exports, nor are they in process of exportation, nor is exportation begun until they are committed to the common carrier for transportation out of the state to the state of their destination, or have started on their ultimate passage to that state. Until then it is reasonable to regard them as not only within the state of their origin, but as a part of the general mass of property of that state, subject to its jurisdiction."

The doctrine stated has been reaffirmed in the recent cases of McCluskey v. Marysville & Northern Ry. Co., 243 U. S. 36, 37 Sup. Ct. 374, 61 L. Ed. 578, and Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S. 272, 38 Sup. Ct. 529, 62 L. Ed. 1101, 8 A. L. R. 649, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 724. In Houston Direct Navigation Co. v. Insurance Co. of North America, 89 Tex. 1, 32 S. W. 889, 30 L. R. A. 713, 59 Am. St. Rep. 17, it is held that when a commodity has been delivered to a common carrier to be transported on a continuous voyage to a point beyond the limits of the state where delivered, the character of interstate or foreign commerce attaches thereto.

The mere fact that the National Quarantine Act provides for the interstate movement of cattle only by rules and regulations promulgated under its provisions does not render void reasonable state regulations touching their preliminary movement, at least in the absence of conflicting regulations; nor are such state regulations thereby rendered void so long as the national regulations relate solely to cattle in the process of interstate shipment.

In the recent case of Carey v. State of South Dakota, 250 U. S. 118, 39 Sup. Ct. 403, 63 L. Ed. 886, the court had under consideration the validity of the State Game Laws of South Dakota. The question involved was whether the state law, in view of the provisions of the federal Migratory Bird Act, enacted subsequent to its passage, was void. The federal act provides that all wild geese, wild ducks, and other migratory birds which in their migration passed through and did not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any state should thereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the government of the United States, and should not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations thereafter provided for. The state law provided that no person should ship, convey, or cause to be shipped or transported, by common or private carrier, to any person either within or without the state, wild duck of any variety. Carey was convicted in the state court for violation of the state statute under a charge of shipping wild ducks from a point within the state to Chicago. He urged that, inasmuch as Congress by the language of the national act assumed exclusive jurisdiction over the class of migratory birds in question, the then existing state laws on the subject were thereby abrogated. The court in the course of the opinion upholding the validity of the state law says:

"It is, however, urged that Congress has manifested its intention to assume exclusive jurisdiction of the subject, and that the failure to make any provision in the federal act concerning shipping evidences the purposes of Congress that the shipping of game birds shall not be prohibited. This argument rests upon the clause which declares that the migratory birds 'shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the government of the United States.' But that clause may not be read without its context; and the words immediately following show that the custody and protection is limited to prohibiting their being 'destroyed or taken contrary to regulations' which are to fix the closed seasons in the several zones. If, reading the federal act as a whole, there were room for doubt, two established rules of construction would lead us to resolve the doubt in favor of sustaining the validity of the state law. First. The intent to supersede the exercise by a state of its police powers is not to be implied unless the act of Congress, fairly interpreted, is in actual conflict with the law of the state. Savage v. Jones, 225 U. S. 501, 538; Missouri, Kansas & Texas Ry. Co. v. Haber, 169 U. S. 613, 623. Second. Where a statute is reasonably susceptible of two interpretations, by one of which it would be clearly constitutional and by the other of which its constitutionality would be doubtful, the former construction should be adopted."

[2] The state quarantine regulations are, in our opinion, valid, and must be looked to in determining in the light of the facts whether plaintiff, at the time he claimed the railway company waived its right to have the cattle actually tendered for shipment, was in a position to lawfully tender them for transportation without having them dipped.

Judge Hendricks, speaking for the Court of Civil Appeals in this case, says:

"We necessarily infer that the jury believed that Jones, as federal inspector, informed Lucas, the agent, that under the federal regulations these particular cattle, purchased by Hall, had the right to go to Kansas City, Mo., for immediate slaughter. If under the federal regulations a permit for that purpose was necessary to be issued by Jones, it inferentially follows that Jones, as federal inspector, would have issued such a document. It also follows, we think, logically that the agent had no right to refuse to receive uninspected, clean cattle in the pens at Bovina for shipment for immediate slaughter at Kansas City and St. Joseph, Mo., unless the same were dipped. We infer that Jones, as state inspector, would not have issued a permit for the movement of these cattle from Warren & Son's ranch to the stock pens, but also conclude that, if a permit were necessary, he would have issued one as federal inspector, permitting the movement of the cattle to Kansas City and St. Joe, Mo., for the open market for immediate slaughter."

The inference relied upon in the foregoing excerpt cannot be indulged except upon the presumption that the inspector would have violated his official duty.

Under the provisions of rule 20 of the state live stock commission, only two ways were open to plaintiff for moving his cattle from the pasture where located, to wit: "(a) By securing a certificate from the inspector stating that the owner of the cattle tendered and complied with the state laws, rules, and regulations, and that his range and cattle were free of infection; and (b) by securing a permit from the inspector. Jones stated to the station agent that the cattle "were not eligible to a certificate," and it appears from the rule that they were not. The range was not free from infection, and it is not to be inferred that a certificate would have been issued so stating. There is no basis in the record for indulging the inference that the inspector would have issued a permit to move the cattle without their being dipped, even if his statement that under the state regulations the cattle "couldn't come from the range without dipping" be disregarded. There is no ground for presuming that protection of the territory between the pastures and the shipping points, from the spread of disease therein, was not equally as important as protecting the territory along the route of shipment from the same menace.

We see nothing in the state rules to indicate that they are unreasonable, or that they were not promulgated in good faith for the protection of the live stock of the state.

Plaintiff, without dipping his cattle, could not have moved them from the pasture where located to Bovina, without violating the state quarantine regulations; and, regardless of whether after the cattle had been so moved it would have been the defendant's duty under federal regulations, to receive them for transportation without dipping, plaintiff is not entitled to recover. A cause for damages could not be founded, we think, upon an advance notice given by the defendant to the plaintiff that it would not transport the cattle unless they were dipped, when in fact the plaintiff could not have tendered the cattle lawfully for shipment without dipping them. There was no waiver by defendant of a tender which plaintiff was not in position to make.

We recommend, therefore, that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that judgment be rendered in favor of plaintiff in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

SPEER et al. v. DALRYMPLE et al.
(No. 158-3138.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence ¶431—Nondelivery of written instrument may be shown by parol.

A defendant being sued on a written instrument is not precluded from showing by parol evidence the fact of nondelivery to defeat the effectiveness of an obligation.

2. Bills and notes ¶489(1)—Pleadings held to present issue of nondelivery of commission notes secured by lien in deed.

In broker's action on commission notes secured by lien reserved in deed, pleadings held to present issue of nondelivery of notes to broker.

3. Brokers ¶88(5)—Whether broker participated in fraud inducing real estate exchange held for jury.

In broker's action on commission notes and to foreclose lien reserved in deed, brought after the real estate transaction had been rescinded for fraud, question whether broker who acted as agent for both parties to the transaction was a party to such fraud or had notice thereof held for the jury.

4. Brokers ¶65(1)—Broker not entitled to commissions after rescission for fraud to which he was a party.

If broker who acted as agent for both parties to real estate exchange transaction was a party to or had notice of the fraud that induced consummation of transaction, he is in no position to assert a lien for commissions on one of the tracts of land conveyed, reserved in the deed after the transaction had been rescinded because of such fraud, though rescission did not specifically provide for the cancellation of commission notes.

5. Brokers ¶77—Broker estopped from asserting lien for commissions after rescission for his fault.

If broker who had acted as agent for both parties to real estate exchange transaction was a party to or consented to rescission of transaction on ground that it had been induced by fraud, he could not enforce the lien on land of defrauded party, reserved in the deed by which the land was conveyed.

6. Evidence ¶434(12)—Parol testimony as to fraud and rescission therefor held admissible.

In broker's action on commission notes and to foreclose lien reserved in deed, parol evidence that notes had not been delivered, that transaction had been induced by fraud, and had been rescinded because of such fraud, held admissible; such evidence not seeking to alter written contracts, but merely attacking their efficacy as binding because of fraud and authorized rescission.

7. Brokers ¶82(4)—Vendors may assert their lien in broker's action to foreclose lien for commissions.

In broker's action on commission notes and to foreclose lien reserved in deed, where broker's lien as shown by facts pleaded was inferior to vendor's lien for purchase price, vendors were entitled to show they had a lien superior to that of broker, and to have jury pass on such issue.

8. Equity ¶38(1)—Having jurisdiction, equity will adjust all rights of the parties.

Equity having the parties, the subject-matter, and the facts before it, will adjust, in consonance with the rules of equity, the rights of the parties arising on the pleadings and the facts.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by J. B. Dalrymple and another against R. M. Speer, T. J. Peniston, and another. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals on appeal by named defendants (196 S. W. 911), and named defendants bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals and of district court reversed, and cause remanded.

W. E. Myres, of Ft. Worth, and S. C. Padelford, of Cleburne, for plaintiffs in error.

H. P. Brown and Ramsey & Odell, all of Cleburne, for defendants in error.

SADLER, P. J. This suit was filed in the district court of Johnson county by J. B. Dalrymple to recover upon two notes executed by W. R. Grice for $300 each, with interest and attorney's fees, and for a foreclosure of a contract lien on two sections of land in Ector county. The defendants in the foreclosure were Grice, T. J. Peniston, and R. M. Speer.

The plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of the notes by transfer; that they were executed by Grice to Peniston, or order, in part payment for the land, and were secured by the liens reserved in a deed and deed of trust. Peniston and Speer were made parties to the foreclosure, as asserting some interest in the land. There was neither written transfer nor indorsement of the notes by Peniston.

The plaintiffs in error answered controverting every material allegation of the petition, and by special plea alleged that prior to and at the date of the making of the two notes Dalrymple was a real estate agent; that they were the owners of 1,280 acres of land in Ector county, described in the petition; that Dalrymple represented that Grice owned an equity of $1,800, or more in certain land in Panola and Shelby counties; that, acting as agent for both landowners, Dalrymple was instrumental in bringing about the exchange of lands by them, upon an agreement that Grice should convey to Peniston his east Texas lands and pay $6,000 evidenced by two notes of $3,000 each, payable to Peniston or order, secured by a vendor's lien upon the Ector county land; that Dalrymple and Grice fraudulently represented to plaintiffs in error that Grice owned the equity in the east Texas lands, that he had good title thereto, and that such equity was of the value of $1,800 or more; that, when the papers were drawn to close the deal, the deed from Peniston to Grice was made to recite as deferred purchase money on the Ector county land only the two $3,000 notes secured by the contract lien retained in the instrument; but that, at the special request of and for an accommodation to Dalrymple and Grice, it was agreed that the notes in suit might be included in the deed from Peniston to Grice, and secured by the contract lien retained against the land; that these two notes did not represent any part of the consideration due for the land, were no part of an obligation of either Peniston or Speer to Dalrymple, but covered solely an amount due by Grice to Dalrymple for commissions in the deal accruing to Dalrymple from Grice; that the papers were so executed upon the distinct contract and agreement on the part of all the parties to the transaction that these two notes should be payable to Peniston or order, should be held by him, not to be delivered to Dalrymple until after the two $3,000 notes were paid, and that the notes in suit were not to become binding as liens or obligations against the land until the payment of these two $3,000 notes and the delivery of the commission notes by Peniston; that, while Peniston held the legal title to the land, the beneficial title was in Speer, and this was known to the parties making the deal; that the $3,000 notes were never paid, and that the two notes in suit were never in fact transferred and delivered by Peniston to Dalrymple; that Dalrymple obtained possession of the commission notes in breach of this agreement, and without the consent of either Peniston or Speer; that he sought to obtain a transfer of the notes from Peniston, which was refused by the plaintiffs in error. It was alleged that, after the exchange of deeds on the part of Grice and Peniston, it was discovered that Grice did not own any equity in the Panola and Shelby county lands, and in fact did not own any lands in Panola or Shelby county, and that this was known to Dalrymple; that, upon such discovery, Speer called upon Dalrymple, informed him of the facts, and he agreed to bring about a rescission of the trade; that he did so by obtaining from Peniston and Speer a reconveyance of the east Texas lands to Grice, and a conveyance of the Ector county land by Grice to Speer, in cancellation of the two $3,000 purchase-money notes, and in full rescission of the trade; that Dalrymple was a party to, negotiated, and agreed to this rescission; that the two notes in suit were never in fact delivered to Dalrymple so as to become binding liens upon the land.

The plaintiffs in error undertook to defeat the foreclosure upon these allegations, and tendered proof of the facts alleged, which was excluded by the court.

Plaintiffs in error also sought, in an alternative plea upon the facts, to have a foreclosure of the two $3,000 notes as prior liens against the land, in the event the lien of the commission notes should be decreed to be valid; and tendered proof upon this alternative plea, which was likewise excluded by the court.

The court excluded all evidence, save that offered by the plaintiff in support of his action.

After the evidence was in, the trial court peremptorily instructed the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff—which was done. Thereupon judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against Grice for the amount of the two notes, with a foreclosure on the Ector county land. On appeal, this judgment was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (196 S. W. 911), and writ of error was granted by the Supreme Court in the view "that the evidence offered by Speer and Peniston under their special plea was admissible and that the court erred in giving the peremptory charge."

Opinion.

As the Court of Civil Appeals seems to have reached its conclusion that no error was committed in excluding the evidence offered by the plaintiffs in error upon the authority of Holt v. Gordon, 107 Tex. 137, 174 S. W. 1097, and (Civ. App.) 176 S. W.

902, it will not be amiss to discuss the effect of that decision before proceeding further in the case.

Holt v. Gordon is clearly distinguishable from the instant case. That decision is a correct announcement of the law with reference to the facts upon which based. On September 28, 1906, Holt conveyed to Gordon 60 acres of land for a consideration of $2,800. The deed recited $1,300 cash and two notes of $750 each, payable to Holt, and secured by the vendor's lien retained. Thereafter, on November 1, 1906, Gordon executed to Holt his note for $1,300, which was secured by a deed of trust upon another tract of 212 acres of land owned by Gordon. This $1,300 note represented the cash consideration recited in the deed from Holt to Gordon. The deed was delivered to Gordon, and the deed of trust and notes to Holt, thus completing the transaction.

Afterwards Gordon endeavored to cancel the trade by tender of rescission. This Holt refused, and brought suit upon all the notes to foreclose his vendor's lien and deed of trust lien. Gordon defended upon the plea that it was agreed at the time of the execution and delivery of the papers between him and Holt that the transaction should not be binding upon him unless he could borrow the money upon the 212 acres of land to take up and extend the $1,300 note. It was held to be improper to permit parol evidence of this agreement, in the absence of fraud in inducing the making of the contracts and the delivery of the papers, as it would be ingrafting new terms upon the written deed and deed of trust. The holding in that case proceeded upon the fact that delivery had been completed between the parties.

In the instant case the charge is that the notes in fact never had been delivered to Dalrymple in such manner as to make them effective against the Ector county land, and that delivery was a condition precedent to the effective obligation of the notes as liens on the land.

[1] We know of no authority, nor have we been cited to any, which precludes a defendant from showing by parol evidence the fact of nondelivery to defeat the effectiveness of an obligation. As we view Holt v. Gordon, it is authority for the admission of parol evidence to show nondelivery in fact, and to show the contract between the parties with reference to delivery. Had Gordon placed his notes and deed of trust in escrow for delivery upon the conditions pleaded by him, his right to show the facts is not denied by the holding in Holt v. Gordon, but is sustained by that decision.

[2] The pleadings of the parties in the instant case are sufficient to present an issue as to nondelivery, and to admit parol evidence upon that issue. 10 R. O. L. p. 1053, § 249.

[3] The plaintiffs in error also charged fraud in the procurement of the exchange of the lands, and laid this at the door of Dalrymple and Grice. They relied upon this fraud as vitiating the exchange and authorizing a rescission by the respective property owners without reference to the commission notes. As we understand the issue presented with regard to fraud, it is that Dalrymple, being a party to the original transaction, cannot assert the notes which he held as liens against the land where rescission has been had on account of the fraud. The rescission was alleged to have been necessitated, not only because of the failure to pay the purchase money notes by Grice, but also because of the primary fraud chargeable to both Grice and Dalrymple. On this issue the plaintiffs in error were entitled to have the facts passed upon by the jury.

[4] We are of opinion that if Dalrymple was a party to, or had notice of, the fraud which induced Peniston and Speer to act, then he is in no position to assert a lien against the Ector county land, because rescission may have been had without specific cancellation of the commission notes. Under the facts alleged by Dalrymple, the notes, as commercial paper in his hands, may be legal obligations of Grice; but as to whether they were valid liens against the land, was an issue which should have been determined by the jury upon the facts pleaded as they may have been established by the evidence.

[5] We are of opinion, also, that even though the notes may have been delivered to Dalrymple under such circumstances as made them binding liens against the Ector county land so long as the parties continued in recognition of the validity of the trade, yet, should it be determined from the pleadings and facts that Dalrymple was such a party to, and so consented to, the rescission as to evidence a waiver of the accommodation lien securing the notes, he cannot enforce such lien, and would be estopped to assert same as against the land.

We have carefully considered the authorities upon which the defendants in error rely, and are of opinion that they do not militate against, but are in support of our holdings.

The trial court erred in excluding evidence tending to establish the defenses pleaded, and deprived plaintiffs in error of substantive legal rights.

[6] The evidence offered did not seek to alter written contracts, but, recognizing the terms of the written obligations, attacked their efficacy as binding, because of nondelivery, fraud, and an authorized rescission. The defense is that the commission notes as made never became binding as liens against the Ector county land or were released by the rescission. Prouty v. Musquiz, 94 Tex. 87, 58 S. W. 721, 996.

[7, 8] Should the plaintiffs in error fail to sustain their defenses of nondelivery, fraud, and rescission, as against Dalrymple, we do not think that they are thereby deprived of their right to show that Dalrymple is the holder of a lien inferior to the lien existing in favor of plaintiffs in error to the extent of the consideration which Grice had obligated himself to pay in purchase of the land. The facts alleged in the pleadings clearly show on this branch of the case that Dalrymple was an inferior lienholder to the extent of the actual consideration for the land which Grice contracted to pay. If the evidence establishes the truth of the allegations, the Ector county land simply stood as a surety for Grice as to the Dalrymple notes, subject to the superior claim of the plaintiffs in error to the extent of the purchase price. On this issue, therefore, we think the court should have heard the evidence, and have permitted the jury to resolve the facts. So far as the foreclosure is concerned, Dalrymple is seeking the aid of equity, and a court of equity, with the facts before it, should administer equity. Having the parties, the subject-matter, and the facts before it, a court of equity will adjust in consonance with the rules of equity the rights of the parties arising on the pleadings and the facts.

The trial court committed substantial error in depriving plaintiffs in error of the right to support their defenses by proof, and in giving the peremptory charge.

The judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the district court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

BARREDA v. CRAIG, THOMPSON & JEFFRIES. (No. 156-3127.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B. May 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence ¶445(2) — Written contract of sale could not be modified as to price by parol.

In absence of allegation of fraud by the seller of cattle in procuring the written contract at a specified price by representation that his influence with the Mexican government would enable the cattle to escape export duty, plea of the buyers, setting up a verbal modification of the contract for the deduction from the price per head of the export duty exacted by the Mexican government, held not available to them as a palpable attempt to ingraft on a written contract a parol agreement directly antagonistic to it.

2. Sales ¶61—Contract for sale of Mexican cattle to Americans held executed as to seller.

Where American buyers of Mexican cattle accepted them from the seller, and moved them to a point in Mexico near the United States line, where nothing remained to be done except to pay duty, if legally imposed, drive the cattle to the American side, and pay the Mexican seller in accordance with the contract, so far as the seller was concerned, the contract was executed, and not open to abrogation as executory, to permit making of a new agreement.

3. Sales ¶60—Substituted agreement, diminishing price, not enforceable, as exacted from seller.

Where American buyers of Mexican cattle, after they had accepted and driven the cattle to a point in Mexico for export to the United States, insisted they would not take the cattle unless seller reduced price by amount of what buyers claimed was the Mexican head duty, substituted agreement, embodying modification, cannot be set up by buyers against seller's action for undiminished price, having been exacted by coercion, in view of the danger of seizure of the cattle by revolutionists and other factors.

4. Sales ¶60—Seller, who reduced price, could recover amount on failure of consideration for reduction.

Where the Mexican seller of cattle to Americans reduced the price to the buyers solely in consideration of an export duty claimed by them to be levied by the Mexican government, which duty was in fact not levied, the sole consideration for the reduction of price, embodied in a substituted agreement, failed, and the seller can recover the amount of the reduction.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by Ramon Barreda against Craig, Thompson & Jeffries. To review a judgment for plaintiff, defendants brought error to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed the judgment and remanded the cause (200 S. W. 868), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of the district court affirmed, on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Sanford & Wright, of Eagle Pass, and Le-wright & Douglas, of San Antonio, for plaintiff in error.

Bogges & Smith and C. K. McDowell, all of Del Rio, and Ed H. Wicks, of San Antonio, for defendants in error.

MCLENDON, J. This was an action by Ramon Barreda to recover against Craig, Thompson & Jeffries a balance of $2,394 upon a contract by which plaintiff sold defendants certain cattle. Judgment was rendered in the trial court in favor of plaintiff for the full amount sued for upon an instructed verdict. The Court of Civil Appeals reversed this judgment, and remanded the cause for further trial. 200 S. W. 863.

The only assignments of error in the Court of Civil Appeals relate to the action of the trial court in directing a verdict for plaintiff, and the only question for determination is whether defendants can avail themselves of a subsequent agreement under which they paid a less amount for the cattle than that originally contracted for. So much of the pleading and evidence as is essential to an understanding of the case will be given.

The contract, which was in writing, was executed at Laredo, Tex., on January 9, 1914. Plaintiff was a Mexican citizen, and an adherent of the Huerta government. The cattle at that time were on plaintiff's ranch, some 40 or 50 miles from Monclova, Mexico. The contract very minutely and exactly defined the rights and obligations of the parties. It was written in the Spanish language, but there was no controversy as to the substantial correctness of the English translation attached to plaintiff's petition and introduced in evidence. It provided that the plaintiff sold, and defendants purchased, all the cattle of plaintiff situated upon his ranch Las Cabras at $19 per head, United States currency, except calves of the previous year's breed, branded in December, 1913, which were to be paid for at $5 per head, United States currency. Defendants were to send to the ranch a reliable party, their representative, with sufficient money, and duly authorized to hire at Monclova such men as might be necessary to gather the cattle at the ranch and take them to Eagle Pass, either by rail or driving them all the way, in case trains were not running. When the roundup was completed, the representative of defendants and plaintiff's ranch foreman were to list the cattle, specifying the number over a year old and the number of calves less than a year old; the list to be signed by defendants' representative. Defendants were to pay for the cattle as soon as they reached the American side of the Rio Grande by check on the Laredo National Bank, which bank had in writing agreed to pay the check on presentation. All expenses for gathering and bringing the cattle over, including consular papers, exportation duties, and such other as might occur, were to be exclusively for the account of defendants. If by the time of arrival at the ranch of defendants' representative and cowboys, the cattle had been taken away by revolutionists, defendants were to lose their expenses, with no right of refund from the plaintiff; and if the revolutionists should seize the cattle, taking them away from defendants, the latter agreed to make claim through the government of the United States, and pay plaintiff "when they got the money."

In compliance with the contract, plaintiffs sent their representative to the ranch, who rounded up the cattle and drove them overland to Monclova, where they were loaded upon cars and shipped to Piedras Negras, just across the Rio Grande from Eagle Pass. Upon arrival at Piedras Negras, a controversy arose between plaintiff and defendants relative to an export duty of 10 pesos, or $4 gold, which the Mexican revenue officials either demanded or were thought to be demanding, before permitting the cattle to leave Mexico. The upshot of this controversy was that defendants refused to proceed further with the contract, unless plaintiff would scale the price for the cattle to $12 gold around per head. There were 450 grown cattle, and 100 calves. Under this proposed alteration of the contract, the total consideration amounted to approximately the original consideration, less the supposed export duty of $4 gold per head. Plaintiff declined this offer at first, but was given until the following morning for final decision, and upon the following morning he accepted the proposition. The cattle were then driven across the river and paid for at the rate of $12 per head around. The export duty was in fact not paid, but plaintiff did not know this fact until after final settlement with defendants. He accepted the reduced price in the belief that defendants had been required to pay the duty.

The theory upon which plaintiff sought to recover the balance under the original contract was that the modified or substituted contract was made upon the consideration that defendants would be required to pay the ten pesos export duty; that defendants falsely represented that they were required to and did pay said duty; and that plaintiff believed same to be true, and, relying thereon, accepted the reduced price. He alleged that the original agreement "had not in any way become oppressive to defendants, and there was no consideration moving from said defendants unto this plaintiff for the alteration of the original agreement."

Defendants resisted enforcement of the original contract upon two special pleas: First, that, at the time the original contract was entered into, plaintiff represented that on account of his relations with the Mexican federal government he would be able to get the cattle to the American side without payment of an export duty. The duty was not in force at the time the contract was made, but it was in contemplation by the Mexican authorities, and it was upon this representation and warranty by the plaintiff that the defendants were induced to and did make the contract under which they agreed to pay all export and other charges; that, upon learning that the duty would be charged, the defendants opened negotiations with plaintiff, and the modified contract was made and consummated, which amounted to a mutual accord and compromise by the parties. Second, that the defendants, apprehending and believing that the duty had been levied and would be collected, informed plaintiff that they could not and would not carry out the contract, and that thereupon the modification was mutually agreed upon, and the new contract entered into and consummated, and the consideration paid.

[1] We very seriously doubt whether the first plea of defendants would in any event be available, for the reason that it was a palpable attempt to ingraft upon a contract in writing a parol agreement directly antagonistic to the writing, and no allegation of fraud in procuring the writing was made. The pleading concedes that the 10 pesos duty was not in effect at the time the contract was made, and, under the express stipulation of the contract that the defendants were to pay all duties and charges, the 10 pesos duty, in case of its subsequent levy, was clearly within the contemplation of the parties. Moreover, by the very terms of the pleading, it is shown that the parties expected the Mexican federal government to levy some export duty. In the face of this pleading, we are at a loss to find any basis warranting the admission of this alleged parol understanding. The defendants voluntarily executed the agreement with full knowledge of its terms, and charged with knowledge that by the writing they bound themselves to pay whatever duties then existed or might be imposed before the cattle crossed the border. The most that can be said of the verbal understanding or representation was that it amounted to an agreement or representation that the plaintiff would use his influence to get the cattle across without duty, in case a duty should be imposed. Conceding, however, for the purpose of this case, that the verbal agreement or representation had sufficient force in law or in morals to form the basis of a consideration for a subsequent modification of the original contract, in the event a duty were imposed, no rights can be predicated upon this verbal arrangement in the present case, because, as a matter of fact, no duty was paid by the defendants. The whole theory, therefore, of the first defense, falls to the ground.

[2] The second defense, as construed by the Court of Civil Appeals, is in substance that while the contract was still executory, the title to the cattle being in plaintiff until they were delivered on the American side, the parties could mutually abrogate the contract and make a new one, which, when fully executed would be mutually binding, and that as the evidence presented this theory it was error to peremptorily instruct for plaintiff. We cannot agree that the testimony presents the issue that the contract was still executory as to plaintiff. So far as he was concerned, the contract was fully executed. The cattle had been accepted by defendants and moved by them to Piedras Negras. Nothing remained to be done except pay the duty, if legally imposed, drive the cattle to the American side, and pay plaintiff in accordance with the contract. All these obligations were imposed by the contract upon defendants. The fact that plaintiff assumed the risk of having the cattle taken by revolutionists did not affect the passing of title to the cattle. That stipulation of the contract merely placed upon plaintiff any loss arising from a given contingency. The stipulation would have had no place in the contract, if the title to the cattle had remained in plaintiff until they arrived on American soil. At the time defendants repudiated the contract, the cattle had arrived at a point where all danger of loss, under the stipulated contingency, had passed.

[3] If, however, we should treat the contract as still executory, we cannot concede that the substituted agreement can be enforced under the circumstances of this case. Much has been written upon the question of the right of parties to a contract to modify it by agreements wholly unilateral. The cases upon this subject are collated in an extensive note under Morecraft v. Allen, 54 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1. And while the general right of modification may exist while the contract is executory on both sides, and the circumstances are such as to warrant the inference that the parties acted voluntarily, we think the great weight of authority, as well as the better reasoning, supports the view that such modifications will not be enforced, where the situation of the parties at the time of the modification is such as to negative the inference of voluntary action by the party surrendering his vested rights. It would be difficult to suppose a case where the elements of coercion, extortion, and taking advantage, without justification, of one's necessities, were more palpably in evidence than as here presented. To stamp this transaction with legal approval would violate, in our judgment, every principle of honesty and fair dealing, and place a premium upon repudiation of binding legal obligations, where to do so would be to the pecuniary advantage of the party bound. There are, it is true, some authorities which support the contrary view; but we prefer that line of authorities which under such circumstances holds the parties to their original obligations. The case of King v. Duluth Ry. Co., 61 Minn. 482, 63 N. W. 1105, directly supports the views we hold upon this question. The court in that case held that one who had contracted to build a railroad under stipulations for a definite price for different characters of work could not recover under a modification of the contract raising the price for the work contracted to be done merely because the contract proved a losing one. After referring to authorities which seem to support the contrary view, the court say:

"The doctrine of these cases as it is frequently applied does not commend itself either to our judgment or our sense of justice, for where the refusal to perform and the promise to pay extra compensation for performance of the contract are one transaction, and there are no exceptional circumstances making it equitable that an increased compensation should be demanded and paid, no amount of astute reasoning can change the plain fact that the party who refuses to perform, and thereby coerces a promise from the other party to the contract to pay him an increased compensation for doing that which he is legally bound to do, takes an unjustifiable advantage of the necessities of the other party. To hold, under such circumstances, that the party making the promise for extra compensation is presumed to have voluntarily elected to relinquish and abandon all of his rights under the original contract, and to substitute therefor the new or modified agreement, is to wholly disregard the natural inference to be drawn from the transaction, and invite parties to repudiate their contract obligations whenever they can gain thereby. There can be no legal presumption that such a transaction is a voluntary rescission or modification of the original contract, for the natural inference to be drawn from it is otherwise in the absence of any equitable considerations justifying the demand for extra pay. In such a case the obvious inference is that the party so refusing to perform his contract is seeking to take advantage of the necessities of the other party to force from him a promise to pay a further sum for that which he is already legally entitled to receive. Surely it would be a travesty on justice to hold that the party so making the promise for extra pay was estopped from asserting that the promise was without consideration. A party cannot lay the foundation of an estoppel by his own wrong. If it be conceded that by the new promise the party obtains that which he could not compel, viz. a specific performance of the contract by the other party, still the fact remains that the one party has obtained thereby only that which he was legally entitled to receive, and the other party has done only that which he was legally bound to do. How, then, can it be said that the legal rights or obligations of the party are changed by the new promise? It is entirely competent for the parties to a contract to modify or to waive their rights under it, and ingraft new terms upon it, and in such a case the promise of one party is the consideration for that of the other; but where the promise to the one is simply a repetition of a subsisting legal promise there can be no consideration for the promise of the other party, and there is no warrant for inferring that the parties have voluntarily rescinded or modified their contract."

The court then proceed to discuss the circumstances under which a contract may be legally modified upon the consideration that unforeseen hardships to one of the contracting parties have arisen. The court conclude:

"They must be substantial, unforeseen, and not within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. They need not be such as would legally justify the party in his refusal to perform his contract, unless promised extra pay, or to justify a court of equity in relieving him from the contract; for they are sufficient if they are of such a character as to render the party's demand for extra pay manifestly fair, so as to rebut all inference that he is seeking to be relieved from an unsatisfactory contract, or to take advantage of the necessities of the opposite party to coerce from him a promise for further compensation. Inadequacy of the contract price which is the result of an error of judgment, and not of some excusable mistake of fact, is not sufficient."

There is another view, however, which to our mind is conclusive of the correctness of the judgment of the trial court. We have carefully perused the entire statement of facts, and the undisputed evidence clearly shows that the theory upon which plaintiff sought recovery is the only theory presented by the evidence. Waiving aside the testimony of plaintiff and his son, which shows that the sole consideration for the modification of the contract was the supposed export duty of 10 pesos, Guy Thompson, one of the defendants, testified that at the time defendants repudiated the contract, he believed that the duty had to be paid. He testified:

"We were all over there together, the Barredas and us, when they told us—and told the Barredas—there was a duty to be paid, and we entered into the contract under the understanding gained by all of us from the Mexican authorities that the ten pesos duty would have to be paid."

[4] Plaintiff never knew that the duty was not required until after the settlement was consummated. Whether any of the defendants knew that it would not be exacted before the negotiations to reduce the price were closed may be questioned. It is undisputed that they did not pay the duty, and that when they paid plaintiff, the cattle had reached the American side without export charges. They did not communicate this fact to the plaintiff or his son, and give as their only reason therefor that plaintiff did not specifically call for the information. The undisputed fact remains that the sole consideration for the reduction in the price was as pleaded by plaintiff and as testified by defendant Thompson, "the understanding gained by all of us from the Mexican authorities that the 10 pesos duty would have to be paid," which consideration wholly failed. The trial court, in our opinion, rendered the only judgment which the pleadings and evidence would support.

We conclude that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

PHILLIPS, O. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

INTERNATIONAL & G. N. R. CO. v.
EDMUNDSON. (No. 135-3038.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)1. Libel and slander ¶45(1)—Communication to one having corresponding interest is "privileged occasion."

When a communication is fairly made by one in the discharge of a public or private duty, legal, moral, or social, of perfect or imperfect obligation, or in the conduct of his own affairs, to one who has a corresponding interest to receive such communication, the occasion is privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Privileged Occasion.]

2. Libel and slander ¶101(4)—Burden of proof as to malice in case of privilege stated.

In an action for libel, malice may be inferred from the falsity of the charge or imputation, unless the occasion is privileged, but, if the occasion be privileged, a proper and sufficient motive is shown repelling the inference of malice and giving rise, in view thereof, to the presumption that the communication was made in good faith, whereupon it devolves upon plaintiff to establish malice in fact.

3. Libel and slander ¶51(1)—"Malice" avoiding privilege defined.

In libel the "malice" which avoids a privilege is actual or express, existing as a fact at the time of the communication, and which has inspired or colored it, and such malice exists where one casts an imputation which he does not believe to be true, and where the communication is actuated by some sinister or corrupt motive, or motives of personal spite or ill will, or where the communication is made with such gross indifference to the rights of others as will amount to a willful or wanton act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malice.]

4. Libel and slander ¶112(2)—Actual or express malice may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

In libel or slander actual or express malice need not be proven by direct or extrinsic evidence, but it may be inferred from the relation of the parties, the circumstances attending the publication, the terms of the publication itself, and from the words or acts of defendant before, at, or after the time of the communication, but it must be evidence from which the jury may infer malice existing at the time of publication and actuating it.

5. Libel and slander ¶50—Privilege not lost because belief of truth not based on reasonable grounds.

In libel or slander, if one makes a statement believing it to be true, he will not lose the protection arising from the privileged occasion merely because he had no reasonable ground for his belief.

6. Libel and slander ¶44(3)—Letter from defendant's superintendent causing plaintiff's discharge for violation of rules held privileged.

In a libel suit brought against a railroad company by a discharged baggageman in the joint service of an express company and defendant, based upon a letter to the express company by defendant's superintendent requesting his discharge because he had carried a passenger in the baggage car contrary to regulation, the letter was privileged; the superintendent in good faith believing the information upon which it was based to be true.

7. Libel and slander ¶101(4)—Evidence held insufficient to justify legal inference of malice.

In a libel suit against a railroad company brought by a discharged employé based on a letter from defendant's superintendent to plaintiff's employer, charging violation of rules, the failure of defendant's superintendent to answer plaintiff's letters of inquiry and his refusal to investigate the charges in the letter held not inconsistent with the superintendent's good faith so as to justify a legal inference of malice.

8. Constitutional law ¶105—Privilege cannot be taken away by retroactive legislation.

Where the defense of privilege in a libel suit is a vested ground of defense, it cannot be taken away by retroactive legislation, in view of Const. art. 1, § 16.

9. Constitutional law ¶105—Privilege as vested ground of defense held protected by statute.

Section 5 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, p. 4963) of the act adopting and establishing the Revised Civil Statutes providing that the repeal of any statute or any portion thereof shall not affect any act done, vested, or accrued, held to protect privilege in a libel suit as a vested ground of defense.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth
Supreme Judicial District.

Action by O. O. Edmundson against the International & Great Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed on appeal (185 S. W. 402), and the defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Wilson, Dabney & King, of Houston, and F. C. Davis and Marshall Eskridge, both of San Antonio, for plaintiff in error.

Ernest Fellbaum, Claude J. Carter, Perry J. Lewis, Champe G. Carter, Randolph L. Carter, and H. C. Carter, all of San Antonio, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. Action for libel by O. O. Edmundson, plaintiff against the International & Great Northern Railway Company, defendant.

The Pacific Express Company operated in the cars and over the railway line of defendant railway company. Plaintiff was employed by the express company as express messenger, and handled the baggage of the railway company. He was required to make report after each trip. As express messenger, he reported to the express company, and, as baggagemaster, he reported the baggage handled on the trip directly to the chief baggagemaster of defendant. While employed and paid by the express company, he performed a joint service for the express and railway companies; the railway company repaying to the express company each month the proportion of his salary representing the value of his services rendered the railway company. The contract between the two companies provided that the employees of the express company must abide by the rules of the railway company, and were not to be retained in the service if they violated such rules, or were otherwise unsatisfactory to the railway company. The railway company was to report to the express company any breach of the rules or any conduct not conducive to good discipline or prejudicial to the service.

H. Martin was the superintendent of the defendant railway company, and as such superintendent he received the following report from the George A. Fields Detective Agency of St. Louis, Mo.:

"Operative's Initials. * * * A. T. P.: At 3:30 p. m. Tuesday, July 26, 1910, I left Valley Junction for Palestine on train No. 6, trip No. 34, arriving at 7:10 a. m. Wednesday, July 26, 1910. The train consisted of one engine, one combination mail and baggage; one baggage car, No. 30, one chair car, and two Pullman cars, leaving Valley Junction No. 1. I met Jim Beard and I asked him what was doing. He said, 'How much money have you?' I pulled out a $2 bill. He said 'Get over on the other side of this baggage car [No. 30], and when we get to Palestine I will come and let you know when to get out.' The same morning the baggageman saw me, and he come to collect. He said, 'Who put you in here?' I said, 'I have already paid Jim Beard,' and he went out. At Palestine Jim Beard came and told me to stay on until the train stop at the station, and get off and walk along the side."

Acting upon this report, Martin wrote the following letter, which is the basis of this action:

"International & Great Northern Railroad Company.

"H. Martin, Superintendent.

"Palestine, Texas, Oct. 22, 1910.

"Mr. T. N. Edgell, Superintendent Pacific Express Co., Dallas, Texas—Dear Sir: Will you please relieve joint express and baggageman W. V. Buttrell from service on this line on account of carrying passenger in baggage car on train 9 July 21st, and relieve O. O. Edmundson (meaning plaintiff) from joint service on account of carrying passenger in baggage car on train No. 6 arriving Palestine July 26th.

"Please favor me with your reply.

"Yours truly,

[Signed] H. Martin."

Edgell, upon receipt of the letter, placed a copy thereof in his letter file, and transmitted the original to Beatty, route agent of the express company, upon whom devolved the duty of employing and discharging; and plaintiff was immediately dismissed from the service. Subsequently, at the request of plaintiff, Edgell sent him a copy of Martin's letter.

Plaintiff alleged that the carrying of a passenger in a baggage car was a serious breach of discipline and a serious charge against the messenger's character for honesty and fidelity to duty, being equivalent to saying that he had permitted such passenger to ride there for pay.

Martin died prior to the trial of the cause. His depositions had been taken before his death, and therein he testified that he did not, at the time of the letter to Edgell, or at any time before or after, have any ill will toward plaintiff. He had no knowledge of or acquaintance with plaintiff before the sending of the letter. The communication was made on the report received by him, which he believed to be correct. It was in good faith and with the object and for the purpose of benefiting the railroad's service. He had no ill will against the plaintiff whatever; in fact, did not know him, and to the best of his knowledge had never seen him. The letter was written because the rules of the railroad company prohibited the carrying in baggage or express cars of any one other than authorized employees. There existed between witness, as general superintendent of the railway company, and Mr. Edgell, as superintendent of the express company, a confidential business relation with reference to the employment and services rendered by plaintiff. The arrangement was that the express company employ men as joint express messengers and baggagemasters, pay them the full amount of their salaries, and bill against the railroad company each month for a certain percentage of the salaries paid. The understanding was that these men were subject to the rules and regulations of the railroad company, and were to be satisfactory to the railroad company in the manner of attending to their business and conduct, etc., while in the service on the train, and that any unsatisfactory business matters or conduct, or any other matters that were not satisfactory to good discipline or prejudicial to good service, should be reported to the express company, which had the employing of the men. The communication was intended solely for the information of Edgell as superintendent of the express company, and for no one else, save that it could be shown to plaintiff, if he desired to see it. He did not expect or authorize its contents to be communicated to any other person. The letter was written entirely upon information furnished concerning matters of service on the trains of the railway company. He believed the statements contained therein to be true; and the same was conveyed to the superintendent of the express company without any ill feeling or malice whatever toward plaintiff, simply and truly as a business publication, and without any personal feeling or ill feeling whatever.

Plaintiff testified as follows:

"The reason I was discharged was that they claimed I carried a passenger in the car. Mr. H. Martin, superintendent and general manager of the I. & G. N. made that charge against me. * * * I never carried a passenger in the car in which I was performing my duties. * * * I know H. Martin, superintendent and general manager for the receiver of the I. & G. N. His headquarters were at Palestine, Tex., and I was at that point at times; would be in Palestine every three or four days. I met Mr. Martin there personally. His attitude toward me was cool. I met Mr. Martin a few months before this letter was written. He was always cool and distant toward me. Sometimes he would recognize me, and sometimes he would not. I was discharged on November 1, 1910. I wrote to Mr. Martin twice after I was discharged, and did not receive an answer to either letter. I addressed those letters to Palestine, Tex., in Mr. Martin's official capacity, and put a stamped, self-addressed envelope in one of them. The letters I wrote to Mr. Martin never came back to me. I wrote those about ten days or two weeks after I was discharged. I went to see Mr. Martin twice to get him to investigate the charge. I went up to see him and told him the letter was false, and I would like to get him to investigate and withdraw the charge. He treated me very cool and said he couldn't do anything for me. That was all there was to it. He would not discuss it with me at all. That was the first time I went to see him. I went back again about two weeks after that, I believe it was, and saw him again and begged him to investigate the matter; asked him to investigate it; told him the charge was false that there was nothing to it. He just told me that that was all there was to it; he wouldn't have anything more to do with it. I told him I was innocent, did not know anything about it, did not carry this party, that there was a mistake somewhere, and that I would like for him to investigate the charge. He said he was through with it, didn't have any time to talk to me anything about it, and waived me out. He never at any time gave me an investigation. These were the only two times I went to Mr. Martin. I wrote him twice and received no answer to my letters. Then I went to see him twice and begged him to make an investigation on account of my innocence. He told me he would not touch the matter, would not investigate it, and waived me out. That was the end of my transactions with him. * * * I tried to straighten it up every way I knew how with Mr. Martin, and he would not give me a hearing. I had conversations with him before I went to call on him about this matter. He was then cool toward me. I don't know what kind of a man he was, but that is the way he treated me when I saw him. * * * All

Mr. Martin said was that he would not investigate; would not have anything else to do with it. * * * Beatty told me if I would go and see Mr. Martin and straighten it up he would put me back on the run. I tried to do that. I never did anything to incur the displeasure of Mr. Martin. I went to him and begged him to put me back; told him I was innocent of the charge. Asked him for an investigation, and he would not hear to me at all."

He also testified:

"Mr. Martin's manner was not cool and dignified with others altogether. As to whether or not he was a quiet and dignified man, and had little to say to anybody, I don't know, because I never had much to do with him; just at times I would see him and that is all I know of him. * * * I never had any trouble with Mr. Martin in my life."

Parrish, the detective operative, testified by deposition to the truth of the charge.

The jury, in response to special issues submitted, found the charge against plaintiff false, that Martin was actuated by malice against plaintiff in writing the letter, that by reason of the letter plaintiff was discharged, and that the letter tended to injure his reputation, exposing him to financial injury, and placed his damages at $6,000. Judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of plaintiff in the amount so found, and an appeal resulted in the affirmance of the judgment. 185 S. W. 402.

[1] When a communication is fairly made by one in the discharge of a public or private duty, legal, moral, or social, of perfect or imperfect obligation, or in the conduct of his own affairs, to one who has a corresponding interest or duty to receive such communication, the occasion is privileged. Mo. Pac. Ry. v. Richmond, 73 Tex. 568, 11 S. W. 555, 4 L. R. A. 280, 15 Am. St. Rep. 794; Toogood v. Spyring, 1 C. R. M. & R. 181; Somerville v. Hawkins, 10 C. B. 183; 18 Halsbury, Laws of England, § 1263.

[2] From the falsity of the charge or imputation, unless the occasion is privileged, malice is inferred. This inference arises from the fact that no motive other than malice appears. If the occasion is privileged, a proper and sufficient motive is shown; and thereby the inference of malice is repelled, and in lieu thereof the presumption obtains that the communication was made in good faith. It then devolves upon the plaintiff to establish, by evidence other than the falsity of the charge or imputation, that malice in fact existed. Bradstreet Co. v. Gill, 72 Tex. 115, 9 S. W. 753, 2 L. R. A. 405, 13 Am. St. Rep. 768; Lewis v. Chapman, 16 N. Y. 369; Klinck v. Colby, 46 N. Y. 427, 7 Am. Rep. 360; Denver Pub. Warehouse Co. v. Holloway, 34 Colo. 432, 83 Pac. 131, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 696, 114 Am. St. Rep. 171, 7 Ann. Cas. 840.

[3] The malice which avoids the privilege is actual or express malice, existing as a fact at the time of the communication, and which inspired or colored it. Such malice exists where one casts an imputation which he does not believe to be true, or where the communication is actuated by some sinister or corrupt motive or motives of personal spite or ill will or where the communication is made with such gross indifference to the rights of others as will amount to a willful or wanton act. Bradstreet Co. v. Gill, supra; Jackson v. Hopperton, 16 C. B. (N. S.) 829; 18 Halsbury, Laws of England, § 1316.

[4] Actual or express malice need not be proven by direct or extrinsic evidence. It may be inferred from the relation of the parties, the circumstances attending the publication, the terms of the publication itself, and from the words or acts of the defendant before, at, or after the time of the communication; but it must be evidence from which the jury may infer malice existing at the time of publication and actuating it. Gassett v. Gilbert, 6 Gray (Mass.) 94; Jackson v. Hopperton, supra; 18 Halsbury, Laws of England, §§ 1304 and 1316.

[5] If one makes a statement, believing it to be true, he will not lose the protection arising from the privileged occasion, although he had no reasonable ground for his belief. 5 Labatt's Master & Servant, 6386; Hemmens v. Nelson, 138 N. Y. 517, 34 N. E. 342, 20 L. R. A. 440; Clark v. Molynoux, L. R. 3 Q. B. Div. (C. A.) 237; Harris v. Thompson, 13 C. B. 333; Jenoure v. Delmege, [1891] A. C. 73.

In the last-cited case Lord Macnaghten observes:

"The privilege would be worth very little if a person making a communication on a privileged occasion were to be required, in the first place, and as a condition of immunity, to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statement to be true. In such a case bona fides is always to be presumed."

[6] Martin's letter was clearly a privileged occasion. The communication was made by him, as superintendent of defendant, in reference to a matter in which he as superintendent was interested, to Edgell, as superintendent of the express company, who had a corresponding interest to receive the same. Martin had a right, and was under obligation, to give the information to Edgell. The evidence is undisputed that Martin believed the information true. While the charge was made without an investigation, and in reliance upon a report made by a detective agency, it is not shown that Martin at the date of the publication had any reason to doubt the correctness of the report.

Applying the language of the court in Hemmens v. Nelson, supra, to the present case, the question is not whether the charge was true or false, nor whether Martin had sufficient cause to believe that plaintiff did carry the passenger, or whether Martin acted hastily or through mistake, but the question is, the occasion being privileged, whether there is evidence for the jury that Martin knew or believed it to be false. Martin may have arrived at conclusions without sufficient evidence, but the privilege protects him and the defendant from liability on that ground until the plaintiff has overcome the presumption of good faith by proof of a malicious purpose to defame him under cover of the privilege.

Martin's letter clearly and succinctly stated the cause of the request for plaintiff's dismissal from the service:

"Relieve O. O. Edmundson from joint service on account of carrying passenger in baggage car No. 6 arriving Palestine July 26th."

The language of the letter does not warrant the construction that plaintiff received pay from the person permitted to ride in the car. The report of the detective agency upon which the letter was based clearly negated such charge. The carrying of a passenger in a baggage or express car was the violation of a rule of the railway company. It is manifest from all the evidence, including that of plaintiff, that the rule was of importance, and the charge of its breach a serious charge. The collection of some insignificant sum for passage appears to have been the least consideration in the promulgation and enforcement of the rule. The rule is predicated upon the fact that many very valuable packages are transported in express cars, and it is dangerous to life and property for a messenger to permit an unauthorized person to ride therein.

At the date of the publication of the letter the act of March 20, 1909 (Laws 1909, c. 89) amending the act of April 5, 1907 (Laws 1907, c. 67), known as the "black-listing statute," had been passed, and had not then, though it has since, been declared unconstitutional. Under its provisions, certain corporations, including railroad and express corporations, were required, under heavy penalties, upon request of a discharged employé, to give a written statement of the cause of his discharge; so that the statement of the cause for the request of plaintiff's dismissal was to enable the express company to comply with a supposedly valid act then in force, as well as in virtue of the agreement between the companies. The communication does not contain intrinsic evidence of malice, stating only what was reasonably necessary and proper in conveying the information; in other words, the privilege was not exceeded by the style or language of the communication.

While plaintiff testified that he had met Martin prior to the publication, it is evident that the acquaintanceship was most casual.

He knew nothing about Martin; had had no dealings with him; there had been no trouble of any character between them. Martin had no recollection of ever having met plaintiff. He testified unequivocally that he had no ill will or malice against plaintiff before or at the date of the publication, or subsequent thereto. Plaintiff and Martin were to all intents and purposes strangers one to other, and the testimony of plaintiff that Martin treated him coolly on meeting him, standing alone, has no evidential value. From an examination of the record, we are convinced that there is no evidence of actual malice in the conduct of Martin toward plaintiff prior to or at the time of the publication.

Edgell, upon receipt of the letter, placed a copy in his file, and forwarded the original to Beatty to effectuate the discharge of plaintiff; and Beatty, upon request of plaintiff, gave him a copy. This, under the evidence, was the extent of the publication. The letter was a confidential business communication, having in view the interest of the companies and that of the public, through competent and reliable service, and was so treated by Martin and the officers of the express company. It is clear that Martin used only the ordinary and reasonable means of giving effect to the privilege; there being no excessive publication of the information, and nothing in the conduct of Martin or the express company officials evidencing an abuse of the occasion by undue publication of the charge.

In Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Richmond, supra, the railroad company was sought to be held for libel in the publication of a pamphlet by one of its officers containing a list of the men discharged and the cause of their discharge. The following passage from the opinion is applicable herein:

"There can be no pretense that the officer of the company who caused the pamphlet to be published was actuated by ill will toward or desired to injure appellee, who was a stranger to him. The evidence of that officer, uncontradicted, was in substance that he had the pamphlet published; that it was not issued with any bad feeling or malice toward plaintiff or for the purpose of injuring him or any one else; that the book was gotten up for personal convenience and private information of the officers of the company only, in order that they might protect the lives and property of the public and also the interests of the defendant by securing to the company only good, careful, and reliable men. That he did not know plaintiff; that there were about 24,000 persons in the employ of defendant at the time the pamphlet was printed; that it was necessary to have this discharge list in order to guard against re-employing men who had proved themselves incompetent or untrustworthy; that he printed about 100 copies of the book and sent them to officers of the company only, and if one ever got outside of keeping of proper officers it must have been surreptitiously obtained."

[7] The occasion being privileged, the presumption of good faith obtained. The onus was on plaintiff to overcome this presumption. There was, as we have seen, no intrinsic evidence of malice in the publication, nor any extrinsic evidence of malice on the part of Martin prior to or at the time of the publication. The conduct of Martin in failing to answer plaintiff's letters, and his refusal to investigate, is not inconsistent with bona fides. Harris v. Thompson, 13 C. B. 333. This subsequent conduct is the only evidence of express malice. The conduct may be regarded as a circumstance to show the existence of malice subsequent to the date of publication, and it may raise a surmise or suspicion of malice at the date of publication. It does not, however, carry with it that degree of probative force necessary to form the basis of a legal inference of the existence of malice at the time of publication, and falls short in legal contemplation of "any evidence" that Martin, in the publication, was actuated by malice.

We conclude that the evidence was not sufficient to raise the issue of actual malice existing at the date of the publication. Joske v. Irvine, 91 Tex. 574, 44 S. W. 1059.

The occasion being privileged, and there being no evidence of actual malice, it follows that the peremptory instruction in its favor requested by defendant should have been given, unless, as contended by plaintiff, the statutes pertaining to libel as codified in 1911, in force at the date of the trial, permitted a recovery upon proof of the falsity of the charge, without reference to malice.

The act of 1901 (Acts 27th Leg. c. 26) clearly defined actionable libel. It was a broad and comprehensive enactment, intended to cover the subject in its entirety, and materially modifying and changing the common-law doctrine theretofore recognized and enforced in this state. Gulsti v. Galveston Tribune, 105 Tex. 497, 150 S. W. 874, 152 S. W. 187.

Section 3 of the act declared the publication of certain matters by newspapers or periodicals privileged. The act made no other or further provision for privileged communications. Section 4 of the act reads as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or repeal any penal law on the subject of libel, nor to take away any existing defense to a civil action for libel, nor shall this act affect any suits now pending, or that may hereafter be brought upon a cause of action arising prior to the taking effect of this act."

In the codification of 1911 all of section 4 hereinabove quoted, was omitted, except the provision with reference to amending or repealing any penal law on the subject of libel. Article 5598, R. S. 1911. In 1917 (Laws 1917, c. 206 [Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 5598, 5598a]) article 5598 was amended so as to expressly preserve any theretofore existing defense to a civil action for libel, either at common law or otherwise.

That the occasion was privileged was an existing defense to a civil action of libel, and as such was preserved under the act of 1901, and by the subsequently amended article 5598. The effect of the omission by the codifiers upon this defense, where the publication was subsequent to the adoption of the Revised Civil Statutes, and prior to the amendment of article 5598, need not be considered herein.

The publication which was the basis of this action was made subsequent to the passage of the act of 1901, and prior to the adoption of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1911, though suit was filed and trial had after the adoption of the Revised Civil Statutes, and before the amendment to article 5598. Construing the omission as a repeal of the omitted part of section 4 of the act of 1901, such repeal could have no effect upon the defense of privileged occasion in this action. Section 16, art. 1, of our Constitution provides that "no * * * retroactive law * * * shall be made." This provision of the Constitution, as stated in Mellinger v. City of Houston, 68 Tex. 37, 8 S. W. 253—

"must be held to protect every right, even though not strictly a right to property, which may accrue under existing laws prior to the passage of any act which, if permitted a retroactive effect, would take away the right. * * * It must necessarily be held that a right, in a legal sense, exists, when in consequence of given facts the law declares that one person is entitled to enforce against another a claim, or to resist the enforcement of a claim urged by another."

[8] At the date of the omission by the codifiers, the defense of privilege was a vested ground of defense. A right of defense, not technical, but substantial, resulting in immunity from liability, which has fully vested, is as sacred and as important as a right of action, and is protected from any retroactive legislation in like manner as a vested right of action. 12 C. J. 973.

[9] Aside from this, we are of opinion that section 5 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, p. 4863) of the act adopting and establishing the Revised Civil Statutes protects the defense herein; that section providing in part as follows:

"That the repeal of any statute, or any portion thereof, by the preceding section, shall not affect or impair any act done, or right vested or accrued, * * * but every such act done, or right vested or accrued, * * * shall remain in full force and effect."

We are of opinion that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and judgment here rendered for the plaintiff in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

PANHANDLE & S. F. RY. CO. v. BROOKS (No. 167-3168.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Master and servant \Rightarrow 100(1)—Contract requiring notice of injury void under federal act.

Federal Employers' Liability Act, § 5 (U. S. Comp. St. § 8661), making void any contract to exempt a common carrier from liability for injury to employees imposed by section 1 of the act (section 8657), makes void a contract by interstate railroad employé to give notice of injury and claim for damages within 30 days or his right to recover therefor would be barred.

2. Master and servant \Rightarrow 258(21)—Allegation that foreman directed work with insufficient force held not subject to exception.

An allegation that railroad employes, including plaintiff, protested to the foreman and the company against handling timbers with an insufficient force, but the foreman refused to furnish more men and directed the work to be done under his eye, thereby assuring the men that they could perform the work with safety, is not subject to an exception as stating no ground of negligence nor excuse for proceeding to move the timber with knowledge of insufficient number of men.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by B. F. Brooks against the Panhandle & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by Court of Civil Appeals (199 S. W. 665), and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, and Madden, Trulove, Ryburn & Pipkin, of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error.

L. C. Barrett and J. N. Browning, both of Amarillo, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. B. F. Brooks filed this suit in the district court of Potter county to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received while he was employed in interstate commerce by plaintiff in error. He alleged that the injuries were caused by the negligence of the railway company.

The defendant company, among other pleas in bar, alleged that Brooks' employment was by virtue of a written contract; that he therein obligated himself to give notice in writing of any injuries and claim for damages to the company, within 30 days from the time the injuries were received; that, if he failed so to do, his cause of action should be barred; that this contract was valid and reasonable; and that he wholly failed to comply with its requirements.

To this plea plaintiff interposed an exception, because it presented no defense, in that it was invalid and prohibited by law.

This exception was sustained by the district court. The trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appealed, assigning among other errors that of sustaining the special exception to this plea. The Court of Civil Appeals resolved the assignment on this question as well as all other assignments against appellant. 199 S. W. 865.

The cause is before us upon the error assigned to the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals sustaining the trial court in its ruling upon this question. For the purposes of this discussion, it must be assumed that the facts alleged in the answer are true. It remains only to determine whether under proper construction of the contract this provision is unreasonable, inapplicable, and invalid under the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657-8665).

There are other assignments presenting other questions arising on the pleading and evidence, but the prime question is that affecting the plea in bar.

Opinion.

[1] The Court of Civil Appeals held that the contract pleaded by the defendant in bar of plaintiff's suit is inhibited by the federal Employers' Liability Act, and is void. Apparently this presents a question of first impression in the American courts of last resort, except in one case decided by the Supreme Court of Arkansas.

Section 1 of the act (article 8657, U. S. Compiled Statutes) provides:

"Every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states * * * shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce * * * for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier," etc.

Section 5 (article 8661, U. S. Compiled Statutes) provides:

"Any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void."

As we construe this statute, the liability of the railway company, in event of negligent injury, arises as at common law, and is governed by the same principle, save and except in so far as it prohibits a limitation upon liability by contract, rule, regulation, or device, and except in so far as the common law may be abrogated by the act. Seaboard Air Line v. Horton, 238 U. S. 492, 34 Sup. Ct. 635, 58 L. Ed. 1062, L. R. A. 1915C, 1, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 475, and cases cited supra.

It may be as well to state here as elsewhere that we have not been cited to any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, or any inferior federal court, construing the act as to its effect upon a contract such as is here before us. The only American case cited is C. & R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Pearce, 118 Ark. 6, 175 S. W. 1160, L. R. A. 1915F, 551, by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, handed down March 29, 1915. So far as our inquiry has disclosed, this is the only case extant in which the question has been decided. We are advised that the Supreme Court of the United States has had no opportunity to review that decision. The Arkansas court holds that a contract like that here presented is void under the federal Employers' Liability Act. This holding is based upon a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in El Paso & N. E. Ry. Co. v. Gutierrez, 215 U. S. 87, 30 Sup. Ct. 21, 54 L. Ed. 106.

In consonance with the indicated purpose of the Supreme Court to follow the construction which has been adopted by our state courts with reference to our state statutes on the same subject, and in the absence of authoritative expression by the Supreme Court of the United States, we approve the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals with reference to the construction to be given to the federal Employers' Liability Act and its effect in rendering void that clause of the contract sought to be interposed as a defense by the railway company. Ry. Co. v. Hudgins, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 344, 127 S. W. 1183; Ry. Co. v. Harris, 67 Tex. 166, 2 S. W. 574.

There are assignments in the petition seeking review of the disposition by the Court of Civil Appeals of questions raised with reference to the pleading of the plaintiff and to the admission of evidence in support thereof. It appears from the several assignments that the plaintiff alleged:

"That said servants, including plaintiff, protested to said foreman and defendant, through its agents and servants against lifting and carrying said timbers and handling the same as they were being handled without a sufficient number of men, but defendant then and there ignored said protest and refused to furnish more men, but had plaintiff and said three other servants to perform said work under the eye and direction of said foreman, thereby assuring them that they could perform such labor with safety to themselves, by reason of which the master assumed the risk instead of the plaintiff assuming the same."

[2] The defendant excepted to this part of the petition, because it stated no ground of negligence nor any excuse for the act of plaintiff in proceeding to move the timber with the knowledge of an insufficient number of men. The exception was overruled. Testimony was offered, over objection of the defendant, in line with the pleading wherein it appears that George L. Noel, one of plaintiff's collaborators, did so protest to the foreman before proceeding with the work in which plaintiff was injured. We do not think that these assignments merit discussion.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

EARTHART et al. v. AGNEW. (No. 130-3019.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances ¶57(5)—Solvent husband had right to transfer notes to wife.

A husband who was solvent when he transferred to his wife part of notes received in payment for their land claimed as a homestead had the right to do with his property as he saw fit, even to giving it to strangers, and had the right to give his wife half the proceeds of the community property sold by them by joint deed, which she demanded and received as a condition to signing.

2. Evidence ¶248(6)—Statement of husband in derogation of title of wife to notes received for community land could not affect her rights.

No statement of a husband, verbal or written, in derogation of title of his wife to part of the notes received by him on sale of their community land claimed as a homestead, made after the transfer to the buyer, could affect the rights of the wife in the notes received by her.

3. Husband and wife ¶149(1)—Wife's property not liable for husband's debts.

A wife's property, consisting of part of the notes received by her and her husband on sale of their community land, having been delivered to the wife by the husband as a condition of her joining in the deed, were not liable for the debts of the husband.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. W. Agnew against S. M. Earhart, with the Lubbock State Bank as garnishee, in which Mrs. S. M. Earhart intervened and claimed the fund impounded by the garnishment proceeding. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant and intervener appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (190 S. W. 1140), and defendant and the intervener bring error. Judgment of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment rendered for the intervener on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

R. A. Sowder, of Lubbock, for plaintiffs in error.

W. F. Schenk and Roscoe Wilson, both of Lubbock, for defendant in error.

Statement of the Case.

KITTRELL, J. This was an action in the form of a garnishment against the Lubbock State Bank procured for the purpose of reaching certain funds claimed to be the property of T. O. Earhart, husband of the plaintiff in error.

The number of the case on the docket of the district court of Lubbock county was 906, and it was ancillary to a case filed by Agnew, defendant in error, No. 881, in the same court against T. O. Earhart.

The basis of the action in No. 881 was a certain bond executed by one B. F. Montgomery on October 15, 1909, to Agnew to protect him against outstanding vendors lien notes against certain land which Agnew had bought of Montgomery. T. O. Earhart and one Richmond were sureties on the bond, which was for the sum of $6,000, or double the amount of the notes.

It appears from the testimony of Agnew that he did not know that Earhart was on the bond until about two years after it was made, but supposed it was his brother, the bond having been prepared by Agnew's attorney, and he never saw it for about two years, and he had never made any demand on Earhart on account of it.

On June 24, 1913, the holders of the Montgomery notes recovered judgment, and the land was sold.

Some time prior to December 28, 1914, Agnew brought suit on the Montgomery bond against Montgomery, Earhart, and Richmond, but before judgment dismissed as against Richmond without reservation, but as to Earhart he dismissed without prejudice to maintain action at some future time. He took judgment against Montgomery alone for $3,500.

No further action appears to have been taken against Earhart by Agnew until suit No. 881 was filed.

Earhart testified that he had never been called upon to pay the bond, and supposed the notes had been paid. He never agreed to their extension, and that the suit (the one first filed out of which he was dismissed, we construe his language to mean) was the only demand ever made on him.

Testimony to be later set forth makes an understanding of these facts helpful, if not necessary.

The bank answered "that according to the books of said bank it is now, and was at the time said writ of garnishment was served upon it, as shown by the deposit account, indebted to said T. O. Earhart in the sum of $1,205.20," and further stated as a part of its answer that it was "not acquainted with the title to the above said amount of money further than the same was collected upon the note and placed to the credit of said T. O. Earhart, the business having been transacted with him by letter."

S. M. Earhart, wife of T. O. Earhart, and plaintiff in error here, intervened in the action and claimed the money upon grounds that a further statement of the facts will reveal. She and her husband had owned and lived on 640 acres of land with their five children for about eight years. The land lay about 10 miles north of the town of Lubbock. They settled on it in 1901, and in 1909 they moved to Lubbock for the purpose of educating their children. Both testified very positively that up to the time they sold the land they cherished the purpose and intention of returning to it, and that they claimed no other place as their homestead.

The husband testified:

"We bought a house in Lubbock to live in while schooling our children, but sold it prior to the selling of our land."

Deeds were offered in evidence to prove this statement to have been true.

His wife testified:

"My son owned the lots at the time section 22, block D2, was sold to A. Symes. When we moved to Lubbock about three years prior to the sale of the land we owned the lots. My husband was being sued in Lubbock county, and he deeded those lots to my son Earnest."

The son testified that he owned them at the time of the trial.

Deeds offered in evidence showed that on September 19, 1910, T. O. Earhart, without being joined by his wife, conveyed the town lots to his son W. E. Earhart, and that the latter, on August 16, 1912, more than a year after the sale of the country place to Symes, conveyed the lots to his mother.

On January 28, 1910, Earhart gave a mortgage on the north 440 acres of the 640-acre tract for $2,000, and in that instrument especially designated the south 200 acres, the improved part (which was shown to be worth more than the other 440 acres), as his homestead. This was after the family had moved to Lubbock and acquired the city lots on which they lived while there.

On June 16, 1911, Earhart and wife sold the 640 acres to A. Symes for $6,720. $1,400 was paid in cash, and the purchaser assumed the $2,000 mortgage, and three notes for $1,106 each were executed and made payable to T. O. Earhart in one, two, and three years. Earhart used the $1,400 cash to pay debts, or a debt, so far as the same was necessary.

The jury found in response to a special issue that Mrs. Earhart signed the deed on condition that she should have the value of the south 200 acres (the improved part). It was proved, not only by his own testimony, but by the cashier of the bank, who identified the handwriting of the attorney who wrote the transfer, and by the attorney himself, that the three notes were, pursuant to agreement, by Earhart transferred on the day they were made to his wife as the value of her half of the property. It seems that the parties by reason of some domestic infelicity (suggested rather than clearly revealed by the record) divided their property. The notes were carried to the bank by Earnest Earhart for his mother, and as they fell due they were collected by the bank. Earhart and wife had moved to California, but were not living together after their removal. The last of the three notes fell due January 1, 1915, but was paid December 26, 1914, and it is the proceeds of that note which are the subject of controversy in this action.

The cashier of the bank testified that the proceeds of the first note due January 1, 1913, were by Earhart's direction applied, so far as was necessary, to pay certain indebtedness that Earhart and his sons owed the bank; but he could not recall what became of the rest of the proceeds.

Mrs. Earhart testified that she got the proceeds of that note and bought the land she lived on in California. When the second note fell due, the proceeds, upon written direction to the bank, were sent to her in California, and when the third note was ready to be paid a release was sent to California for T. O. Earhart to sign, and he executed it. It contained the usual recitals that he was the owner and holder of the notes.

The cashier testified that the notes had never been out of the bank since they had been put there, and that the indorsement on them was there all the time. This statement seems to have been elicited by reason of an effort made to prove that the indorsement and transfer was an afterthought, and was not coincident with the execution of the notes.

Opinion.

It is obvious from the foregoing somewhat extended summary of the evidence that there is substantially but one question to be determined, and that is: In view of all the facts and circumstances in evidence and the finding of the jury on the special issues, were the proceeds of the note subject to garnishment as the property of T. O. Earhart?

We will only consider the first assignment of error contained in the application, namely:

"The court erred in not granting a motion for judgment on the special answer and verdict of the jury as is shown by her bill of exception No. 1 of this record."

The only other assignment of error brought up in the application (the ninth) is not in compliance with the rules, being too general and vague to authorize consideration.

Plaintiff rested her contention on two grounds: First, that the proceeds of the note were part of the purchase money of her homestead; second, that regardless of the homestead question her husband was solvent when he transferred the notes to her, hence by such transfer they became her property and were not liable for his debts.

The jury found: First, that at the time Earhart and wife moved off of the south 200 acres of the section, and acquired, and moved on, a place in the town of Lubbock in the year 1909, they did not intend to return and occupy said section as a homestead; second, that all of section 22 was abandoned with the intention never to return and live thereon at the time they moved off, and that they abandoned the 200 acres as a home prior to their sale to Symes; third, that the transfer of the note from T. O. Earhart to his wife was not a gift; fourth, that Mrs. Earhart signed the deed to Symes upon the condition that she was to have the value of the 200 acres out of the south one-half of section 22, block D2; fifth, that T. O. Earhart was solvent when he delivered the notes to his wife.

Speaking for himself and not intending to be understood as speaking for the other members of the court the writer feels constrained to say that a most careful and painstaking analysis of the statement of facts has led him to the conclusion that, when the law on the question of abandonment of a homestead as laid down in Shepherd v. Cassiday, 20 Tex. 25, 70 Am. Dec. 372, Gouhenant v. Cockrell, 20 Tex. 96, Thomas v. Williams, 50 Tex. 275, Sanders v. Sheran, 66 Tex. 657, 2 S. W. 804, Armstrong v. Neville (Civ. App.) 117 S. W. 1012, Robinson v. McGuire (Civ. App.) 203 S. W. 415, and many other cases is applied to the undisputed testimony, the finding of the jury is shown not only to be against the great preponderance of the evidence, but absolutely without evidence to support it.

However, as consideration of the homestead question is not necessary to a proper decision of the case, we pretermitt any further reference thereto.

The fact is apparent that plaintiff in error was asserting a homestead right in the south 200 acres and improvements, and refused to sign the deed to Symes until she was assured that the notes representing part of the proceeds, equivalent to the value of the 200 acres, would be delivered to her as her property. Such condition and demand was complied with, and, pursuant to the contract so made, the notes made payable to her husband were by him forthwith assigned and delivered to her, and were by or for her placed in the garnishee bank.

[1] The jury found that Earhart was solvent when he transferred the notes to his wife. Being solvent he had the right to do with his property as he saw fit, even to giving it to strangers. Reynolds v. Lansford, 16 Tex. 286; Higgins v. Johnson's Heirs, 20 Tex. 395, 70 Am. Dec. 394; Story v. Marshall, 24 Tex. 305, 76 Am. Dec. 106; Morrison v. Clark, 55 Tex. 437; Terry v. O'Neal, 71 Tex. 592, 9 S. W. 673; McCutchen v. Purinton, 84 Tex. 604, 19 S. W. 710; Willis v. McIntyre, 70 Tex. 34, 7 S. W. 594, 8 Am. St. Rep. 574. He certainly had the right to give to his wife one-half of the proceeds of community property sold by them by joint deed, and which was claimed by both to be their homestead, and half of the proceeds of which the wife demanded and received as a condition precedent to her signing the deed.

[2] Evidently much stress was laid by the Court of Civil Appeals upon the fact that Earhart executed a release reciting that he was the legal and equitable holder and owner of the notes, but it is elementary that no statement of Earhart, whether verbal or written, in derogation of the title of his wife to the notes, made after the transfer, could affect her rights.

[3] When the notes were delivered to Mrs. Earhart and were by her or by her son as her agent placed in the bank for collection, they were her property, and in contemplation of law were in her possession, and the finding of the jury in response to a special issue which was wholly irrelevant and immaterial, that they were not in her possession, was manifestly erroneous. Being her property, they were, of course, not liable for the debts of her husband, and therefore the judgment of both the district court and Court of Civil Appeals was erroneous, and should be reversed, and judgment rendered here for the plaintiff in error, and it is so recommended.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

BERRY v. GODWIN et al. (No. 137-3048.)

W. R. Bishop and J. J. Faulk, both of Athens, for defendants in error.

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)1. Homestead §173—Not abandoned by merely filing partition suit.

The mere filing, by a widower, of suit to partition homestead, which was not prosecuted but abandoned and suit changed to one of trespass to try title claiming all the land, did not constitute a waiver or abandonment of homestead rights set up in reply to the answer of defendants claiming title to part of the land.

2. Homestead §181(3)—That plaintiff's children were not living with him when suit was filed did not show abandonment.

Under Const. art. 16, § 52, the fact that plaintiff's children were not living with him when suit was filed was not conclusive that he had abandoned his homestead; nor would it follow, from that fact alone, that he was not entitled to assert a homestead right in the land.

3. Depositions §91—Competency of deposition depends on status when offered as evidence and not when taken.

Where, at the time of trial, plaintiff's conviction of murder had been affirmed and motion for rehearing overruled, his deposition, taken previously, was properly quashed; the competency of his answers to the interrogatories propounded to him depending, not upon his status at the time such answers were given, but upon his status when the deposition was offered as evidence.

4. Deeds §194(5) — Recording raises presumption of delivery.

Where a duly executed and acknowledged deed had been on record for about 30 years, it was presumptively delivered.

5. Partition §95—Should make provision for possession of party as homestead.

Where party to partition suit establishes his homestead right in the land, the partition, if granted, should be decreed subject to his right to possession as long as he elects to use or occupy the land as a home.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Thomas Berry against Kirby Godwin and others. Judgment for defendants was reformed and affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (188 S. W. 30), and plaintiff brings error. On the recommendation of the Commission of Appeals, judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed and cause remanded.

E. P. Miller, of Athens, and R. S. Neblett and Ormond Simkins, both of Corsicana, for plaintiff in error.

TAYLOR, J. This suit was an action in trespass to try title by Thomas Berry against Perry Dethridge, his son-in-law, and Bertha Godwin, his granddaughter (her husband, Kirby Godwin, being joined with her pro forma) to recover 218 acres of land in Henderson county.

The suit as filed by Berry originally was for partition against the defendants named, he alleging that Bertha Godwin owned an undivided interest of about 20 acres, that Perry Dethridge owned an undivided interest of about 10 acres, and that he (Berry) owned the remaining interest. By amendment Berry changed his suit from an action to partition the land to an action in trespass to try title, as stated above, in which he sought recovery of the entire tract.

The amended petition contained, in addition to the usual allegations in trespass to try title suits, affirmative pleas of title acquired under the three, five, and ten year statutes of limitations.

Defendants answered, pleading among other things "not guilty"; also, that Bertha Godwin owned an undivided interest of $\frac{2}{24}$; Perry Dethridge an undivided interest of $\frac{4}{24}$; and Berry an undivided interest of $\frac{11}{24}$ in the land. The defendants prayed that their respective interests be established and the land partitioned.

By supplemental petition Berry denied the allegations of the answer, pleaded his homestead right, and further that the homestead was not subject to partition, because of his right to use and occupy it.

On October 1, 1884, Berry owned as a part of his separate property the land in controversy. On that date he executed a deed reciting conveyance to his wife, Thursday Berry, of 200 acres off of the north end of the tract on which he then resided, in consideration of $500 paid out "of her separate estate." The deed was acknowledged before the county judge of Kaufman county October 22, 1885, and a week later was duly recorded. Thursday Berry died in 1888 while she and her husband were using and occupying the land conveyed, as their homestead.

Mrs. Berry left surviving her, her husband and three children, Allen, Pearl, and Johnnie. Plaintiff, prior to the filing of this suit, acquired the interest of Pearl. Allen married. He and his wife died, leaving surviving them their only child, Bertha, one of the defendants. Johnnie married Perry Dethridge, another defendant. Two children were born to them, neither of which survived the death of the mother.

Berry, about a year after the death of his first wife, married again. His second wife died prior to the filing of this suit, and three children of the second marriage, all minors, were living at the time suit was filed. Berry continued to reside on the homestead after the death of his second wife. Some time after her death, he moved (about 1905) to San Antonio and remained there about a year, renting out the premises during his absence. After returning from San Antonio, he continued to live on the land in controversy, until 1913, when he went to Athens, Tex., again renting it out.

A short time prior to filing this suit, Berry was convicted of the offense of murder, and sentenced to serve ten years in the state penitentiary. Pending an appeal from the judgment under which he was sentenced, plaintiff's deposition in this case was taken at his own instance, by which he sought to establish, among other things, that the deed executed by him to his first wife was never delivered. One week after the deposition was taken the judgment of conviction was affirmed. Subsequent to the affirmation, and after a motion for rehearing filed in the Court of Criminal Appeals had been overruled, and after Berry had begun serving his term in the penitentiary, this case came on for trial. On motion of defendants, Berry's deposition was quashed on the ground of his being under felony sentence, as above stated.

The jury, acting under peremptory instruction of the court, found that the parties owned undivided interests in the land sued for by Berry, as follows: Berry, $\frac{11}{24}$; Bertha Godwin, $\frac{9}{24}$; and Perry Dethridge, $\frac{4}{24}$. Judgment was rendered accordingly, and commissioners were appointed to partition the land.

The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment under the view that plaintiff in filing suit for partition, in effect, abandoned his homestead, and thereby waived his claim to its exemption. As it appeared from the evidence that the entire tract of 213 acres was a part of Berry's separate estate prior to a conveyance of the 200 acres of land to his wife, the court so reformed the judgment as to adjudge a recovery by Berry of the 13 acres not included in the conveyance, and decree a partition among him and the defendants of the 200 acres. 188 S. W. 80.

[1] The application for the writ of error contains three assignments of error, in substance as follows:

(1) That the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding that plaintiff in error waived his homestead exemption by filing his suit first in the form of a suit to partition.

(2) That the Court of Civil Appeals erred in sustaining the action of the trial court in quashing plaintiff in error's deposition.

(3) That the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding that the deed executed by plaintiff in error to his wife, Thursday Berry, was ever delivered.

The Committee of Judges in granting the writ made the following notation:

"We are inclined to think that the mere filing by plaintiff in error of his petition for partition, which was not prosecuted but abandoned and suit changed to one of trespass to try title claiming all the land, did not constitute a waiver or abandonment of homestead rights set up in reply to the answer of defendants in error claiming title to a part of the land, which included the homestead, asking partition thereof. The case is unlike Moore v. Moore, 89 Tex. 29, in that in the latter case the suit as begun for partition of the homestead was prosecuted by plaintiffs to final determination."

We concur in the view expressed in the notation. In Hoefling v. Hoefling, 106 Tex. 357, 167 S. W. 210, it is pointed out that there was neither pleading nor evidence of homestead in the Moore Case, supra, and that in view of this the court held there was a waiver of such claim.

This case was tried upon a pleading filed subsequent to the partition petition, specifically setting up plaintiff in error's claim of homestead. The original petition (the petition in the partition suit) having been subsequently amended by plaintiff in error, as stated above, the Court of Civil Appeals erred in holding that in filing it he thereby, as a matter of law, abandoned his homestead, or waived his right thereto.

[2] Defendants in error urged, in addition to a waiver of homestead right by plaintiff in error in filing the suit to partition, that he was not in position as head of a household to assert a homestead right, in that his minor children were not living with him.

It is uncontradicted that 200 acres of the land sued for was plaintiff in error's homestead at the time of the death of his second wife. There is evidence that his children were not living with him when suit was filed; but this fact, if established, is not conclusive that he had abandoned his homestead, nor would it follow from that fact alone that he was not entitled to assert a homestead right in the land. Const. art. 16, § 52; Ball Hutchings & Co. v. Lowell, 56 Tex. 579; Eubank & Co. et al. v. Landram, 59 Tex. 247; Brown et al. v. Reed et al., 20 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 48 S. W. 537.

The issue of whether the 200 acres of land was the homestead of plaintiff was one of fact and should have been submitted to the jury.

[3] The second assignment questions the correctness of the trial court's action in quashing plaintiff in error's deposition. The purpose of the deposition was to establish that the deed executed by plaintiff in error to Thursday Berry, his wife, was never delivered. Unless delivered, the property in controversy was his separate property, and defendants in error were without interest therein. The question presented is therefore one of substantive law.

The answers to the interrogatories propounded to plaintiff in error were not evidence at the time they were given. Their competency as such could not, under the facts, be tested by what his status then was, but was properly tested by what his status was when the deposition was offered as evidence. At that time he had not only been convicted and sentenced, but judgment had been affirmed and his motion for rehearing overruled. In fact, he was then incarcerated in the penitentiary in virtue of a final judgment of conviction and sentence duly entered and pronounced. The Court of Civil Appeals held correctly that the deposition should have been quashed. Webster v. Mann, 56 Tex. 119, 42 Am. Rep. 688; Tillman v. Fletcher, 73 Tex. 673, 15 S. W. 161; Rogers v. Tompkins, 87 S. W. 379.

The case of G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Johnson, 98 Tex. 76, 81 S. W. 4, cited by plaintiff in error, is not in point. The question decided in that case related to the sufficiency of the record introduced to establish the incompetency of the witness; the court holding that it was necessary for the record to show, not only that he was convicted, but also that he was sentenced.

[4] The question presented by the third assignment is whether the deed executed by plaintiff in error to his wife was delivered.

The evidence is uncontradicted that it was executed, acknowledged, and duly recorded, and that at the time of the trial it had been on record for about 30 years. It was presumptively delivered. There being no evidence in the record that the deed was not delivered, the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals did not err in giving it effect as a valid conveyance.

[5] Plaintiff in error does not contest the right of defendants in error to have a partition of 200 acres of the land sued for, in the event their respective interests therein are established upon another trial; but correctly insists that, in the event of a finding in his favor upon the homestead issue, the partition, if granted, should be decreed subject to his right to possession as long as he elects to use or occupy the land in controversy as a home. Hudgins v. Sansom, 72 Tex. 229, 10 S. W. 104.

We recommend that the judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for further trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the questions discussed.

CRITESER et ux. v. GAFFEY.
(No. 161-3152.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 331—Foreign decree for alimony not entitled to full faith and credit even as to alimony already due.

As the Oregon Supreme Court has construed the state statutes as clothing the court rendering judgment for alimony with power to set aside as well as to alter or modify a provision for permanent alimony or allowance, as the exigencies of the case may require, and where an allowance is made for support and maintenance, the decree of annulment may be made to operate retrospectively, a judgment for alimony granted by the circuit court of Oregon for support and maintenance is not, as to installments already accrued, entitled to be given effect under the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution (article 4, § 1).

2. Divorce \Leftrightarrow 331—Foreign judgment for alimony subject to modification not entitled to full faith and credit.

Where the right to installments of alimony becomes absolute and vested upon becoming due, the judgment providing therefor is protected by the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution (article 4, § 1) as to such installments, but that rule does not apply where, by the law of the state in which the judgment for future alimony is rendered, the right to demand and receive the same is discretionary with the court rendering the judgment to such an extent that no vested right attaches.

3. Courts \Leftrightarrow 95(2)—Decision of highest courts of state construing its statutes binding on courts of other jurisdictions.

The decision of the highest courts of the state construing its statutes is binding on courts of other jurisdictions.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by L. G. Criteser and wife against O. E. Gaffey. A judgment for plaintiffs was, on appeal by both parties, reformed and affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (195 S. W. 1166), and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals affirmed.

S. P. Jones, of Marshall, and T. P. Harte, of Douglas, Ariz., for plaintiffs in error.

F. H. Prendergast, of Marshall, for defendant in error.

SPENCER, J. L. G. Criteser and wife, Josephine Criteser, instituted this suit to recover of O. E. Gaffey upon a judgment for alimony which Josephine Criteser, the former wife of Gaffey, had obtained in the circuit court of Oregon, before her marriage to L. G. Criteser. The decree of the Oregon court allowed her $125 attorney's fee and the sum of $50 per month alimony, with interest on the amounts. The district court of Harrison county rendered judgment for alimony accruing during the six months intervening between the decree of divorce and the marriage of Josephine Gaffey to L. G. Criteser, and also for attorney's fees, with interest on both amounts. Upon appeal the Court of Civil Appeals reformed the judgment so as to permit a recovery of attorney's fees with interest, but denying recovery for any alimony, and, as reformed, affirmed the judgment. 195 S. W. 1108.

[1-3] The only question for determination is: Is the judgment rendered by the circuit court of Oregon entitled to be given effect under the full faith and credit clause of the federal Constitution? The case turns, we think, upon the construction to be given the statutes of Oregon as construed by the courts of that state in connection with the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 682, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061.

The case of Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 30 Sup. Ct. 682, 54 L. Ed. 905, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1068, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061, lays down this general rule and exception:

"First, that, generally speaking, where a decree is rendered for alimony and is made payable in future installments, the right to such installments becomes absolute and vested upon becoming due, and is therefore protected by the full faith and credit clause, provided no modification of the decree has been made prior to the maturity of the installments, since, as declared in the Barber Case, 'alimony decreed to a wife in a divorce of separation from bed and board is as much a debt of record, until the decree has been recalled, as any other judgment for money is.'

"Second, that this general rule, however, does not obtain where by the law of the state in which a judgment for future alimony is rendered the right to demand and receive such future alimony is discretionary with the court which rendered the decree, to such an extent that no absolute or vested right attaches to receive the installments ordered by the decree to be paid, even although no application to annul or modify the decree in respect to alimony had been made prior to the installments becoming due."

The construction given the Oregon alimony statute by the Supreme Court of that state in the case of Brandt v. Brandt, 40 Or. 477, 67 Pac. 508, brings the judgment within the exception to the general rule set forth in the Sistare Case. In the Brandt Case the Oregon court held that the court rendering judgment for alimony is clothed with power adequate to set aside as well as alter or modify a provision for permanent alimony or allowance, as the exigencies of the case may require, and where the allowance, as in this case, is made as a matter of support and maintenance the decree of annulment may be made to operate retrospectively.

The Sistare Case is relied upon by both parties as supporting their respective views. In that case the Connecticut court held the view that the decisions by the appellate court of New York were to the effect that the court rendering judgment for alimony had the power to set aside, to annul, vary, or modify the judgment so rendered, and that such act of the court could be made to operate retrospectively. Mr. Justice White disagreed with the Connecticut court in holding that the New York courts held to such a view. The New York statute was construed by him. That portion having reference to the question at issue reads:

"The court may, by order, upon the application of either party to the action, after due notice to the other, to be given in such manner as the court shall prescribe, at any time after final judgment, annul, vary or modify such directions. But no such application shall be made by a defendant unless leave to make the same shall have been previously granted by the court by order made upon or without notice as the court in its discretion may deem proper after presentation to the court of satisfactory proof that justice requires that such an application should be entertained."

In the absence of an authoritative construction of the New York statute by the New York courts Justice White concluded that authority was not given by the statute to annul or set aside installments of alimony which had already become due. Such is not the case, however, in this instance. As stated, the Oregon court has construed the statute under which the judgment for alimony was allowed, and we are bound by the construction given.

It is recommended, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reforming and affirming the case be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

BAKER v. LOFTIN et al. (No. 157-3130.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)1. Negligence ⇨136(2)—Ordinarily question of fact.

Ordinarily, negligence is a fact to be found by the jury from the testimony, yet some acts are so obviously dangerous and reckless that no court should hesitate to declare them negligent.

2. Railroads ⇨382(6)—Intoxicated person asleep on track negligent.

A railroad's section foreman, knowing the schedules of trains, by drinking to the point of stupor and falling asleep on the track in the evening, when he was passing along on his own affairs in the railroad's hand car, at a time when a train was about due to pass, was guilty of negligence contributing to his death when struck.

3. Railroads ⇨390—Knowledge of peril essential under last chance doctrine.

To recover against a railroad for death of an intoxicated person on the track, on the theory of breach of duty imposed by discovery of his peril, it is essential to show, not merely that those in charge of engine by exercise of reasonable care might have acquired a knowledge of his peril in time to avoid injury, but that they actually possessed it.

4. Evidence ⇨587—Circumstantial evidence must have probative force constituting basis of inference.

While any fact may be established by circumstantial evidence, such evidence must have probative force sufficient to constitute the basis of a legal inference, and not be such as to permit of merely speculative conclusions.

5. Railroads ⇨398(4)—Evidence insufficient to show discovered peril.

In an action against a railroad for a death on its track, evidence held insufficient to support finding of fact necessary to road's liability on theory of discovered peril, that is, fireman and engineer saw decedent and knew of his peril in time to avoid injuring him, and yet failed to use all means within their power.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by Smithie Loftin and others against James A. Baker, receiver for the International & Great Northern Railway Company. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (198 S. W. 159), and defendant brings error. Judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment rendered for defendant on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Doremus, Butler & Henderson, of Bryan (Wilson, Dabney & King, of Houston, of counsel), for plaintiff in error.

Lamar Bethea and W. C. Davis, both of Bryan, and Ward & Bickett, of San Antonio, for defendants in error.

TAYLOR, J. This was a suit by the widow and children of Charles Loftin, defendant in error, against the International & Great Northern Railway Company, plaintiff in error, to recover damages arising out of Loftin's death, caused by his being knocked from the railroad track by plaintiff in error's passenger train.

The opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals states that the testimony developed the following facts:

"Charles Loftin was a section foreman in the employ of appellant, and lived in appellant's section house at Fountain switch, which is about 7 miles in a northern direction from Bryan, Tex., and about 1 mile north of the bridge near which deceased was killed at the time alleged, by appellant's engine. Appellant furnished deceased with a motorcar to be used and operated by deceased on appellant's railroad track, subject to several rules known to deceased. Deceased employed laborers in the work required of him as section foreman. On Saturday, July 1, 1916, deceased, with his nephew and two Mexican laborers, were busy performing their duties for appellant on the section until 5 o'clock p. m., after which time all four went on the motorcar from the section house at Fountain switch for the purpose, among other things, of getting money for the Mexican laborers. After arrival in Bryan, the Mexicans bought provisions, and about 9:30 p. m. all the party, boss, nephew, and laborers, mounted the motorcar to return from Bryan to the section house at Fountain switch. While in Bryan deceased and his nephew drank four or five glasses of beer each. When the party left Bryan, deceased had several bottles of beer and a 50 cent bottle of whisky with him. Deceased operated the motorcar. After traveling about 5 miles from Bryan, the car stopped at Thompson Creek crossing, which was about 2 miles from the section house at Fountain switch, and about 1 mile south of the scene of the killing. Here the entire party dismounted from the motorcar and remained nearly 2½ hours. The Mexicans mounted the motor first (on returning to the car), deceased became angry with them, and required them to get off. Then deceased attempted to force them to get back on, but the Mexicans ran off along the railroad track in the direction of the section house. Deceased took his position on the motorcar and told his nephew to shove the car off, which he did. Deceased was angry with the nephew, and forced him to get off the motor while in motion. There was a lighted lantern on the frame of the motorcar visible from the rear of the motorcar. The motor was heard popping by the nephew as it went for quite a distance. The nephew made his way to the section house across the fields, where he secured a lantern for the purpose of returning to meet his uncle, but did not do so. The motor stopped near a bridge about 1,200 feet north from the Smetana Railroad crossing, a public crossing. The lighted lantern on the motor was seen burning at 12 o'clock midnight, at this point by a party of boys and girls, who also heard a man singing in the neighborhood of the lantern. The light was visible from the Smetana crossing, and was seen by the group of boys and girls from distances of 200 to 500 yards, and seemed to be on the railroad track, near the railroad bridge."

The accident occurred on a two-degree curve of the track between Fountain and Smetana, between 1 and 2 o'clock a. m. There is evidence that between the stations named there was a well-beaten path in the middle of the track, which was used habitually both in the daytime and night by the people living in that vicinity. The curve was between a half mile and a mile in length, and the night of the occurrence was dark. There were no eyewitnesses, except the locomotive engineer and fireman, and only the latter testified to actually seeing deceased on the track at the time of the accident.

J. R. Garner, the engineer, testified that he was sitting in the engineer's seat box on the right-hand side of the cab, the side on the inside of the curve, running the train about 50 miles per hour; that the first he knew of the presence of any one on the track was when the fireman called out, "We are going to kill a man;" that he instantly applied the air and stopped the train, which was about 475 feet in length; that after he struck the man he ran the length of the train, and about 180 or 200 feet further; that 600 feet was a good stop for a train of that length; that after Loftin was seen it was impossible to stop the train with all the means at command in time to avert the injury; that the hand car, which he saw about the time the fireman saw deceased, was about 40 or 50 feet further north from where the man lay; that when he first saw it, and when the engine struck it, it was derailed, as much as half of it being off of the track; that when the fireman called out that a man was about to be killed, the engine could not have been over 60 or 70 feet from him.

P. E. Driver, the fireman, testified that he was on the left or west side of the engine, and could not see the inside of the curve; that he was leaning as far out of the cab as he could, looking ahead; that about the middle of the curve he saw a man lying on the side of the track 30 or 40 feet from the pilot of the engine, with his head on the rail and his shoulders between the ties, facing north, his feet extending out from the track; that he called to the engineer as soon as he saw him that they were going to kill a man, and that the engineer applied the air and stopped the train; that the man could not have been seen sooner than he saw him.

The crew on returning to the scene of the accident found Loftin lying on the south side of the track, parallel with it, "just off of the end of the ties," breathing but unconscious, his head pointing west. The skull seemed crushed from a wound in the back of the head, the only wound on the body. Loftin was taken to the hospital at Palestine, where he died without regaining consciousness.

The fireman and engineer testified along the same line as to their inability to see deceased on the track sooner than he was discovered, and the reasons therefor. The engineer testified in part as follows:

"The reason I did not discover this man was that the curve at that particular place curves to the right, and the headlight goes straight forward past the place, and does not follow the track. There is a possibility that if I had known the man was there that I could have put my head out of the window and seen him maybe 40 or 60 feet, standing still or moving at a very low rate of speed, but the conditions that confronts an engineer going at that rate of speed cuts off the view for that distance. It would have been impossible for me to have seen him within the 60 feet, it makes no difference what I had done. The headlight of an engine throws out the light straight up the track. The rays of the light are parallel with the engine. On the engines of high rate of speed we focus the headlight out as far as possible in order to protect against persons and cattle or anything on the track as much as possible. In this instance I think we had it focused out about 700 feet. That is where it centered best on the track. * * * In going around a curve the direct rays of the headlight go out straight across the fields. As the engine comes around the rays of headlight come around too, until you get on a straight track."

Witnesses who visited the place of the accident the following morning testified that groceries of various kinds were scattered along the south side of the track, and that blood was discovered on that side of the track; that the lantern and motorcar were found on the same side of the track some distance apart; that the track was level for a long distance in the vicinity of the accident; that from Smetana crossing to the scene of the accident the elevation of the track was from 2 to 4 feet above the level of the land; that there were no objects to obstruct the view from Smetana crossing to the point on the curve at which deceased was struck, and for a considerable distance beyond.

Several of defendants in error's witnesses, after the death of deceased, made experiments in the vicinity of the scene of the accident. The observations were made by the light of passing trains while the witnesses were on and near the track. Some of the testimony was to the effect that one standing about 9 feet from the track when the train passed could plainly see a person standing on the track about 200 steps away on the curve; that one standing at the place of accident took out his watch when the train reached Smetana crossing about a fourth of a mile away, and was able to tell by the light from the engine that it was 1:25 o'clock. None of the observations were made from the cab of a locomotive, and the witnesses, when making them, did not know the position of the deceased when injured.

Plaintiff in error's witnesses made similar experiments, taking a locomotive engine for the purpose. The substance of their testimony was that one lying on the track where deceased was struck could not be seen further than 250 feet. One of the witnesses occupying the engineer's seat stated he was within 81 steps from the object on the track before he could tell that an object was there, and that he was within 31 steps of it before he could discern that it was a man.

Defendants in error's petition contains two counts. In the first it is alleged, among other things, that the track where Loftin was struck was commonly and habitually used by the public as a highway; that he, while on the track, was from some cause unable to leave the same, and unable to realize the danger of his position; that because plaintiff in error's servants failed to keep a proper lookout deceased was run over and killed. The second count of the petition predicates liability upon discovered peril. Both theories of the case were submitted to the jury. Plaintiff in error requested a peremptory instruction in its favor, which was refused.

The court charged the jury, among other things, that Loftin was in violation of the rules of defendant company when he took the motorcar and used the same on the track of plaintiff in error in the day and night time of July 1, 1916. The jury returned a verdict, upon which judgment was rendered, in favor of defendants in error. The Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment. 198 S. W. 159.

The following notation was made by the Committee of Judges in granting the writ:

"We fail to see in the evidence any negligence of the railroad company, and in our opinion the uncontradicted evidence discloses contributory negligence of the deceased."

We find it necessary to discuss only two questions:

(1) Was Loftin guilty of contributory negligence proximately resulting in his death?

(2) Was there any evidence that the railway company discovered his perilous position on the track in time to avoid injuring him?

Conceding, but not deciding, that plaintiff in error was negligent, the question first stated logically follows.

[1] Ordinarily—in fact in practically all negligence cases—negligence is a fact to be found or inferred from the testimony, "yet some acts are so obviously dangerous and reckless that no court should hesitate to declare them negligent. G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Ryon, 80 Tex. 59, 15 S. W. 588; Sanches v. S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co., 88 Tex. 117, 30 S. W. 431. This case presents acts on the part of Loftin of that character.

Dewey Been was Loftin's nephew and the leading witness for defendants in error. According to his testimony his uncle was drunk when he and his party left Bryan for home, carrying intoxicants on the hand car with them. At a point about 2 miles from Fountain they dismounted from the car, where they remained in the vicinity of the railroad track for about 2½ hours, having a kind of "singing and a jambaree." Loftin then proceeded to run his companions off, first the Mexicans, chasing them down the track; then his nephew, who "took across the field" when Loftin drew his knife. It was then about midnight. The nephew decided after a time to return to his uncle, fearing for his safety. It is not controverted that Loftin was drunk when last seen, and no other reasonable deduction than that he was can be drawn from the testimony. The evidence bearing upon the subsequent happenings is consistent with the conclusion that he was in a drunken stupor, or asleep, when struck by the train.

The court charged the jury that his using the motorcar upon the track at the time he did was in violation of the company's rules. His presence on the track at the time he was injured can be accounted for upon no other theory than that he remained there because intoxicated and in reckless disregard for his own safety.

[2] There is no evidence that it was necessary for him to be there. The allegation is "that he, while on the track, was for some cause unable to leave the same, and unable to realize the danger of his position." There is no cause revealed by the testimony for his not leaving it, other than that stated. He was a section foreman, knew the schedules of the passing trains, and must have realized that he was in a dangerous position, unless his mental faculties, on account of drink, played him false. Under the facts stated Loftin was guilty of negligence contributing to his injury and subsequent death. Railway Co. v. Shiflet, 98 Tex. 102, 83 S. W. 677; Id., 94 Tex. 131, 58 S. W. 945; Id., 98 Tex. 102, 81 S. W. 524; Railway Co. v. Sympkins, 54 Tex. 618, 38 Am. Rep. 632; Smith v. Fordyce et al., 18 S. W. 663; Railway Co. v. McDonald, 99 Tex. 213, 38 S. W. 201.

[3,4] 2. Was there any evidence that the railway company discovered Loftin's perilous position on the track in time to avoid injuring him? It is well settled that the burden of proof was upon the defendants in error, in order to recover for a breach of duty imposed by the discovery of Loftin's peril, to show, not merely that those in charge of the engine by the exercise of reasonable care might have acquired a knowledge of his peril in time to avoid injuring him, but that they actually possessed it. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Breadow, 90 Tex. 26, 36 S. W.

410; Railway Co. v. Staggs, 90 Tex. 458, 39 S. W. 295. The question, concretely stated, is, Did the fireman or engineer, or either of them, knowing of Loftin's perilous position, fail to use all means then available consistent with the safety of the train to avoid injuring him? There is no direct testimony that the engineer saw Loftin upon the track at any time, or that the fireman saw him in time to prevent the accident. It is not controverted that the night was dark or that Loftin was injured while upon a curve of the track. The only testimony as to his position when struck was that only his head was on the track. His shoulders were between ties, his feet extending out from the rail. His face was turned north (away from the engine). There are no circumstances connected with the actual occurrence of the injury raising the issue that those operating the engine actually saw Loftin in time to stop the train before it reached him. While, generally speaking, any fact may be established by circumstantial evidence, yet such evidence must have probative force sufficient to constitute the basis of a legal inference. It should not be of such character as to permit of purely speculative conclusions. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Porter, 73 Tex. 304, 11 S. W. 324.

It is urged that the circumstantial evidence growing out of the experiments made by defendants in error's witnesses is sufficient to raise the issue whether those on the engine actually saw Loftin at the time alleged. In some instances experimental evidence is of a very convincing character, but it should always be based upon facts established in connection with the occurrence involved, sufficient to show that the experiments had a substantial basis in facts, and that they were made under conditions substantially similar to those surrounding the occurrence. Defendants in error's witnesses in making the experiments were in ignorance of whether Loftin was lying upon the track or was on the hand car, or whether he was standing upon the track. Those making the observations, instead of being in the position of the engineer and fireman in a moving locomotive, were on the ground and stationary. Those taking the position supposed to be occupied by deceased were in a standing position only.

[5] Whether the evidence based upon observations made under the conditions stated could have been properly admitted as tending to reveal circumstances, which, together with others, might have tended to establish a want of care upon the part of those in charge of the engine, we need not determine; but, in our opinion, the evidence does not, standing alone, possess that degree of probative force necessary to form the basis of the fact vital to the company's liability on the theory of discovered peril, to wit, that the fireman and engineer saw Loftin, and knew of his peril, in time to avoid injuring him, and, having such knowledge, failed to use all the means then within their power to avoid doing so.

We think it sufficient to point out without any discussion of the holdings in Ft. W. & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Broomhead, 140 S. W. 820, and S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Jaramilla, 180 S. W. 1126 (writs of error denied), relied upon by defendants in error, that both cases are distinguishable from this case in the particular, among others, that the circumstantial evidence in both, bearing upon discovered peril, grew out of circumstances surrounding the actual occurrences upon which the cases arose.

The peremptory instruction requested by plaintiff in error should, in our opinion, have been given.

We recommend that the judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that judgment be rendered for plaintiff in error.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. EWING. (No. 112-2967.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 2, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §124(3) — Hand car held appliance to be inspected though bought of reputable manufacturer.

A standard make hand car, purchased by a railroad from a reputable manufacturer and furnished to a section foreman, is not a simple tool or appliance, and its purchase is not the exercise of ordinary care, relieving the railroad of the duty of inspection to ascertain its fitness for use, depending on a proper adjustment of the cogwheels.

2. Master and servant §286(24)—Negligent inspection question for jury.

Where there was evidence that the derailment of a standard make hand car purchased of a reputable manufacturer and furnished to plaintiff without inspection was the result of an improper adjustment of its cogwheels, discoverable by a reasonable inspection, a peremptory instruction for defendant railroad was properly refused.

3. Master and servant §103(1)—Duty of inspection nondelegable.

The master's duty to use ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe appliances includes the duty of inspection, and such duty is nondelegable.

4. Appeal and error \Rightarrow 232(3)—Ground of objection to charge not taken in lower court waived.

Where ground of objection to a part of the charge was not the ground taken in the trial court, the assigned error, if any, must be considered as waived, under Rev. St. 1911, art. 1971, as amended by Laws 1913, c. 59.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. B. Ewing against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. A verdict and judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (180 S. W. 300), and writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges. Affirmed.

E. B. Perkins, of Dallas, and Scott & Ross, of Waco, for plaintiff in error.

B. Q. Evans, of Greenville, R. M. Vaughan, of Hillsboro, and H. O. Bishop, of Hubbard, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. J. B. Ewing, plaintiff, brought this action against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, defendant, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him while in the employ of defendant. No question is raised with reference to the pleadings. There was evidence of the following material facts:

Plaintiff was a section foreman in the employ of defendant. He was upon a hand car being operated by the section hands upon and over defendant's tracks. The car was thrown from the track by reason of the improper adjustment of the cogwheels. Being too tightly geared, they were caused to sink too deep in the grooves and to become locked. Through the derailment of the car, plaintiff received the injuries complained of. The hand car weighed between 600 and 700 pounds. It was operated by two cogwheels and a lever. One of the wheels, called the pinion wheel, was attached to the front axle under the body of the car; the other, the bull wheel, was immediately to the rear, and attached to the framework of the car. Only a part of the bull wheel was in view of those operating the car. The hand car was furnished plaintiff when new, 17 days before his injury. It was of a standard make, and purchased by defendant with a number of others in carload lots from a reputable manufacturer. The car came "set up" from the factory, and was delivered to plaintiff in the condition in which it was received from the factory, without any character of inspection by defendant; and there was no evidence of inspection by the manufacturer prior to its shipment from the factory.

Plaintiff had been in the employ of defendant for 6 years, but had used only one new car prior to this one with which he had no trouble. He had worked with hand cars for 26 years, but had no experience such as with the car in question. On several occasions prior to plaintiff's injury, the car in running made a grinding noise, which was attributed by plaintiff to the newness of the car or to the manner of its operation by the section hands. Plaintiff was not a machinist, and it was no part of his duty to inspect the car. He knew the car was tightly geared, but believed this proper, and had no knowledge of any danger from the use of a car thus geared.

A trial to a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, which was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. 180 S. W. 300. Writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges.

[1-3] It is contended by defendant that the hand car in question was a simple tool or appliance; and, being a standard make car, purchased from a reputable manufacturer, and delivered to plaintiff in the condition in which it was received from the factory, defendant will be deemed under the law to have exercised ordinary care in its selection, and thereby absolved from the duty of inspection. Predicated upon this proposition, defendant requested a peremptory instruction in its favor, which was refused; it objected to the fourth paragraph of the court's charge, wherein the jury was instructed that it was the duty of defendant "to have caused said car to be inspected in order to ascertain its condition," and requested an instruction embodying its contention, which was refused.

In support of its contention, defendant cites Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railroad Co. v. Larkin, 98 Tex. 225, 82 S. W. 1026, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 944. In that case a lantern was purchased from a reputable manufacturer, and was of a standard make. Larkin was injured by the breaking of the globe of the lantern, while cleaning it. The court held this a simple appliance, and that upon such purchase it was not the duty of the employer to enter into "a minute examination of it to detect some latent defect," or after its delivery to the employé for use, "to inspect the lantern at regular times or at any time thereafter."

In Drake v. San Antonio & Aransas Pass Ry. Co., 99 Tex. 240, 89 S. W. 407, which involved the duty of inspection of a simple tool or appliance, the holding in the Larkin Case was stated to be "that the duty of ordinary care did not require of the master that regular and careful inspection of this simple tool which is essential to such care in relation to more complicated and dangerous machinery and appliances."

We have been cited to no case which has included a car of the character here in question within the class of simple tools and appliances. There have been numerous cases in this state involving injury through defective hand cars, wherein the employer's duty to use ordinary care in furnishing to the employé reasonably safe instrumentalities, including necessary inspection, has been applied; but in none of the cases does it appear that the proposition was advanced that the car was a simple tool or appliance. Among such cases are: G., O. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Silliphant, 70 Tex. 623, 8 S. W. 673; Railway Co. v. Blackmon, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 200, 74 S. W. 74; Railway Co. v. Browning, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 118 S. W. 245; Railway Co. v. Edmunds (Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 633.

The case of International & Great Northern Railroad Co. v. McCarthy, 64 Tex. 632, cited and relied upon by defendant, is not an authority for the proposition. In that case the injury resulted from the use of a velocipede hand car, then a new appliance not in general use. There was no evidence of defect of any kind or character, and the question of liability for defects and the duty of inspection were not involved. Liability was sought to be imposed on the ground that the car was a dangerous instrumentality, and McCarthy not warned of the dangers attendant upon its operation and use. The court held such dangers open and patent, and as apparent to McCarthy as to the company.

We have hereinbefore briefly described the car furnished plaintiff. Under the evidence, some degree of mechanical skill was necessary to a proper adjustment of the cogwheels and to a knowledge as to whether the adjustment was proper, and as well to an appreciation of the danger incident to its operation with the cogwheels geared too tight or too deep. The mechanism of the car is located under its floor or platform, and defects therein are thus hidden from the view of those operating or using it. While, comparatively speaking, not a complicated or dangerous machine, such car cannot be termed a simple tool or appliance. The defect and danger are not obvious and necessarily apparent to the employé in its use; hence to determine its fitness for use, an inspection is or may be necessary.

The hand car, not a simple tool or appliance, was of standard make, purchased from a reputable manufacturer, and furnished to plaintiff without inspection by defendant. Do these facts establish as a matter of law the exercise of the requisite degree of care by defendant?

The question has not been directly determined by our Supreme Court, and authorities in other jurisdictions are conflicting. The cases are collated in the note 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1120.

In Alamo Dressed Beef Co. v. Yeargan, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 123 S. W. 721, in which writ of error was denied, the following proposition was advanced by the appellant:

"The fact of the appliance being of an approved pattern and having been bought from a reputable dealer relieved the defendant of the duty of inspection in the absence of some circumstance which would put a prudent man upon inquiry at the time of the purchase or afterwards."

This proposition is a statement of what has been termed the reputable manufacturer doctrine. The court held the proposition unsound, declaring that "reasonable inspection is imposed by law at all times."

The rule is thoroughly established that the duty of the employer to use ordinary care to furnish reasonably safe tools, machinery, and appliances for use by his employes—which includes inspection, where necessary—is positive and absolute, in the sense that it is nondelegable. The reputable manufacturer doctrine, broadly stated and applied, would effectually destroy the rule, by permitting the delegation of the employer's duty to the manufacturer. In effect, it would in many instances be a denial of any recovery by the employé, for ordinarily, through the absence of the necessary privity, the injured employé would have no right of action against the manufacturer. 3 Labatt's Master and Servant (2d Ed.) § 2786; 18 R. O. L. 564. The rule of the nondelegability of the duty of the employer in this respect is both just and salutary; it is a necessary protection to the employé, and should not be departed from to the extent of its complete abrogation.

An examination of the cases cited as supporting the reputable manufacturer doctrine convinces us that but few of them carry it to the extent contended for by defendant. In the majority of such cases, while the doctrine is broadly stated, it is applied to latent defects, requiring minute and detailed inspection, involving tests such as can and ought to be applied by a manufacturer, and for which many employers are in no manner equipped, as distinguished from defects discoverable by an external or visual inspection, an inspection compatible with the usual conduct of the ordinary business.

We are impressed that the doctrine deducible from such authorities is thus fairly stated by the court in Reynolds v. Merchants' Woolen Co., 168 Mass. 501, 47 N. E. 406:

"If a machine is bought of a reputable maker, in other words, if reasonable care is used in selecting the maker, and then reasonable care was used upon the delivery of a machine, in inspecting it, in setting it up, in putting it in operation it cannot be said that the defendant, or an employer would be liable in such a case, although it might clearly appear later on that the maker of that machine was careless, and put in improper materials, or did imperfect and improper work. The law does not make the employer an insurer of the safety of his machines, nor a guarantor that due care shall be used by the manufacturer. It does require, however, that he shall use reasonable care to provide proper machinery."

An eminent text-writer approves the above as a correct statement of the doctrine and as marking its true limits. 4 Thompson, Negligence, § 3990.

Applying what we conceive to be the correct rule of law to the facts of this particular case, we conclude that the purchase of a standard make car from a reputable manufacturer did not establish, as a matter of law, the exercise of ordinary care by defendant, relieving it of the duty of inspection. There being evidence that the derailment of the car, and consequent injury to plaintiff was the result of an improper adjustment of the cogwheels, discoverable by a reasonable inspection, the court properly refused the peremptory instruction and the special charge, requested by defendant.

[4] Both in the Court of Civil Appeals and in its application for writ of error herein, defendant under proper assignments of error complains that the court erred in the fourth paragraph of its charge, wherein the jury was instructed that it was the duty of defendant to have caused the car to be inspected to ascertain its condition, contending that the question of the duty of inspection was for the jury. This objection was not taken in the trial court, and under article 1971, R. S. 1911, as amended (Laws 1913, c. 59), the error, if any, must be considered waived. Gulf, Texas & Western Ry. Co. v. Dickey, 108 Tex. 126, 134, 187 S. W. 184.

In the trial court objection was taken to this part of the court's charge, solely upon the ground that through the purchase of a standard make car from a reputable manufacturer, defendant was relieved of the duty of inspection. This objection we have considered. The further objection sought to be raised is not properly before us.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

MISSION INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DIST. et al. v. ARMSTRONG. (No. 154-3122.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Schools and school districts §104—Tax levy for district gave it lien on personalty.

In view of Rev. St. 1911, arts. 957, 958, 961, 7626-7628, under article 2853, conferring power of taxation on trustees of independent school districts, an independent school district by levy of tax by the collector acquired a lien on personal property within the district.

2. Schools and school districts §104—Tax lien attached and became incumbrance on personalty when assessment was made.

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 2853, conferring power of taxation on trustees of independent school districts, in view of article 958, incorporated by reference, which does not fix a specific date when the lien of taxes on personalty shall attach, the lien created by a school district's tax levy attached and became an incumbrance on the property as soon as the assessment was made.

3. Schools and school districts §104—Tax lien on personalty created by assessment not divested by sale under deed of trust.

Lien on personalty created by an independent school district's assessment under Rev. St. 1911, art. 2853, having attached, was not divested by sale under a deed of trust, but the buyer took the property subject to the right of the district through its collector to enforce collection by levying on and advertising the property for sale to satisfy the lien.

4. Schools and school districts §106—Pur- chaser at sale under trust deed of personalty whereon district had lien for taxes held lia- ble on bond to release levy when taxes be- came due.

Where to satisfy tax lien on personalty created by independent school district's assessment, the tax collector levied on and advertised it for sale, to prevent which a purchaser at sale under deed of trust gave the bond to release levy required by Rev. St. 1911, art. 7626, on the taxes becoming due the purchaser would be liable under the bond for the amount of taxes it was given to protect.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by George W. Armstrong against the Mission Independent School District and another. From judgment for defendants in plaintiff's suit and their cross-action, plaintiff appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and rendered (195 S. W. 895), and defendants bring error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

H. F. Bishop, of Mission, for plaintiffs in error.

Geo. P. Brown, of Edenburg, for defendant in error.

SPENCER, J. The suit was by George W. Armstrong, defendant in error, to recover of the Mission Independent school district and P. W. Barron, tax collector, plaintiffs in error, the sum of $405.60, which he had paid under protest for taxes due the district by the Mission Cotton Oil Company, a corporation, upon personal property purchased after the levy of the tax, for the years 1912 and 1913, but which were delinquent at the time of purchase. Plaintiffs in error filed a cross-action for $150 for taxes due for 1914.

The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, summarized as follows: The district assessed a school tax upon the property of the oil company for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914. January 6, 1914, the First National Bank of Brownsville sold the property at a trustee's sale under the provisions of a deed of trust which the company had executed and delivered to it; and Armstrong, a stockholder in the company, became the purchaser. Subsequent to the purchase, and after the taxes for 1912 and 1913 became delinquent, and after demand for payment, the tax collector levied upon the property and advertised the same to be sold for the delinquent taxes. Armstrong, who was at that time engaged in dismantling the property, paid the amount in order that he might not be inconvenienced in the work, and in order that he could remove it out of the county. The property consisted of buildings erected upon a railway right of way, with an agreement that it could be removed.

The trial court rendered judgment against Armstrong upon his action, and in favor of the district court and the tax collector upon their cross-action against Armstrong. The Court of Civil Appeals was of opinion that the taxes assessed against the company upon the personal property created no lien, and that it was not an obligation against Armstrong. The judgment upon the cause of action and the cross-action was reversed and rendered in favor of Armstrong. 195 S. W. 895. The writ was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

[1] The sole question presented for our determination is: Did the Mission Independent school district by the levy of a tax by the collector have a lien upon the personal property within the district? Article 2853 of the R. C. S. conferring the power of taxation upon the trustees of independent school districts, reads:

"The trustees elected in accordance with the preceding article shall be vested with full management and control of the free schools of such incorporated town or village, and shall in general be vested with all the powers, rights and duties in regard to the establishment and maintaining of free schools, including the powers and manner of taxation for free school purposes that are conferred by the laws of this state upon the council or board of aldermen of incorporated cities and towns."

The article quoted adopts by reference, and incorporates into the act of which the article is a part, those articles conferring upon cities and towns the power of levying and collecting taxes. The articles pertinent to be considered here are 957, 958, and 961. The latter part of article 958 reads:

"The assessor and collector shall have full power to levy upon any personal property to satisfy any tax imposed by this title; all taxes shall be a lien upon the property upon which they are assessed, and, in case any property levied upon is about to be removed out of the city, the assessor or collector shall proceed to take into his possession so much thereof as will pay the taxes assessed and costs of collection."

Article 957 provides, in substance, that the assessor has the power to levy upon so much property liable to taxation as may be sufficient to pay the taxes due from the person owing the tax, and to advertise and sell the same to satisfy the taxes, cost, and fees. The only question of difficulty presented is, When does the lien given by article 958 attach? While defendant in error contends that the law nowhere gives a lien on personal property to secure the payment of taxes assessed thereon, he admits that it may provide a method of fixing such a lien. He relies upon articles 7626, 7627, and 7628 in support of his contention, and seems to think that these articles provide a method of fixing a lien if, in fact, one exists. These articles were incorporated by adoption into the act of which article 961 is a part, and they became likewise a part of the act now under consideration, by reason of having been adopted by article 2853. Article 7626 reads:

"If it comes to the knowledge of the collector that any personal property assessed for taxes on the rolls is about to be removed from the county, and the owner of such property has not other property in the county sufficient to satisfy all assessments against him, the collector shall immediately levy upon a sufficiency of such property to satisfy such taxes and all costs, and the same sell in accordance with the law regulating sales of personal property for taxes, unless the owner of such property shall give bond, with sufficient security, payable to and to be approved by the collector, and conditioned for the payment of the taxes due on such property, on or before the first day of January next succeeding."

The substance of article 7628 is that whenever it shall appear to the collector of taxes that any person who is delinquent in the payment of same has no property in the county to which the tax is owing, it shall be the duty of the collector to forward a certified schedule of taxes due to the collector of the county where he shall have reason to believe the delinquent has property, and the receiving collector is directed to seize and sell any property of the delinquent in the same manner as if the taxes were originally assessed and due in his county.

The provisions of these articles do not deal with the creation of liens, but were enacted for the guidance of the collector in the discharge of his duty, to the end that the power levying the tax may not suffer the loss of the assessment. Article 958 governs in so far as the creation of the lien is concerned, while article 957 provides the manner of the enforcement of the lien thus created. Crawford v. Koch, 169 Mich. 372, 135 N. W. 339.

[2] As article 958 does not fix a specific date when the lien given therein shall attach; and in the absence of a specific date, the lien thus created attached and became an incumbrance upon the property as soon as the assessment was made. Carswell & Co. v. Habberzettie, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 494, 87 S. W. 911; Cruger v. Ginnuth, 3 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 24; 37 Cyc. 1142 (c).

[3] The agreed statement of facts shows that the taxes had been levied and assessed for 1912 and 1913, and were due and unpaid at the time of the trustee's sale under the deed of trust. The lien, thus created by the assessment having attached, was not divested by reason of the sale under the deed of trust. Defendant in error took the property subject to the right of the district, through its collector to enforce collection by levying upon and advertising it for sale to satisfy the lien. 37 Cyc. 1146.

[4] What has been said with reference to the lien for taxes for 1912 and 1913 also applies in so far as the taxes for 1914 are concerned. The assessments had been made for 1914, but the taxes were not due at the time of purchase by defendant in error. To protect the lien created by the assessment the collector levied upon and advertised the property for sale, and to prevent which, defendant in error gave the bond required by article 7626. Upon the taxes becoming due, the defendant in error would be liable under the bond for the amount of taxes which the bond was given to protect.

It is our opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

BURTON LINGO CO. v. FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF ABILENE et al.
(No. 166-3166.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error ⇨76(1)—Judgment is final only when it leaves nothing further to be litigated; "final judgment."

The general rule is that a judgment is "final" only when it leaves nothing further to be litigated.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment.]

2. Appeal and error ⇨927(1)—Presumed in support of finality of judgment that cross-action was abandoned or dismissed.

In an action on a building contractor's bond, where the contractor and the bondsmen filed a joint answer pleading the contractor's discharge in bankruptcy, and containing a suggestion by the bondsmen of suretyship, and asked judgment over against the contractor for any recovery against them, but the issue between the contractor and the sureties was not called to the court's attention, no instruction upon it was sought, and no objection to a peremptory instruction for plaintiff against the sureties was made for failure to submit the cross-action, it may be presumed in favor of the finality of the judgment that the sureties waived and abandoned their cross-action, or that a dismissal or discontinuance was had with reference thereto.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the Burton Lingo Company against the First Baptist Church of Abilene and others. A judgment for plaintiff was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals (198 S. W. 1013), and plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and remanded to the Court of Civil Appeals.

Sayles & Sayles, of Abilene, for plaintiff in error.

G. C. Groce and J. L. Gammon, both of Waxahachie, and A. H. Kirby, of Ft. Worth, for defendants in error.

SADLER, P. J. E. S. Boze entered into a building contract with the First Baptist Church of Abilene, acting through the members of its board of trustees and building committee, for the erection of a church building; G. P. Bullard, W. A. Crow, R. C. Johnston, J. W. Harrison, and J. L. Gammon becoming sureties for Boze on his bond, insuring performance of his contract. During the construction of the building, the Burton Lingo Company furnished to Boze materials which went into the construction of the building.

Burton Lingo Company filed this suit against the church, the church trustees and committee, the contractor and his bondsmen, to recover upon an account for material furnished by it to the contractor.

The contractor and bondsmen were represented by the same counsel, and jointly answered. Among other defenses set up in the answer, it was specially pleaded that the contractor had been discharged in bankruptcy, and this was pleaded in bar to any recovery against him. The answer contained a suggestion by his codefendant bondsmen of suretyship, asking judgment over against him for any recovery had against them by plaintiff.

The cause went to trial before a jury under this state of pleading. When the evidence was in, the defendant, contractor and his bondsmen requested a peremptory instruction for a verdict in favor of the contractor on his plea of discharge in bankruptcy, and generally in favor of his bondsmen. The court refused the latter request, but granted the former, and instructed a verdict discharging the contractor on his plea in bankruptcy. The sureties excepted to the refusal to give the requested charge as to them, but did not except to the giving of the peremptory instruction favorable to the contractor. The court then gave a peremptory charge in favor of the plaintiff and against the sureties alone, and in favor of all the other defendants. Verdict was accordingly returned for the plaintiff against the bondsmen alone, but discharging all other defendants.

Thereupon judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict of the jury, which was copied into the decree, except that in the judgment the contractor was specifically discharged only as to the suit of the plaintiff, the church, and church committee. The judgment made no specific mention to the suggestion of suretyship, nor did it discharge specifically the contractor as to the cross-action of his bondsmen.

While the sureties excepted to the judgment as against themselves in favor of the plaintiff, they did not raise the question of its failure to specifically discharge the contractor or dispose of their cross-action.

In the motion for a new trial, the bondsmen treated the judgment as final, and at no time did they call the attention of the court to the failure of the judgment to dispose of the issue presented in their suggestion of suretyship.

The sureties appealed from the judgment, and assigned only the errors in refusing the requested instruction in their favor as to plaintiff's suit, and in giving a peremptory instruction for plaintiff against them. Plaintiff also appealed, but raises no question relating to the finality of the judgment but only those questions which affected its right of recovery against the church and church committee.

After the cause was submitted in the Court of Civil Appeals that court held that the judgment was not final, on account of the failure to dispose of the cross-action of the sureties against the contractor. We are thus called upon to determine whether the judgment is final or not.

Opinion.

[1] In our opinion, the judgment in this case must be treated and held to be final under all the authorities. The general rule is that a judgment is final only when it leaves nothing further to be litigated. Ft. Worth Improvement District No. 1 v. Ft. Worth, 106 Tex. 148, 158 S. W. 164, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 994. It then becomes necessary to inquire whether the judgment in the instant case leaves any issue then before the court for further adjudication.

[2] It nowhere appears in this record that the cross-action by the sureties was presented to the court, or an adjudication sought thereon. It is true that it is a part of the joint answer of the contractor and the sureties. Nevertheless no act of the parties is made to appear wherein that issue was called to the attention of the court, or any character of instruction sought upon it. No objection is made to the action of the court in giving the peremptory instruction in favor of the plaintiff and against the sureties upon the ground of failure to submit the cross-action. The sureties and their principal jointly pleaded, jointly set up the discharge of the contractor in bankruptcy, and thereafter asked the court to instruct the jury to discharge the bankrupt. The court did so, and the jury so found. It is not unreasonable to presume in favor of the finality of the judgment that the sureties elected to waive and abandon their cross-action, or that a dismissal or discontinuance was had with reference thereto. Trammel v. Rosen, 106 Tex. 132, 157 S. W. 1161; Alston v. Emmerson, 83 Tex. 231, 18 S. W. 566, 29 Am. St. Rep. 639; Gullett v. O'Connor, 54 Tex. 409; Houston v. Ward, 8 Tex. 124; Burton v. Varnell, 5 Tex. 139; Wilson v. Smith, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 188, 43 S. W. 1088; Ellis v. Harrison, 52 S. W. 581; Carlton v. Krueger, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 115 S. W. 619, 1178.

We therefore conclude that the judgment is final and will support the appeal.

We recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that this cause be remanded to that court for disposition of the errors assigned.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

HOUSTON & T. C. R. CO. v. DIAMOND PRESS BRICK CO. (No. 138-3050.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. June 2, 1920.)

1. Indemnity §8—Brick plant liable for negligent maintenance of spur track by railroad under contract.

Under a contract by which a brick company agreed to pay all costs of a spur track and save the railroad harmless from liability, whether caused by its negligence or not, and from all claims for damages growing out of construction, maintenance, or operation of the spur, the brick plant was liable to the railroad, which was required to pay a judgment against it for personal injuries, by reason of negligence of the railroad in maintaining a crossing.

2. Indemnity §3—Contract to indemnify railroad for negligence not contrary to public policy.

A contract by which a brick plant agreed to save a railroad harmless from all claims for damages growing out of construction, maintenance, or operation of a spur track, including claims arising out of negligence of the railroad in maintaining a crossing, was not violative of the public policy of the state, in that it had a tendency to cause the railroad to omit the performance of the duties imposed by Rev. St. 1911, art. 6494.

3. Corporations — 484(2)—Contract indemnifying railroad against liability for negligence as to a spur track not ultra vires.

A contract by a corporation engaged in the brick business by which it agreed to indemnify a railroad from liability on account of claims for damages growing out of negligence in the construction, maintenance, or operation of a spur track running to the brick plant was not ultra vires.

4. Corporations — 447 — Contract to enable corporation to carry on business not ultra vires.

A corporation is empowered to enter into contract to enable it to carry on the business and accomplish the purpose of its existence, unless prohibited by law or the provision of its charter.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company against the Diamond Press Brick Company. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (188 S. W. 32), affirming a judgment for defendant, plaintiff brings error. Reversed and rendered.

John H. Sharp, of Ennis, and Jno. T. Garrison, of Houston, for plaintiff in error.

G. C. Groce, of Waxahachie, for defendant in error.

SPENCER, J. The Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, plaintiff, sued the Diamond Press Brick Company, defendant, a corporation, to recover the amount of a judgment one Henry Hamilton had recovered against it. Hamilton's action was based upon plaintiff's negligence in permitting a crossing on a spur track running to defendant's brick plant to become unsafe, alleging that in attempting to drive over it in its dangerous condition his team became frightened and ran away, resulting in personal injuries.

The railroad company based its action for recovery upon a contract entered into with the brick company under the terms of which the railroad company had built and was maintaining a spur track to the plant of the brick company for the convenience of the latter. The material provisions of the contract necessary to a decision of the case are:

"Fourth. It is agreed and understood that the said party of the second part shall bear the expense of keeping the said spur track in good condition, and that it will, upon receipt of bills therefor, promptly reimburse the party of the first part for any and all expense incurred by it for material and labor furnished in making such repairs as may be necessary to keep the said spur track in first-class condition."

"Seventh. The party of the second part further agrees and obligates itself to save the party of the first part harmless from any and all claims for damages arising from any cause whatsoever growing out of the construction, maintenance, and operation of said spur track, including damages for injury to or killing of stock belonging to the party of the second part, its employes or tenants, whether such claim is made by any person, firm, corporation, or municipality. The party of the second part further agrees and binds itself to reimburse the said party of the first part for any and all amounts it may be compelled to pay in settlement of any claim for which, under the terms of this agreement, the party of the second part would be liable."

The defendant contended (1) that it was not within the contemplation of the parties that the brick company was to be responsible for the negligence of the railroad company in this character of case; (2) that if the contract be construed as requiring reimbursement to the railway company, it would be against public policy and therefore void; and (3) that the same is an ultra vires act on its part, and hence unenforceable. The court, upon motion of defendant, sustained exceptions to plaintiff's petition, and, plaintiff refusing to amend, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant. Upon appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals affirmed the judgment. 188 S. W. 32. The writ was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

The proximate cause of the damages suffered by plaintiff, as shown by the pleadings, and for which it seeks indemnity under the contract, was due to its negligence in failing to maintain the crossing in first-class condition; but plaintiff insists that, though it was negligent in this respect, nevertheless it is entitled to indemnity under the provisions of article 7 of the contract.

[1] In our opinion section 7 of the contract is a positive agreement to indemnify the railroad company against such a claim as the one here involved. Under this section the obligation was to save the railroad company "harmless from any and all claims for damages" arising, not only out of the construction and operation of the spur track, but out of its maintenance as well. This section would be inoperative and rendered meaningless if construed to exclude negligence, as a claim for damages against the railroad company growing out of any of these things could have no standing in a court unless predicated upon the negligence of the railroad company, or its servants. The section must, we think, be construed as contemplating claims for damages founded upon such negligence.

The absolute agreement embodied in the seventh section is not to be nullified because of the fourth section. The agreement in the latter section that the railroad company shall bear the expense of keeping the spur track in good condition is not inconsistent with the agreement of the brick company in the seventh section to hold the railroad company harmless against any claim for damages growing out of the maintenance of the track if it were not kept in good condition. The contract, as a whole, simply means that the expense of keeping the spur track in good condition was to be borne by the railroad company, but the brick company was to hold the railroad company harmless against claims for damages founded upon any negligent condition in the construction, operation, or maintenance of the track.

[2] The contention that section 7 is contrary to public policy is based upon the theory that if a railroad company be reimbursed for its negligent act in the maintenance of the crossing it will have a tendency to cause the railroad company to omit the performance of the duties imposed by article 6494, Revised Civil Statutes, which requires railroad companies to keep that portion of their roadbed and right of way over or across which any public roadway runs in proper condition for the use of the traveling public. The contract does not undertake to relieve the railroad company from the duties imposed by the article, nor free it from liability for damages occasioned to others as the result of its failure to perform those duties. We cannot assume that because the agreement has been made the railroad company will violate the statute. We conclude that the contract is not violative of the public policy of the state, but is one which the parties were at liberty to make. M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Carter, 95 Tex. 461, 68 S. W. 159.

[3, 4] The defense by the brick company that the contract is an ultra vires act on its part is likewise unavailing. A corporation is empowered to enter into contract to enable it to carry on the business and accomplish the purpose of its existence, unless prohibited by law or the provision of its charter. The language of the agreement now under consideration leaves no room to doubt that the contract was made in order to accomplish the purpose for which the corporation was created. The spur track was constructed solely for the promotion of the private interests of the brick company, and out of its construction, operation, and maintenance grew increased risks which it was not otherwise required to assume. The benefits secured to the one and the increased risk to the other is the basis for the provision, justifying in its inclusion in the agreement. The making of it was, under the circumstances, an incidental power of the corporation, appropriate to the execution of the specific power granted by the charter, and hence not an ultra vires act.

We recommend that the judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and the district court be reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiff for the sum of $1,430, the amount paid Hamilton by the railroad company, with interest thereon from the 15th day of February, A. D. 1914.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

PANHANDLE & S. F. RY. CO. et al. v.
VAUGHN. (No. 129-3018.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 244(2)—Requested instruction authorizing consideration of possible recovery of cattle from effects of delay in feeding properly refused.

In an action for damages to a shipment of cattle caused by delay in feeding in transit, though defendant's evidence that the cattle were shipped for range feeding and that the cattle recovered their normal condition soon after being placed on the range was admissible on the issue of damages, it was not error for the court, after properly charging the measure of damages to be the difference in value thereby occasioned on arrival at destination, to refuse a requested charge to consider the temporary nature of the injuries.

2. Appeal and error \S 1082(1)—Assignment of admission of testimony held not to present substantive question within Supreme Court's jurisdiction.

Since an action for damages to cattle in shipment does not turn on the admission or rejection of testimony relating to the extent of the damage, an assignment complaining of the admission of such testimony does not present a question of substantive law, and the Supreme Court is without jurisdiction to review it under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 1521, subd. 6.

3. Trial \S 191(6)—Charge exonerating railroad from liability for loading cattle properly refused as assuming plaintiff's negligence.

In an action for damages to a shipment of cattle which were loaded by the shipper, a requested charge not to consider damage caused by loading cows and calves in the same cars was properly refused as assuming that it was negligence to load the cattle in that manner.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Tom Vaughn against the Panhandle & Santa Fé Railway Company and others. Judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (191 S.

W. 142), and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, of Houston, Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, H. S. Garrett, of San Angelo, C. E. Mays, Jr., of Sweetwater, and Madden, Trulove, Ryburn & Pipkin, of Amarillo, for plaintiffs in error.

Mathes & Williams, of Plainview, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. Suit by Tom Vaughn, defendant in error, against the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Company of Texas, and Panhandle & Santa Fé, and the Galveston, Houston & San Antonio Railway Companies to recover damages to a shipment of cattle from Marfa, Tex., to Plainview, Tex.

Plaintiff alleged a delay of 26 hours upon the part of the Galveston, Houston & San Antonio Railway Company, at Marfa, in loading out the cattle after they were received at the pens; five hours' delay on the part of the Panhandle & Santa Fé Railway Company, at Sweetwater, before unloading there, and five hours after reloading and before forwarding; failure to feed and water the cattle, or furnish facilities therefor; and delay generally en route.

The railway companies, in addition to a general denial, alleged the following special defenses: (1) The weak and impoverished condition of the cattle, and that the damages sustained, if any, resulted from their inherent condition; (2) the provisions of the contract providing that (a) the shipper would look after, feed, and water his cattle en route, (b) the liability of each road should be limited to its own line; (3) the neglect of plaintiff to feed and water his cattle while awaiting shipment and while being held in the pens; (4) that the shipment was not made to market, but to range; and that the injuries sustained, if any, were of a temporary nature, and that the cattle soon after arrival recovered their normal condition.

Plaintiff pleaded by supplemental petition an oral contract of shipment; also, that the written contract was signed after the cattle were loaded and the train was about to depart; that he had no knowledge of the contents of the contract, or opportunity to read it, etc. There was evidence along this line in support of the pleadings. The court submitted to the jury the question of defendants' common-law liability. The question of whether the shipment was made under the parol or written contract was not submitted. Appellant's brief assigns no error as to any omission on the part of the trial court to submit this issue, nor does it call attention to any request for its submission.

A requested peremptory instruction in favor of defendants was denied.

Trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff against the Galveston, Houston & San Antonio Railway Company, for $286.25, against the Panhandle & Santa Fé Railway Company for $795, and in favor of the Kansas City, Mexico & Orient Railway Company, which was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals. 191 S. W. 142.

The two companies against which judgments were rendered made application for writ of error, submitting five grounds of error. Upon reference to the Committee of Judges the writ was granted under the view that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in its decision of the questions presented in the second and third grounds.

[1] The first ground of error complains of the refusal of the court to give a special charge instructing the jury that, although they believed the cattle were injured as a result of defendant's negligence, yet, if they further believed that such injuries were temporary, they should take into consideration the temporary nature of the injuries and the degree to which the cattle would have recovered after arrival at Plainview, with the exercise of proper care and handling by plaintiff.

Testimony was admitted tending to show the recovery of the cattle while on the range after arrival, from the effects of shipping. The main charge of the court contained an instruction to the effect that the amount of plaintiff's damage was the difference between the market value of the cattle in the condition in which they were upon arrival at Plainview and what their market value would have been upon arrival there, except for defendant's negligence, if any.

We find no warrant in the decisions of the Supreme Court for concluding that an additional charge of the character requested should be given in those cases in which the cattle are shipped for the range rather than for the market. G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Stanley, 89 Tex. 42, 33 S. W. 109 (citing Railway v. Estill, 147 U. S. 591, 13 Sup. Ct. 444, 37 L. Ed. 292); G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Hume Brothers, 87 Tex. 211, 27 S. W. 110.

We think the following excerpt from an opinion by Judge Rasbury in M., K. & T. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Mulkey & Allen, 159 S. W. 111 (writ of error refused), is a clear statement properly sustaining the court's action in refusing such additional charge:

"The court below correctly charged the jury on the measure of damages, and permitted the broadest kind of inquiry into the condition of the cattle at the time of their shipment, at the time of their arrival, as well as their condition and improvement while being fed and before they were sold. As we understand it, these are inquiries going to prove or disprove the actual damage, and may be, and doubtless were, considered by the jury in the instant case; but we do not understand that proof of such matters is authority for the court to suggest to the jury in his charge that such facts have been proven and may be considered by the jury in estimating the actual loss. Their admission in evidence is the warrant for their consideration, but the court may not single out that particular fact, and especially direct the attention of the jury to the fact that that particular testimony may be considered."

A contrary view is expressed in Ft. W. & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Shank & Dean, 167 S. W. 1093, and Guinn v. P. & N. T. Ry. Co., 142 S. W. 63; but the later case, P. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Norton, 188 S. W. 1011, as well as this case, all by the same court, indicate that the contrary view is no longer adhered to.

We think the holding of the Court of Civil Appeals on the assignment contained in the first ground of error is correct.

[2] The second ground of error sets out an assignment complaining of the admission of certain testimony relating to the extent of the damage of the cattle. As the case does not turn upon the admission or rejection of such testimony, the assignment does not present a question of substantive law. The Supreme Court is therefore without jurisdiction to review it. Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. 1914, art. 1521, subd. 6; Browder et al. v. Memphis Independent School District, 107 Tex. 538, 180 S. W. 1077.

[3] The third ground of error is based upon an assignment of error to the court's action in refusing to instruct the jury that, although they should find that plaintiff's cattle were injured and damaged on account of defendant's negligence, yet they should not consider such damage as "might have been caused" by reason of the cows and calves being loaded and mingled in the same cars.

The testimony showed that the shipment contained 229 cows and 62 calves. It is undisputed that they were loaded by plaintiff, and that the cows and calves were mingled in the same cars. There is testimony that when so loaded there is a probability that the calves will be trampled to death by the cows. There is no evidence that such loading would cause injury to the cows. The agent of the initial carrier testified that he did not know of the shipper's intention to include calves in the shipment, and that he did not know they were in the cars with the cows until they were loaded; that he protested when he discovered it. A number of both cows and calves died en route.

While it is true that defendants were liable for only such damages as resulted from their negligence, the charge requested should not have been given.

The requested charge assumes as a matter of law that plaintiff was negligent in loading the cattle in the manner stated. That is the effect of the charge. It authorizes the jury to eliminate, from the sum total of damages which resulted prima facie from defendant's negligence, such damage as might have resulted from plaintiff's manner of loading the cattle, regardless of whether he was negligent. The damage which defendant was entitled to have the jury "not to consider," or eliminate, if any, was such as resulted from plaintiff's negligence. The charge does not require a finding as to whether the loading constituted negligence on plaintiff's part, and is therefore incorrect. The court did not err in refusing it.

The principal question presented under the fourth and fifth grounds of error is that of the liability of the Galveston, Houston & San Antonio Railway Company, the initial carrier. It is the same question raised under appellant's ninth and tenth assignments of error in the Court of Civil Appeals, and, in our opinion, was correctly disposed of by that court.

We recommend that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

NORTH BRITISH & MERCANTILE INS. CO.
OF LONDON & EDINBURG v.
KLARAS. (No. 169-3179.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Courts \S 480(2)—District court may perpetually enjoin enforcement of county court judgment.

Where creditor of insured garnisheeing insurer, which paid amount of policy into district court after insured had sued on the policy in county court, and the creditor got judgment which was paid, the district court may perpetually enjoin enforcement of the county court judgment against the insurer, notwithstanding Rev. St. art. 4653, requiring writs of injunction to stay execution of a judgment to be returnable in the court where the judgment was rendered.

2. Garnishment \S 157—Garnishee may deposit money, require defendant to interplead, and restrain enforcement of judgment in another court.

A garnishee may file an answer in a garnishment suit admitting the debt and make the defendant, judgment plaintiff in another court, a party to the garnishment suit, deposit the money in the registry of the court in which the garnishment is pending, and enjoin the enforcement of the judgment in the other court.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by the Texas Exchange National Bank of Waco against B. Klaras, wherein the North British & Mercantile Insurance Company of London and Edinburg was garnisheed, and prayed that an action by B. Klaras against it be enjoined. From a judgment of the court of Civil Appeals (200 S. W. 584) affirming in part and reversing in part a judgment for plaintiff and an order that the injunction issue as prayed, the plaintiff brings error. Judgment so reformed as to affirm the judgment of the trial court.

Locke & Locke, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

W. L. Eason, of Waco, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. This is a garnishment case. The North British & Mercantile Insurance Company of London and Edinburg issued a $400 fire insurance policy covering a house in Waco, Tex. The property and policy were subsequently transferred to B. Klaras. Shortly thereafter the house was destroyed by fire. A few days later, to wit, June 25, 1915, the Texas Exchange National Bank of Waco instituted suit in one of the district courts in Waco against Klaras, and others on notes and for a foreclosure of lien. The amount involved was in excess of $1,000. The bank, at the time of filing the main suit, filed in connection therewith a garnishment suit, causing the writ to be served on the insurance company with the view to ascertaining whether the company was indebted to Klaras. On August 7, 1915, the insurance company answered in the garnishment suit, but did not implead Klaras. On August 25th Klaras instituted suit in the county court at Waco, seeking a recovery on his policy. The company then filed an amended answer in the garnishment case, admitting its indebtedness for the full amount of the policy, alleging the institution by Klaras of the suit in the county court, and on the basis of the foregoing, and other allegations, impleaded Klaras, asking that he be compelled to assert his rights in relation to the policy in the garnishment suit, and that he be restrained from further prosecuting his suit in the county court. The company also filed an answer in the county court, in which it set forth the facts concerning the garnishment suit and of having admitted therein the indebtedness on the policy. The company also averred in its answer that an injunction was sought in connection with the garnishment, and prayed that the county court suit be abated, or stayed pending the proceeding in the garnishment suit.

On the call of the appearance docket in the county court judgment was entered in favor of Klaras for the amount sued for. On the following day a temporary restraining writ was issued by the district court in the garnishment suit, enjoining Klaras from proceeding further with the county court suit. Klaras was duly served with the writ.

The bank thereafter recovered judgment in the main suit against Klaras and the other defendants for $1,134.75, exclusive of interest and costs. After entry of judgment in the main case, the garnishment case was tried; all parties, including Klaras, being before the court.

The trial court found as a conclusion of law in the garnishment suit that the garnishee, in order to protect itself from the vexation and expense of double litigation and the possibility of double recovery, was entitled to make Klaras a party to the garnishment suit; that the indebtedness owing by the insurance company to Klaras was duly garnished by the bank; and that the bank was entitled to the benefit of the indebtedness. The insurance company paid into the registry of the court the sum of $400, and it was decreed that this sum, less an attorney's fee of $25, be paid to the bank on its judgment against Klaras, and that such payment should be in full satisfaction of the indebtedness of the company to Klaras on the policy. The temporary restraining order was made permanent, and subsequently the clerk paid out, pursuant to the decree, the sum deposited in the registry of the court.

The insurance company appealed by writ of error to the Court of Civil Appeals from the judgment in the garnishment suit. The judgment was affirmed in part, but so much of the decree appealed from as enjoined Klaras from the enforcement of his county court judgment was set aside, and that part of the case was dismissed. 200 S. W. 584.

Defendant in error has filed a motion to dismiss the petition for the writ, urging that, while the injunction suit was tried in and the restraining order perpetuated by the district court, the county court would have had jurisdiction to try a separate suit filed in that court to restrain enforcement of its judgment.

The reasons for overruling the motion will be apparent in the opinion.

The Court of Civil Appeals was of opinion that the district court was without jurisdiction to perpetually enjoin the enforcement of the judgment of the county court in view of the following provision of article 4653, R. S. 1911:

"Writs of injunction granted to stay proceedings in a suit, or execution on a judgment, shall be returnable to and tried in the court where such suit is pending, or such judgment was rendered."

The court cite in support of the holding, among other cases, Baker v. Crosbyton Ry. Co., 107 Tex. 566, 182 S. W. 287, and say in connection therewith:

"We do not think the case at bar falls within any of the exceptions which have been, or should be, made to the statute. It is not claimed that the judgment of the county court is void for want of jurisdiction, or for any other reason; nor is it claimed that an execution issued upon that judgment had been levied upon property exempt from forced sale, as was the case in Leachman v. Capps & Canty, 89 Tex. 690, 36 S. W. 250, and Van Ratcliff v. Call, 72 Tex. 491, 10 S. W. 578."

Was the district court without authority to perpetuate the temporary restraining order in view of the provisions of article 4653?

[1] The district court had exclusive jurisdiction both of the main suit and of the garnishment suit. Being clothed with power to do whatever was reasonably necessary for the administration of justice within the scope of its jurisdiction and prevent any abuse of its process, it had authority to issue the temporary restraining order. The power to issue is conceded, but the power to perpetuate is denied by the Court of Civil Appeals, under the view that the writ, being for the purpose of restraining the enforcement of a judgment rendered in the county court, should have been returned to, and the injunction case tried in, that court.

Power to issue the temporary writ presupposes the power to perpetuate it, if necessary to the granting of complete relief. Unless it was the intention of the Legislature in the enactment of the article referred to to take away such power, the district court did not err in making perpetual the temporary order.

We find no evidence of such intention in the language of the statute. One of the evident purposes of its enactment was to afford a means for putting an end to litigation by preventing a defeated party from proceeding from one court to another, after his defeat, or in the hope of avoiding defeat, in an attempt to relitigate the case. It is applicable, as has been often held, in these cases, the sole object of which is to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment. The cases cited by the Court of Civil Appeals in which it was applied are of this character.

It is a material, and perhaps controlling, fact in this case, that it was not the sole purpose of the injunction suit to restrain the enforcement of the county court judgment, especially in the sense of seeking to impair or destroy it. In fact, the garnishee, in seeking the injunctive relief ancillary to the garnishment suit, admitted liability on the policy sued on in the county court. The primary purpose, from the standpoint of the district court, in issuing the writ, was not to restrain the enforcement of the judgment, but to enforce its own jurisdiction to the end that it might dispense complete justice between the parties and prevent its decrees in the garnishment suit from being rendered ineffectual. It had the right independent of article 4653 to issue the writ for the purposes stated, and we think it was not within the purview of that article to take away or impair that right.

Suppose it should be held that the writ was returnable to the county court, and that court should hold the garnishee not entitled to have the restraining order perpetuated; and should proceed, as it did in this case, to render judgment against the garnishee as defendant. Suppose the district court then orders by its judgment in the garnishment suit, as it did, that the amount due on the policy and held in the registry of the court, be paid to the plaintiff in the main suit. Irreconcilable conflict in the trial court judgment would be the result. In such case should both judgments be appealed from by the garnishee, or should he be required to choose one at his peril?

The law does not contemplate that such an anomalous situation should be made possible in the administration of justice; yet it is not impossible that it should arise if article 4653 is held applicable in the case of an ancillary proceeding such as is before us in this case.

In the case of Baker v. Crosbyton South-plains Ry. Co., 107 Tex. 566, 182 S. W. 287, relied upon by the Court of Civil Appeals, the effect of applying article 4653 was not to oust the court having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the injunction suit, of such jurisdiction, but to protect the court having exclusive jurisdiction, in the exercise thereof. The holding in that case does not militate against the holding in this. One reason for the application of the statute in that case—a reason in consonance with the purpose of the Legislature in enacting it—was to prevent the possibility of a conflict of judgments.

The Legislature, having in mind to prevent conflicts in the trial court judgments, did not intend that the statute should apply when the effect might be to produce a conflict. Nor did it intend that it be applied when to do so might render ineffectual existing remedies. The case we think is not of the class requiring its application.

[2] Plaintiff in error's resorting to the remedy of interpleader in this case was not an innovation upon the procedure of this state. It has long been recognized as correct practice for the garnishee to file an answer in the garnishment suit, admitting the debt, and make the judgment plaintiff in another court a party to the garnishment suit, deposit the money in the registry of the court in which the garnishment is pending, and enjoin the enforcement of the judgment in the other court. Dobbin v. Wybrants, 3 Tex. 457; Westmoreland v. Miller, 8 Tex. 168; Iglehart v. Moore, 21 Tex. 501; Iglehart v. Mills, 21 Tex. 545; Moton v. Hull, 77 Tex. 80, 13 S. W. 849, 8 L. R. A. 722; and numerous other cases. This practice grew up after the passage of the act of which article 4653 was a part (Gammel's Laws, vol. 2, p. 1711, § 152), and we think it should not now be rendered impracticable by the application of the article insisted on by defendant in error. The decisions of the Supreme Court following soon after the passage of the act indicate clearly that the Supreme Court did not recognize that such application was intended. Allen v. Menard, 5 Tex. 376; Brady v. Hancock, 17 Tex. 361.

We are of opinion that the district court had the power to perpetually enjoin the enforcement of the county court judgment independent of article 4653. It follows that the Court of Civil Appeals erred in setting aside so much of the decree of the trial court as enjoined defendant in error from the enforcement of his judgment.

We recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be so reformed as to affirm the judgment of the trial court.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

McPHERSON v. CAMDEN FIRE INS. CO. (No. 118-2983.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
May 19, 1920.)

1. Statutes \S 105(1) — Intention of Legislature to be ascertained, and statute upheld if possible.

In ascertaining whether a statute is violative of Const. art. 3, § 35, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, it is incumbent on the court to ascertain the intention of the Legislature, and, if possible by fair construction, to uphold it.

2. Statutes \S 105(1) — Constitutional provision as to title of acts liberally construed.

Const. art. 3, § 35, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, should be liberally construed, rather than embarrass the Legislature by a construction the strictness of which is unnecessary for the accomplishment of the beneficial ends for which it was adopted.

3. Statutes \S 116 — Title of statute, making breach of immaterial provision of policy no defense, held sufficient.

Laws 1913, c. 105 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4874a, 4874b), entitled "An act to prevent fire insurance companies from avoiding liability for loss and damage to personal property under technical and immaterial provisions of the policy or contract of insurance where the act breaching such provision has not contributed to bring about the loss, and declaring an emergency," providing in section 1 (art. 4874a) "that no breach or violation by the insured of any of the warranties, conditions or provisions" of any policy shall render the policy void, or constitute a defense unless the breach contributed to bring about the loss, held not violative of Const. art. 3, § 35, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, to be expressed in its title; the statute having reference only to immaterial provisions.

4. Statutes \S 105(1) — Title viewed as part of law and body of act referred to in construing title as to expressing subject.

In ascertaining whether a statute is violative of Const. art. 3, § 35, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title, the title of a statute will be viewed as a part of the law, and the body of the act will be referred to in construing the title.

5. Insurance \S 308 — Statute as to breach of immaterial provisions not applicable where risk is affected.

Laws 1913, c. 105, § 1 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4874a), providing that no breach of "any of the warranties, conditions or provisions" of any fire policy, or application therefor, shall constitute a defense to a suit for loss thereon unless the breach contributed to bring about destruction of the property, held to have reference only to immaterial provisions, the breach of which could in no way affect the merits of claims for losses under them, in view of section 3 and the title of the act.

6. Insurance \S 308 — Statute as to breach of immaterial provisions held inapplicable to certain clauses.

Laws 1913, c. 105, § 1 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4874a), making the breach of an immaterial provision of a fire policy not contributing to the destruction of the property no defense to suit thereon, held not applicable to the proof of loss clause of standard policy, the three-fourths value clause, the coinsurance clause, the incumbence clause, or any other clauses, the breach of which could not bring about a loss by fire.

7. Insurance \S 335(4) — Breach of iron-safe clause held good defense.

Breach of the "iron-safe clause," requiring inventory books, etc., to be kept in fireproof safe, required to be inserted in all policies covering stocks of merchandise by the Fire Commission Act (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4876a-4904), held a good defense in action on policy insuring stock of millinery, notwithstanding Laws 1913, c. 105, § 1 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4874a), making breach of immaterial provision in policy not contributing to loss no defense in action on policy; such statute having no application to the iron-safe clause.

8. Insurance \S 308 — Statute as to breach of immaterial provisions applicable only to breaches which did not in fact contribute to loss.

Laws 1913, c. 105, § 1 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4874a), providing that breach of immaterial provision of policy not contributing to destruction of property shall constitute no defense in action on policy, held applicable only to those warranties and provisions the breach of which might have contributed to bring about the loss, but which in fact did not, and not to such provisions the violation of which could not have contributed to bring about the loss in view of Insurance Act of 1903, and Fire Insurance Commission Act, §§ 18, 19 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4892, 4893).

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Suit by Electra McPherson against the Camden Fire Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (185 S. W. 1055), and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Seay & Seay, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

Thompson, Knight, Baker & Harris, and Will O. Thompson, all of Dallas, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. Electra McPherson sued the Camden Fire Insurance Company on its policy of insurance covering her stock of millinery at Jacksonville, Tex. By agreement the case was withdrawn from the jury and submitted to the court. The court found that the company on March 20, 1914, delivered to plaintiff its policy for $3,000, and that the first annual premium, in the sum of $76.50, was paid; that on the night of the 17th of April following, plaintiff's entire stock of millinery, valued at $1,563.40, was destroyed by fire. The record warranty clause of the policy, sometimes called the "iron safe clause," the breach of which was interposed by the company as a defense, is set out in full in the court's findings. By its terms, plaintiff agreed to take a complete inventory of the stock, keep a set of books showing clearly all purchases, sales, and shipments, keep and preserve the books and inventories, and at night, and at all other times when the store was not open for business, keep them locked in a fireproof safe, or in some secure place; and in the event of loss or damage insured against, to deliver both the inventories and books to the company for examination. The clause stipulated, among other things, that its requirements were an inducing cause to the acceptance of the risk.

The court found that the clause was a reasonable and material provision of the policy, and stated as a conclusion of law that it was not an immaterial and technical provision; that plaintiff, having failed to comply with its terms, was not entitled to recover against the defendant in any amount, except the sum of $76.50, tendered into court by the company as the premium paid. Judgment was rendered in favor of the company, in keeping with the court's findings and conclusion, and on appeal was affirmed. (Civ. App.) 185 S. W. 1055. The writ was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

The case turns upon the construction of an act of the Thirty-Third Legislature (Gen. Laws 1913, p. 194), section 1 of which has been brought forward in Vernon's

Sayles' Civil Statutes as article 4874a. The act, including the title and emergency clause, and omitting section 2 of the enacting clause, is as follows:

"An act to prevent fire insurance companies from avoiding liability for loss and damage to personal property under technical and immaterial provisions of the policy or contract of insurance where the act breaching such provision has not contributed to bring about the loss, and declaring an emergency.

"Section 1. That no breach or violation by the insured of any of the warranties, conditions or provisions of any fire insurance policy, contract of insurance, or application therefor, upon personal property, shall render void the policy or contract, or constitute a defense to a suit for loss thereon, unless such breach or violation contributed to bring about the destruction of the property. * * *

"Sec. 3. Whereas, under the existing laws, insurance policies and contracts may be defeated upon purely technical provisions and defenses that in no way affect the merits of the claim against the insurance company, and such defenses have been upheld to the extent of making it almost impossible for an insurance policy upon personal property to be collected by suit, creates an emergency and imperative public necessity that the constitutional rule requiring bills to be read on three several days in each house be suspended, and that this act take effect and be in force from and after its passage, and it is so enacted."

If the act is not in contravention of the Constitution of the state, and embraces within its provisions the record warranty clause of the policy sued upon, plaintiff is entitled to recover; otherwise the judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals should be affirmed.

It is urged that the act is violative of section 35, article 3, of the Constitution, providing that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title.

[1, 2] This position, in the view we take of the purpose and scope of the act, is not tenable. It is incumbent upon the court to ascertain the intention of the Legislature, and, if possible by fair construction, uphold it. The constitutional provision referred to should be construed liberally, rather than embarrass legislation by a construction the strictness of which is unnecessary to the accomplishment of the beneficial ends for which it was adopted. Morris v. Gussett, 62 Tex. 741; City of Austin v. McCall, 95 Tex. 575, 68 S. W. 791.

[3] The subject as expressed in the title, without relation to the purpose of the act, is the technical and immaterial provisions of fire insurance policies or contracts, or, more briefly expressed, without material change of meaning, the immaterial provisions of fire insurance policies. The end to be reached through the subject, or the subject stated in relation to the purpose of the act, is to prevent fire insurance companies from avoiding liability under such provisions. The purpose expressed in the title, and no other, in our opinion, is effectuated by the provisions of the act.

[4] Viewing the title as a part of the law (M. K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Mahaffey, 105 Tex. 394, 150 S. W. 881), and referring to the body of the act in construing the title, which is permissible (Austin v. McCall, supra), we have concluded that they are not necessarily in conflict, and that neither is broader than the other. So viewed, the act is not subject to the constitutional objection urged.

Several of the Courts of Civil Appeals have applied the act in cases in which its constitutionality was questioned, usually upon the ground stated above. While holding different views as to the proper interpretation of the act, none have expressed any doubt as to its constitutionality. Commonwealth Insurance Co. v. Finegold (Civ. App.) 183 S. W. 833; Camden Fire Insurance Co. v. McPherson (Civ. App.) 185 S. W. 1055; Westchester Fire Insurance Co. v. McMinn (Civ. App.) 188 S. W. 25; M. & M. Ins. Exchange v. So. Trading Co. (Civ. App.) 205 S. W. 352; Allemania Fire Insurance Co. v. Angler (Civ. App.) 214 S. W. 450; Ætna Insurance Co. v. Lewis (Civ. App.) 204 S. W. 1170; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Waco Co. (Civ. App.) 189 S. W. 315; Westchester Fire Insurance Co. v. Roan (Civ. App.) 215 S. W. 985.

[5] The purpose of the act is not to prevent fire insurance companies from incorporating in their policy contracts provisions of any character or class, but to prevent such companies from avoiding liability under immaterial provisions. Only such provisions, it is clear from the language of the title, are embraced within its terms. It is thus apparent that the scope of the act is not unrestricted, and that not all policy provisions are intended to be brought within its purview. It is apparent also from section 3, containing the emergency clause, that the Legislature intended to bring within the terms of the act only that class of fire policy provisions the breach of which could in no way affect the merits of claims for losses under them. It should not be assumed, we think, in view of the limitation of the scope of the act expressed in the title, and the implication of its restricted application as pointed out in section 3, that the Legislature intended the act to embrace all stipulations of the policy, or that it intended that a test, in no way related to the legitimate purposes of a limited class of stipulations, should be applied after the fire, as a measure of the materiality of all the stipulations. To so construe the act is to have it say in effect that no breach of a stipulation of a certain class shall render the policy void, unless such breach contributed to do that which it could not do.

The difficulty in construing the statute invoked in this case, in view of the limitations pointed out, is in determining what provisions of fire policies are within its terms. The class to which it is applicable is not defined except upon the basis of materiality, which is to be determined in each individual case after the loss has occurred, by the test of whether the breach of the provision interposed as a defense contributed to bring about the destruction of the insured property. The logical inquiry is therefore whether there is a class of provisions to which the test referred to is peculiarly applicable in determining their materiality, and whether there is a class to which such a test is wholly inapplicable.

The policy sued on contains a clause which is termed a "gunpowder and kerosene permit." Under its terms, the amount of powder or kerosene allowed to be kept on the premises is limited, and the number of feet from an artificial light at which it is permitted to be handled is specified. The permit provides that failure to comply with its conditions shall render the policy void. The limitations were inserted to decrease the likelihood of fire, and failure to observe them would have increased the probability of its occurrence, and might have contributed directly to bring it about.

In the Finegold Case, supra, the court found as a fact that the keeping of gasoline on the insured premises was a breach of the insurance contract by the insured, but further found that such breach did not contribute to bring about the destruction of the property insured. The Court of Civil Appeals applied the act under consideration, being of the view that the stipulation as to keeping gasoline was immaterial, in that its breach did not contribute to bring about the loss, and that the act had for its object the denial of such defense to the company as a means of escaping liability.

Many policy provisions of the class referred to are used in the standard policy forms prescribed by the state fire insurance commission; such as, provisions restricting the use of gasoline stoves, acetylene gas, limiting the amount of calcium carbide, benzine, etc., that are permitted to be stored on and in the vicinity of the insured property, and other provisions the evident purpose of which is fire prevention. To this class of warranties, conditions, and provisions the test prescribed by the act is peculiarly applicable in determining whether they are immaterial within its meaning, therefore within its purview.

[6] The policy sued on contains the standard form of proof of loss clause. It has no such relation to the causes of the loss of goods by fire as that its breach could bring about such loss. Fire prevention is not its purpose. It is evident from its stipulations that its materiality cannot be measured by whether, if breached, it could have contributed to destroy the property. The Court of Civil Appeals in this case held the act not applicable to proof of loss clauses because they cannot be reached until after the fire. We concur in the conclusion reached, but think the primal reason upon which it rests is that a breach of the clause could not contribute to bring about the loss. Its materiality is not dependent upon the time of breach.

Again applying the test as a basis of classification for determining the policy provisions within the purview of the act, it excludes the three-fourths value clause, the coinsurance clause, the incumbency clause, or any other clauses of fire policies, the breach of which could not bring about a loss by fire.

It is apparent from the respective functions of the policy stipulations pointed out that there is a class of fire policy provisions to which the test referred to is wholly inapplicable, as well as a class to which it is peculiarly applicable.

The "iron-safe clause" of the policy sued on is the provision with which we are immediately concerned. It has no direct relation to fire prevention. Its purpose in policies covering stocks of merchandise is to furnish the insurer the most reliable sources of ascertaining the amount and value of the goods destroyed, and the extent of its liability; to provide business methods whereby the rights of the parties may be determined and adjusted; and also to afford the insurer protection against misrepresentation and fraud. Joyce on Insurance (2d Ed.) vol. 3, § 2063a; Teutonia Insurance Co. v. Tobias (Civ. App.) 145 S. W. 251.

In this case, plaintiff in error issued and delivered its policy, covering defendant in error's stock of millinery, for a premium, the amount of which was based, among other things, upon her agreement to make an inventory, keep books, preserve them in a fire-proof safe, or some other place secure from fire, and produce them for inspection in the event of loss. The stock was valued at $3,000 when insured. When destroyed by fire, it had been considerably reduced. The books were neither kept nor preserved. The breach of the stipulation had the effect of depriving plaintiff in error of the sources for ascertaining the amount and value of the goods destroyed, and bears directly upon the merits of the case.

[7] The state fire insurance commission, whose duty it is under the Fire Commission Act, later referred to, to prescribe all standard forms, clauses, etc., used in connection with insurance policies, requires that the "iron-safe clause" be inserted in all policies covering stocks of merchandise. Its use in such policies tends to stabilize the fire insurance business, and to promote honesty and fair dealing. Our courts recognize it as a reasonable and material provision of such policies, and hold that it must be substantially complied with by the assured. Assurance Co. v. Kemendo, 94 Tex. 371, 60 S. W. 661; Insurance Co. v. Willock (Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 219; Insurance Co. v. Center (Civ. App.) 33 S. W. 555; Couch v. Insurance Co., 32 Tex. Civ. App. 44, 73 S. W. 1077. The act was framed in view of settled judicial construction, and the Legislature, we think, did not intend by its enactment to provide for determining the materiality of the "iron-safe clause" after the fire, the test of whether its breach brought the fire about, a criterion wholly unrelated to its function, or the function of any provision, other than those concerned with fire prevention.

The Court of Civil Appeals, in construing the act in its relation to the "iron-safe clause" in the case of Westchester Fire Insurance Co. v. McMinn, supra, held that its purpose could not properly be said to limit the right of the contract respecting stipulations not bearing upon the peril of fire itself, and that it goes no further than to place a limitation upon the effect of such stipulations, saying that the evident aim of the law was to so far modify the rule respecting stipulations of fire hazards as not to make a forfeiture of the policy depend, as before the passage of the act, upon merely the question of compliance or noncompliance with the particular stipulation; but, instead, to make the effect of such breach dependent on its materiality to the question of actually contributing to bring about the loss.

In the case of Commonwealth Insurance Co. v. Finegold, supra, the court passed directly upon the question of whether the "iron-safe clause" is embraced within the terms of the act under consideration. Judge McMeans, speaking for the court, said:

"But quite a different question is presented * * * as to the iron-safe clause. The statute, we think, has reference to only those warranties and provisions in policies, the breach of which might have contributed to bring about the loss, but which in fact did not, and was passed, we think, with the sole purpose of preventing insurance companies from escaping liability for the violation of a provision of the policy where the breach could have, but in fact did not, contribute to bring about the destruction of the insured property. In regard to other warranties or conditions in the policy, the violation of which could not have contributed to bring about the loss, such, for instance, as the iron-safe clause, the statute does not apply."

[8] The foregoing excerpt is, in our opinion, a correct and succinct statement of the scope and effect of the act. The holding there expressed has been followed substantially by the Amarillo court in this case, and by the Texarkana court in Westchester Fire Insurance Co. v. McMinn, supra. The cases of Ætna Insurance Co. v. Waco Co. (Civ. App.) 189 S. W. 315, Ætna Insurance Co. v. Lewis (Civ. App.) 204 S. W. 1170, Allemania Fire Insurance Co. v. Angier, supra, Westchester Fire Insurance Co. v. Roan, all by the Austin court, Camden Fire Insurance Co. v. Bond (Civ. App.) 202 S. W. 220, Dallas court, and Insurance Co. v. Nelms (Civ. App.) 184 S. W. 1094, M. & M. Ins. Exchange v. So. Trading Co., supra, Ft. Worth court, are cited in support of defendant in error's contention that the act applies to all promissory warranties, conditions, and agreements, regardless of whether their breach could contribute to the destruction of insured property.

In the case last cited, the court, being of the view, notwithstanding the limitation placed upon the scope of the act by the language of the title, and the implied restriction in section 3 pointed out, that it applies to all promissory fire policy warranties, conditions, and provisions, of whatever class, relied to some extent in ascertaining the legislative intent upon an exhaustive research of the judicial decisions relating to insurance contracts, antedating the passage of the Insurance Act of 1903 (General Laws 1903, p. 94).

The body of the 1903 act, as of the act under consideration, construed apart from its connection with the title, was susceptible of an all-inclusive interpretation as to the warranties, etc., within its purview, but, in view of the language of the title, was construed, in accordance with the legislative intent, as not embracing promissory warranties, or agreements to perform acts in the future, such as are contained in the "iron-safe clause." We think the evils remedied by its passage afford no index to the legislative intent in the passage of this act.

The act of 1903 is not unimportant, however, as an aid in the construction of the statute invoked in this case, marking as it does the beginning of the legislative policy of restricting the effect of certain policy stipulations. After its enactment and construction, the breach of material promissory provisions of fire policies, regardless of whether contributing to bring about fire losses, continued to constitute a valid defense to recovery under such policies. Speaking generally, the act did not affect the validity or materiality of the two general classes of promissory warranties of fire policies, above pointed out, to wit: (a) Those the breach of which could bring about a loss of fire; and (b) those the breach of which could not.

Ten years later, 1913, the Thirty-Third Legislature at its regular session passed two acts relating to fire policy contracts, to wit, the act invoked in this case, passed March 29, 1913, and the Fire Insurance Commission Act, passed two days later. General Laws 1913, p. 195 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4876-4904). The effect of the former, as stated above, was to render invalid all defenses to suits on fire policies covering personal property, based on any of their provisions the breach of which could bring about the loss, unless such breach actually contributed to bring it about. Policy provisions, the breach of which could not in any event bring about the loss, were unaffected by the act.

That the Legislature intended not to include such stipulations within the act is apparent from those provisions of the Fire Insurance Commission Act, which expressly prohibit the use of two fire policy stipulations of the class not affected by the former act. Section 18 of the Fire Commission Act (section 4892) declares void any fire policy provision stipulating that the existing incumbrances on the property insured, or any subsequent incumbrance, shall render the policy void. Section 19 (section 4893) prohibits the issuance of a policy containing any provision requiring the insured to maintain a larger amount of insurance than that expressed in the policy, or making the insured liable as coinsurer (except in policies covering grain, cotton, and other products). Both sections 18 and 19 prohibit the use of policy provisions, the breach of which could not in any event bring about the destruction of the property. If provisions of this class were within the purview of the former act, and in effect nullified by its terms, then the enactment of sections 18 and 19 as a part of the latter was useless, or, to say the least, a work of supererogation not to be attributed to the Legislature. The two acts, being passed at the same legislative session, should be construed each in the light of the other. H. & T. C. Ry. Co. v. State, 95 Tex. 507, 68 S. W. 777. So construed, and viewed in the light of the intrinsic aids to construction herein applied, it seems conclusive that no promissory warranties, conditions, or provisions of a fire policy, the breach of which could in no event contribute to bring about the loss of the property insured, are within the purview of the act invoked. The "iron-safe clause" is not an immaterial provision of the policy sued on, and its breach, in our opinion, constitutes a valid defense to a claim for loss under it; and defendant in error, having failed to comply with its provisions, is not entitled to recover more than the premium paid.

The case has been considered by the Commission as a whole in connection with Ætna Insurance Co. v. Waco Co. (Civ. App.) 139 S. W. 315, referred to Section B. The writ was granted in that case, as stated in the notation made by the Committee of Judges, for the reason that a writ had been granted in this case involving the construction of the same statute. The view herein expressed as to the scope and effect of the statute referred to, and its proper construction, is that of both sections of the commission, and is unanimous.

We recommend that the judgments of the district court and the Court of Civil Appeals be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

PROVIDENCE-WASHINGTON INS. CO. v. LEVY & ROSEN. (No. 140-3062.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A. May 26, 1920.)

Insurance — 336(1)—Provision of fire policy against other insurance not within Anti-Technicality Act.

The provision of a fire policy that it should be void if insured made or procured any other insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered by the policy was not within the Anti-Technicality Act (Gen. Laws 1913, c. 105, § 1 [Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4874a]), and it was incumbent upon insured to comply with its terms, being material.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Levy & Rosen against the Providence-Washington Insurance Company. To review judgment for plaintiff, defendant brought error in the Court of Civil Appeals, which affirmed (189 S. W. 1035), and defendant brings error. Judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded for new trial on recommendation of the commissioner of appeals.

Thompson, Knight, Baker & Harris, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

W. L. Eason, of Waco, for defendant in error.

TAYLOR, J. This is a companion case to Etna Insurance Co. v. Waco Co., 189 S. W. 315. The writ was granted in that case, as in this, for the reason that a writ of error had been granted theretofore in the case of McPherson v. Camden Fire Insurance Co., 185 S. W. 1055, involving the construction of the Anti-Technicality Act (Gen. Laws 1913, p. 194), section 1 of which is brought forward as article 4874A of Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes 1914.

In view of the decision in the McPherson Case, a statement of the facts of this case is unnecessary further than to point out the provision of the policy, the breach of which was relied upon as a defense by the insurance company, the pleadings, and the disposition made of the case.

The policy sued on contains the following provision:

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy."

The defendant company pleaded a breach of the foregoing stipulation; also that it was not within the purview of the act referred to. The district court, being of the view that the stipulation was within the act, instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiffs, Levy & Rosen. The Court of Civil Appeals, controlled by its decision in the Waco Company Case, supra, affirmed the judgment. 189 S. W. 1035.

This section of the Commission (Section A) in its recent examination and report in the McPherson Case, supra, reached the conclusion jointly with Section B, that the iron-safe clause of the policy sued on in that case was not within the purview of the act invoked; it being held not applicable to those stipulations, the breach of which could not in any event contribute to bring about the destruction of the insured property.

The provision of the policy above quoted is not of the class embraced within the act invoked, and is therefore, in our opinion, not within its purview. It is a material provision, and it was incumbent upon defendants in error to comply with its terms. Insurance Co. v. Griffin, 66 Tex. 232, 18 S. W. 505; Insurance Co. v. Blum, 76 Tex. 653, 13 S. W. 572; Insurance Co. v. Prather, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 446, 62 S. W. 89; Keller v. L. L. & G., 27 Tex. Civ. App. 102, 65 S. W. 695; Insurance Co. v. Post, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 428, 62 S. W. 140. The court erred in giving the peremptory instruction.

Levy & Rosen by supplemental petition alleged that the company consented that the amount represented by all of the outstanding policies be carried, and that the company, subsequent to the fire, knowing the full amount of insurance carried by them, and with knowledge of all the facts, recognized the validity of the policy sued on. The company denied the allegations.

In view of the error pointed out and the issue raised by the supplemental pleadings, we recommend that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the cause be remanded for further trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

ÆTNA INS. CO. v. WACO CO.
(No. 140-3061.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Insurance ⇨308—Statute, making breach of immaterial provision of fire policy no defense, held inapplicable to provisions material to the risk.

Acts 83d, Leg. (1913) c. 105 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4874a, 4874b), providing that a breach of an immaterial provision of fire policy shall not invalidate policy or constitute a defense to a suit for loss thereon unless it contributed to bring about the destruction of the property, held not applicable to a breach of those provisions which are material to the risk, but a violation of which could not, from their very nature, contribute to bring about the destruction of the property.

2. Insurance ⇨336(6)—Additional insurance in excess of that allowed held a good defense.

The taking out of additional insurance in excess of that allowed under a concurrent insurance clause, in violation of provision of fire policy making policy void if insured procured other insurance on the property covered by the policy, held a good defense in action on the policy, notwithstanding Acts 83d Leg. (1913) c. 105 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4874a, 4874b), making breach of an immaterial provision of policy not contributing to bring about the destruction of the property no defense in action on policy, such statute having no application to breach of such provision of policy; it being material to the risk.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Levy & Rosen against the Ætna Insurance Company, in which the Waco Company intervened. Judgment for intervener was affirmed by Court of Civil Appeals (189 S. W. 315), and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Thompson, Knight, Baker & Harris, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

W. L. Eason, of Waco, for defendant in error.

MCLENDON, J. This case is ruled by the decisions in McPherson v. Camden Fire Insurance Co., 222 S. W. 211, and Providence Washington Insurance Co. v. Levy & Rosen, 222 S. W. 216, decided by Section A of the Commission of Appeals. The questions involved are the constitutionality of chapter 105 of the Thirty-Third Legislature (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4874a, 4874b), and the applicability of said act to the defense relied on to defeat the insurance policy sued on, namely, that the insured had taken out additional insurance in excess of that allowed under a concurrent insurance clause, in violation of a provision of the policy reading as follows:

"This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on the property covered, in whole or in part, by this policy."

The Court of Civil Appeals, Third District, held the act constitutional, and construed it as rendering void the provision quoted. 189 S. W. 315.

[1] In the opinion in the Camden Fire Insurance Company Case above, the act in question is held to be constitutional, and is construed as having no application to a breach of those provisions of a policy which are material to the risk, but a violation of which could not, from their very nature, contribute to bring about the destruction of the property. The opinion in that case represents the mature judgment of all the judges of both sections of the Commission.

[2] The defense relied upon in this case is identical with that relied upon in the Levy & Rosen Case above. The clause of the policy relied upon is material to the risk, and it is not of a class embraced within the act invoked. The questions arise in this case upon the exclusion by the trial court of testimony offered to substantiate the defense.

We conclude that the judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and district court should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the latter court for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

PECOS & N. T. RY. CO. v. MALONE et al.
(No. 128-3016.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Eminent domain ⇨172—District court has no jurisdiction to enter judgment of condemnation except in cases stated.

The district court has no jurisdiction to enter a judgment of condemnation, except in cases falling within the terms of Rev. St. art. 6531, providing that, in suit against a railroad for property occupied for railroad purposes or for damages thereto, the court may determine all matters in dispute, including the condemnation of the property, upon petition or cross-bill asking such remedy by defendant.

2. Eminent domain ⇨167(1)—Gas, electric current, and power companies cannot litigate question of condemnation in suits against them by landowners.

Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 1283a-1283f, as to the incorporation of gas, electric current and power companies, in providing, by article 1283, for condemnation by such company in the same manner and method as is provided by law in the case of railroads, pipe lines, and telegraph and telephone lines, does not extend to gas, electric current and power companies the benefits of article 6531, allowing a railroad, in a suit against it by the owner of land, to litigate the question of condemnation, in view of Rev. St. arts. 1232, 1306; article 6531 being a special provision, and therefore not included by the adoption by article 1283d of general provisions as to condemnation by railroads, etc.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals, of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company against C. A. Malone and another. From the judgment plaintiff appealed, and to review its affirmance by the Court of Civil Appeals (190 S. W. 809) brings error. On recommendation of the Commission of Appeals, judgment of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed and remanded, with instruction.

Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, and Madden, Trulove, Ryburn & Pipkin, of Amarillo, for appellants.

H. C. Randolph and P. B. Randolph, both of Plainview, for appellees.

SPENCER, J. On May 6, 1912, plaintiff, the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company, filed suit in the ordinary form of trespass to try title, seeking to recover of the Malone Light & Ice Company, a corporation, and C. A. Malone, the land described in plaintiff's petition. The Malone Light & Ice Company in erecting an ice and power plant extended, by mistake, the east side of the building, which was 74 feet in length, onto plaintiff's right of way. The extension was 6.4 feet at the south end and 8 feet at the north end. The right of way runs north and south. The building was commenced in 1909 and completed in 1910. Plaintiff, by an amendment filed February 7, 1916, in the form of an action to try title, sought to recover the strip of land upon which the building, by mistake, had been rested.

The Texas Utility Company, a corporation, under and by virtue of chapter 21A, title 25, of Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, organized for the purpose of generating and selling electric current and power, purchased the physical properties, franchises, and easements of the Malone Light & Ice Company, and assumed all the duties and obligations, among which was the duty and obligation to operate and maintain an electric light and power plant in the city of Plainview, Tex. It filed its plea of intervention on the 10th day of May, 1916, admitting the title of the land to be in plaintiff, and sought in its plea to condemn not only the land upon which the building rested, but also an additional strip of 9 feet, alleging that this additional strip was comprehended within the description of the land sued for by plaintiff, and that it was necessary for the protection of the wall and building, and for a passage along beside the building.

The case was tried before the court, without the aid of a jury, and judgment rendered decreeing the land described in plaintiff's amended petition to be the property of the plaintiff, and condemning the land, including the 9-foot strip, to the use and benefit of the intervenor. Upon appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals the judgment of the district court was affirmed. 190 S. W. 809. The writ was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

[1, 2] It is clear, since the decision in the case of Wharf Co. v. Railway Co., 72 Tex. 454, 10 S. W. 537, that the district court has no jurisdiction to enter a judgment of condemnation, except in those cases falling within the terms of article 6531 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1911, which reads:

"When any railroad company is sued for any property occupied by it for railroad purposes, or for damages thereto, the court in which such suit is pending may determine all matters in dispute between the parties, including the condemnation of the property, upon petition or cross-bill asking such remedy by defendant, but the plea for condemnation shall be an admission of the plaintiff's title to such property."

Intervenor's right of condemnation is secured to it by virtue of article 1283d of Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, which article provides:

"That the manner and method of such condemnation shall be the same as is provided by law in the case of railroads, pipe lines, and telephone and telegraph lines."

The question then arises: Was it the intention of the Legislature in granting the right of eminent domain to corporations chartered under and by virtue of chapter 21A, title 25, of Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes, to extend to them the benefits of article 6531?

The general law outlining the manner and method of condemnation by railroad companies was incorporated in the Revised Civil Statutes of 1879, title 74, chapter 8, articles 4178 to 4208, inclusive. The directions therein contained for obtaining right of way and condemning lands for the corporation's use are full, explicit, and complete.

Article 6531 was passed by the Legislature March 19, 1889, as an added section or amendment to article 4205 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1879. The law of 1879, with this amendment, was carried into the revision of 1895 as articles 4443 to 4475, inclusive. Article 1232 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1911, which is article 5085 of Paschall's Digest, carried forward in the revision of the Code, gives telephone and telegraph companies the right of condemnation, directing that they "may proceed to obtain the right of way and condemn lands for the use of the corporation in the manner provided by law in the case of railway corporations." Article 1306 of the Revised Civil Statutes of 1911, enacted in 1899, gives the right of condemnation to pipe lines in this language: "The manner and method of such condemnation shall be the same as is provided by law in the case of railroads."

It is clear from a reading of these several statutes, giving the various corporations organized under them the right of eminent domain, that it was the legislative intent to provide a direct method of obtaining the requisite lands and right of way to transact the business of the corporation, and one in which the initial steps to condemn were to be taken by the corporation; and not that condemnation should proceed by the indirect method of unauthorized entry, by the corporation, upon the land of the citizen, thus encouraging the institution of a suit by the owner in order to lay a predicate for condemnation by the corporation. It will be observed that in each of the adopting statutes, the adopted statute is referred to in words describing its general character. Article 6531 is a special provision of the statute, as contradistinguished from its general provisions, and in our opinion the authority therein given is to be confined exclusively to railroad corporations. There being an absence of a clear intention on the part of the Legislature to adopt the whole act, including the special provision, only those parts of it which are of a general nature will be incorporated. 36 Cyc. 1152 (v).

We recommend, therefore, that the judgments of the Court of Civil Appeals and of the district court be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court, with instruction to dismiss, for want of jurisdiction, that part of the intervenor's plea seeking condemnation.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

MURRAY v. HOUSTON CAR WHEEL & MACHINE CO. (No. 109-2954.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 9, 1920.)

Master and servant §278(20)—Evidence held to show breach of duty to warn.

In an action by a foundry employé, injured while standing on a ladder shaken by a crane, so that he caught the rail on which the crane traveled with his hand, to save himself from falling, evidence held to warrant a finding that plaintiff's injury was due to the breach by defendant employer of its nondelegable duty to give warning of the crane's approach.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. W. Murray against the Houston Car Wheel & Machine Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and remanded (181 S. W. 241), and plaintiff brings error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed and remanded, on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Presley K. Ewing, of Houston, and L. E. Blankenbecker, of New York City, for plaintiff in error.

Andrews, Streetman, Burns & Lague, of Houston, for defendant in error.

SADLER, P. J. We will refer to the parties as they were designated in the trial court. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the district court against the Houston Car Wheel & Machine Company, from which an appeal was perfected by defendant.

The Court of Civil Appeals first affirmed the judgment, holding that the evidence amply sustained the findings of the jury as to the violation of a nondelegable duty of the defendant in failure to warn plaintiff of the danger resulting in the injury. On rehearing, Judge Walthall dissenting, it set aside its former judgment, holding that Brown was not a vice principal as to plaintiff, and that the duty to warn did not rest upon defendant as nondelegable. 181 S. W. 241.

A careful reading of the opinions upon which the judgment is based manifests that the Court of Civil Appeals finds that the evidence on the issue of Brown's vice principalship is sufficient to support the finding of the jury as to those servants employed in his department. We construe the opinion on rehearing to be that on the facts disclosed Brown was not a vice principal as to Murray solely because his power to employ and discharge him was lacking.

A very careful review of the authorities touching the question of vice principal has satisfied us that the Court of Civil Appeals has failed to give the full legal effect to the evidence, and has been too restrictive in an application of the law to the facts. We will pretermitt a discussion of this question, as we think that the more important question arises on the breach of a nondelegable duty to warn the injured party of the act of defendant which rendered unsafe the place assigned for his work.

On the question of the nondelegable duty of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff a safe place to work, and whether that duty incorporated within it the further duty of the master to warn the servant before doing any act which rendered his position dangerous, we think the evidence presents the issue of a breach of that duty. It is true that Murray was using tools of the master which he selected, and was pursuing his own judgment in the manner of the performance of the work. However, the master had assigned the place where the work should be done. In the performance of that assignment it was incumbent upon Murray to be at the place and in the position occupied at the time of the injury. The master knew, or could have known, that the work was being done at this place and in the manner pursued. Murray was instructed to do this work at this place. The master knew, or could have known by the exercise of proper care, that, when the crane was in operation in the usual course of the business of the foundry, it would render unsafe the place at which Murray was working under the circumstances surrounding his position and the character of work being done.

The place and the manner of doing the work threatened no danger to Murray, so long as the crane was motionless. The place and position of Murray were rendered perilous only when the master, in the performance of the ordinary business of his foundry, used the crane in the performance of that business in its usual way. When the crane was moved, it caused the station where Murray was working to jar and shake to such an extent as to render insecure the ladder upon which he was standing and to make his position perilous. The master had knowledge of this fact, or could have known it. Murray did not know it. He had worked on the north side of the building in safety. He did not know of the effect produced upon the south side by the operation of the crane; nor did he know that the crane was to be moved while he was in the place assigned him to work.

Conceding that the building was safe for the ordinary purposes for which intended, and for the use to which it was being put, this will not relieve or excuse the master from the performance of a duty which he owed to an employé whom he placed at work under the circumstances surrounding Murray. The place where Murray was working was safe, so long as the crane was not in operation. This will not excuse the master for changing that condition of safety into one of peril, without exercising care for the servant. The place being safe when Murray began his work, he had the right to rest in confidence that it would so remain, or that, should the master desire to do some act rendering it unsafe to him, he would be given an opportunity to take steps for his protection.

As we understand the doctrine of safe place, the master cannot change its character of safety to the peril of the unsuspecting servant, without presenting him with an opportunity to avoid the consequences which might result from the changed conditions. 51 L. R. A. 593, note at bottom first column; Jacques v. Mfg. Co., 66 N. H. 482, 22 Atl. 552, 13 L. R. A. 824. The duty devolved upon the company to protect Murray from transitory dangers which were brought into existence by the master in the usual course of operation of the plant, or at least to warn him of such danger in time to permit him to provide against it or escape its effect. Railway Co. v. Garrett, 73 Tex. 262, 13 S. W. 62, 15 Am. St. Rep. 781; Railway Co. v. Watts, 63 Tex. 549; Id., 64 Tex. 568; Railway Co. v. Hall, 78 Tex. 657, 15 S. W. 108; 16 R. C. L. p. 560, § 78.

We are of the opinion that under the facts of this case the evidence raised the issue of the duty of the master to exercise reasonable care to keep the place where Murray was working safe; also the duty to warn him of the contemplated movement of the crane, that he might have an opportunity of taking steps to avoid the consequences of the danger arising therefrom; that these duties are non-delegable; that they were incumbent upon the master. Houston Light & Power Co. v. Conley (Civ. App.) 171 S. W. 561.

On rehearing, the Court of Civil Appeals did not pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence, or hold that the judgment of the trial court is against the weight of the evidence, but erroneously applied the law to the facts.

We therefore recommend that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for further proceeding in accordance with this opinion. Tweed v. W. U. T. Co., 107 Tex. 247, 168 S. W. 696, 177 S. W. 957.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We agree with the conclusion of the Commission of Appeals that there was evidence warranting the finding of the jury that the plaintiff's injury was due to the breach by the defendant of a non-delegable duty, and rest the decision upon that ground.

This holding makes immaterial the question as to whether the foreman was a vice principal, and we express no opinion upon that question.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is reversed and the case remanded to that court.

HARRELL et ux. v. ST. LOUIS & S. W. RY.
CO. OF TEXAS. (No. 147-3093.)(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 9, 1920.)1. Railroads \S 350(13) — Evidence held to raise an issue of contributory negligence of automobile driver.

In an action by husband and wife for injuries to the wife and her automobile in a crossing collision, evidence held sufficient to support finding either for plaintiffs or for defendant railroad on the issue of contributory negligence of the wife in failing to discover the railroad's approaching motorcar in time to have stopped her automobile.

2. Railroads \S 351(12) — Requested special charge on contributory negligence held correct.

In an action by husband and wife for injuries to the wife and her automobile in a crossing collision, requested special issue whether a reasonably prudent person in the exercise of ordinary care under the same circumstances would have driven across the track as did plaintiff wife held to have correctly presented the issue of contributory negligence.

3. Trial \S 352(1) — Special issue in action for crossing collision misleading as assuming fact.

In an action by husband and wife for injuries to wife and her automobile in a crossing collision, special issue whether plaintiff wife by the exercise of ordinary care would have seen the approaching train in time to have stopped before collision had she been keeping a lookout held erroneous as misleading and confusing, and as assuming that the wife was not keeping a lookout.

4. Judgment \S 256(2)—Findings held not to warrant judgment for plaintiffs in view of answers to issues.

In action by husband and wife against a railroad for injuries to the wife and her automobile in a crossing collision, error in instructing the jury as a matter of law that it was the duty of plaintiff wife to keep a lookout held not to warrant trial court in rendering judgment for plaintiffs in face of answer of jury that plaintiff wife would have seen the approaching train in time had she kept a lookout, and that her failure to keep a lookout caused or contributed to the accident.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Ninth
Supreme Judicial District.

Action by C. H. Harrell and wife against the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed and rendered judgment for defendant (194 S. W. 971), and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded for new trial on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Woods, King & John, of Houston, and I. D. Fairchild, of Lufkin, for plaintiffs in error.

E. B. Perkins, of Dallas, Daniel Upthegrove, of St. Louis, Mo., Marsh & McIlwaine, of Tyler, and Denman & Thomas, of Lufkin, for defendant in error.

McCLENDON, J. C. H. Harrell and wife brought this suit against the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas to recover for personal injuries sustained by Mrs. Harrell, and for damages to an automobile belonging to her. The accident occurred at about 11 o'clock a. m., May 21, 1915, and was the result of a collision between the automobile, which was being driven by Mrs. Harrell in a northeasterly direction along Abney avenue, a public street in the city of Lufkin, and a motorcar traveling in a southeasterly direction on the main line of defendant railway. The cause was submitted to a jury upon special issues, and upon the jury's findings both sides moved for judgment and in the alternative for a new trial. Defendant's motions were overruled, and judgment was rendered for plaintiffs. The Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the trial court and rendered judgment for defendant, in the view that the findings of the jury supported defendant's plea of contributory negligence. 194 S. W. 971. Writ of error was granted by the Committee of Judges upon a notation that in their opinion the cause should have been remanded to the trial court for further trial, instead of rendered in favor of defendant.

The findings of the jury upon the question of primary negligence on the part of defendant were in favor of plaintiffs upon two grounds: (1) That the motorcar was traveling at a rate of speed in excess of six miles an hour, in violation of a city ordinance; and (2) that the operatives of defendant's motorcar failed to keep the proper lookout to discover Mrs. Harrell. The negligence in each of these respects was found to be the proximate cause of the damages sued for. The correctness of these findings is not assailed. The questions presented here relate only to the defense of contributory negligence. Upon that issue the court submitted and the jury answered three questions, as follows:

"Special Issue No. 11. Did Mrs. C. H. Harrell, plaintiff, see the approaching train in time to have stopped her automobile before the same collided with the train?" Answer: "No."

"Special Issue No. 13. Would the plaintiff, Mrs. C. H. Harrell, by the exercise of ordinary care, have seen the approaching train in time to have stopped her automobile before the same collided with said train if she had been keeping a lookout for said train." Answer: "Yea."

"Special Issue No. 14. Did the failure of Mrs. C. H. Harrell to keep a lookout for said train cause or contribute to the injury, if any, to her automobile and to herself?" Answer: "Yea."

[1] We do not deem it necessary to make an extended statement of the facts in the case. The evidence was sufficient to support a finding either for the plaintiffs or the defendant upon the issue of contributory negligence on the part of Mrs. Harrell in failing to discover the motorcar in time to have stopped her automobile. At the street crossing in question, Abney avenue runs in a slightly northeasterly direction, and is intersected by eight tracks of defendant. Numbering these tracks from west to east, the accident occurred on track No. 7. Track No. 1 is about 200 feet to the west of track No. 7, which intersects Abney avenue at an angle of about 68 degrees 18 minutes. This angle of intersection would throw a motorcar approaching the crossing from the north slightly to the rear of one on Abney avenue approaching from the west. The automobile was a left-hand drive; consequently, Mrs. Harrell was on the north side of the auto and the approach side of the motorcar. She was accompanied by two of her lady friends, all of whom were on the front seat of the auto. She testified that just before reaching track No. 1 she looked north towards Tyler, as well as south towards Lutkin, and saw no car approaching. She again looked north just after crossing track No. 1, and saw no car. She did not look again until just before getting to the main line track, when she discovered the motorcar within a few feet of her. Her first impulse was to stop; but, realizing that she could not do so in time to avoid a collision, she made every effort to cross in front of the car, which struck the rear left wheel of the auto, turning it partially around, and causing the injuries and damage complained of. At the two points where Mrs. Harrell claims to have looked towards the north, there were some obstructions that would prevent a clear view of the main line track. How far she could have seen the motorcar from either of these points was a disputed question. Her testimony placed this distance at about 300 feet north of the crossing. The testimony placed the speed of the motorcar at as high as 24 miles an hour, while Mrs. Harrell's testimony was that she was not exceeding one-third of that rate. Mrs. Harrell was familiar with this crossing, and familiar with the fact that the motorcar was due to arrive at Lutkin at about the time she approached the crossing.

As above stated, the evidence raised the issue of contributory negligence on Mrs. Harrell's part, and would have warranted a finding thereon either for the plaintiffs or defendant.

Plaintiffs objected to the charges above quoted upon contributory negligence upon various grounds, which we need not set out in full. Among them, it is claimed that special issue No. 13 assumes that Mrs. Harrell was not keeping a lookout for the train, and further assumes that it was her duty under the law to keep such lookout. Plaintiffs requested, but the court refused to give, the following special issue:

"Would a reasonably prudent person, in the exercise of ordinary care, under the same or similar circumstances, have driven across the railroad track as did Mrs. Harrell?"

[2, 3] The action of the trial court in overruling plaintiffs' objections to special issue No. 13, and in refusing the special charge last quoted, were cross assigned as error in the Court of Civil Appeals. We think these grounds of error are well taken. The special charge requested correctly presents the issue of contributory negligence. Special issue No. 13 is, to say the least, misleading and confusing, and in our opinion susceptible of the construction placed thereon by plaintiffs. We are clearly of opinion that the Court of Civil Appeals committed error in rendering judgment for defendant.

It is earnestly insisted by plaintiffs that the action of the trial court in rendering judgment in their favor upon the verdict of the jury should be affirmed. This contention is based upon the proposition that the findings of the jury upon the special issues are not susceptible of the construction that there was an affirmative finding in favor of defendant upon the issue of contributory negligence, and that, as the defendant made no request for a correct instruction upon this issue, it was within the province of the trial court to make a finding thereon not inconsistent with the evidence; and that court having rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, its judgment in that regard should not be disturbed. We are not able to accede to this reasoning. Special issue No. 13, in our opinion, is not free from ambiguity. If we resolve this ambiguity in favor of plaintiffs, and read the issue in the light most favorable to defendant, it may be paraphrased as follows:

Gentlemen of the Jury: You are instructed that Mrs. Harrell did not keep a lookout for the train, and that it was her duty under the law to keep such lookout. Now, bearing in mind these instructions, you will answer this question: If she had been keeping a lookout for said train, would she by the exercise of ordinary care have seen it approaching in time to have stopped her automobile before the same collided with said train?

[4] We agree with the contention of plaintiffs that under the evidence in this case it was not the duty of Mrs. Harrell, as a matter of law, to keep a lookout, and that the instruction as paraphrased was erroneous. The evidence of Mrs. Harrell, as above shown, is that she looked twice in the direction of the train, and failed to see it. Under all the evidence, we think the jury would have been warranted in finding that she took such precautions as an ordinarily prudent person would have taken under the same or similar circumstances. We think the contrary conclusion is likewise one which the jury might reasonably have drawn from the evidence. It was therefore error for the court under these circumstances to charge the jury as a matter of law that it was the duty of Mrs. Harrell to keep a lookout; but this error of law would not warrant the trial court in rendering judgment for the plaintiffs in the face of the answer of the jury to that issue and special issue No. 14 to the effect that, if she had been keeping a lookout, she would, by the use of ordinary care, have seen the approaching train in time to have stopped her automobile before the collision, and that such failure caused or contributed to the injury. To so hold would deprive the defendant of any right to have the issue of contributory negligence submitted to the jury. Where the trial court has committed an error of law in peremptorily instructing the jury upon the duties and obligations of one of the parties, and has then submitted an issue based upon this erroneous instruction, it would not be correct practice to hold that the court would have the power, after this issue is answered favorably to one of the parties, to then disregard the verdict of the jury and render judgment for the other party, upon the theory that the finding of the jury based upon an erroneous instruction as to the law of the case was tantamount to a complete absence of finding upon the issue.

It is earnestly urged by plaintiffs that the action of the trial court in rendering judgment in their favor upon the verdict is supported by the cases of Hovey v. Sanders (Civ. App.) 174 S. W. 1025, and Turner v. M. K. & T. (Civ. App.) 177 S. W. 204. We do not deem it necessary to review those cases. Their careful perusal will fail to disclose any conflict between their holdings and the views we have herein expressed.

We conclude that the judgments of the trial court and Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission upon the question discussed.

WILSON v. J. W. CROWDUS DRUG CO.
et al. (No. 125-3003.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
June 9, 1920.)

1. Principal and surety — 14—Where debt of another assumed, such other becomes surety as to the creditor.

Where an assumption has been accepted by the payee, the assumpor becomes the principal and the original debtor is surety as to the creditor, unless otherwise specially contracted by the parties.

2. Principal and surety — 97—Surety whether injured or not is discharged by unauthorized change of contract.

Whether injury results to the surety or not, the creditor has no right to make any contract with the principal changing the contract without the consent of the surety to the contract actually made.

3. Principal and surety — 14—For debtor to become surety, assumption of debt by another must be accepted by creditor.

For a debtor to obtain the advantage that may have accrued to him as surety by reason of the fact that the extension actually given by the creditor to the purchasers of the debtor's stock of goods assuming the debt was different from that consented to by the debtor, it was incumbent upon the debtor to establish an unconditional acceptance by the creditor of the assumption by the purchasers of the debt.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Seventh Supreme Judicial District.

Action by the J. W. Crowdus Drug Company and others against Howard T. Wilson. Judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (190 S. W. 194), and defendant brings error. Affirmed on the recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

Ben H. Stone, of Amarillo, for plaintiff in error.

Reeder & Dooley, of Amarillo, for defendants in error.

SADLER, P. J. The material assignment in this case calls in question the correctness of the trial court's action in giving a peremptory instruction in favor of defendant in error against plaintiff in error, and the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals affirming the judgment of the trial court on a verdict returned in response to the peremptory instruction.

To an understanding of the case, it is necessary to recur to the pleadings and evidence, for the purpose of ascertaining the issues made and the evidence affecting them.

Plaintiff's original petition was filed January 28, 1915. It was introduced in evidence on the trial by the plaintiff, to show that the cause of action declared upon in the original petition is declared upon in the amended pe-tion. It is there alleged that, beginning with the 30th day of August, 1913, and to June 22, 1914, plaintiff in error, Howard T. Wilson, was engaged in the retail drug business at Sweetwater, Nolen county, Tex., and during said time purchased from plaintiff the J. W. Crowdus Drug Company certain goods, wares, and merchandise, aggregating $2,050; that Wilson sold his business to T. B. Holman and C. W. Carder, and at that time took a chattel mortgage on certain fixtures to secure the payment of this amount to the plaintiff; that plaintiff accepted the assumption by Holman and Carder of the amount due it on Wilson's account; but that it did not release Wilson from his original liability. It is alleged that, after the assumption of the account, it was renewed and extended, with the express consent of Wilson, by the acceptance of $250 cash from Holman and Carder and 12 notes of Holman-Carder Drug Company, payable to plaintiff, all dated Amarillo, Tex., October 1, 1914, 11 for $157.50 each, and the last note for $157.33, all bearing 10 per cent. interest from date, providing for 10 per cent. attorney's fees, and containing conditional maturity clauses, the first note due on the 1st day of November, 1914, and one on the first of each following month; alleging the maturity of the first note and failure to pay same, and the exercise of the option by plaintiff of declaring all of said notes due. Judgment is prayed against Holman and Carder and Wilson.

After answer by the defendant Wilson pleading his release as surety by reason of the extension, and also alleging his discharge on account of the acceptance by the plaintiff of the cash and notes of Holman-Carder Drug Company in payment and novation of the original account, an amended petition was filed by plaintiff setting up practically the same facts as alleged in the original petition, pleading the insolvency of Holman and Carder, and seeking judgment against Howard T. Wilson alone for the sum of $1,800, with interest as due upon the original account, and asking for a foreclosure of the mortgage against all of the defendants.

It developed on the trial that Howard T. Wilson sold his drug business to Holman and Carder on June 22, 1914; that as a part of the consideration for the sale the purchaser assumed the indebtedness due by Wilson to the Crowdus Drug Company. Thereafter, some time in September, demand was made by the plaintiff on Holman and Carder for payment of the account. They requested an extension. On the 25th day of September, 1914, R. E. Bramlett, acting as agent for plaintiff—having in his hands the accounts for collection—wrote to Howard T. Wilson:

"I have after making thorough inquiries about Mr. Carder recommended that Holman and Carder be given additional time—the account to be settled by a cash payment of $250 on October 1st and the balance to be paid in twelve equal monthly installments."

Ben H. Stone, acting for Wilson, replied to that letter by telegram of September 29, 1914, addressed to Crowdus Drug Company:

"Replying to Bramlett's letter to Howard Wilson am authorized to wire you to give additional time on basis of $250 cash balance in twelve equal monthly payments."

Thereafter the extension agreement was made and consummated. Holman-Carder Drug Company paid $250 cash and executed the notes described in the pleading, which were by Bramlett delivered to the plaintiff and the account credited with the cash and notes. The notes were charged to Holman-Carder Drug Company. The $250 cash and the notes were credited by the Crowdus Drug Company upon the account of Howard T. Wilson.

After the evidence was in, the court instructed the jury peremptorily to return a verdict for the plaintiff against Wilson for $1,772.39, and a like verdict for Wilson against Holman and Carder. The Court of Civil Appeals sustained this action of the court, and affirmed the judgment. 190 S. W. 194. Writ of error has been granted to the judgment of affirmance.

We have not undertaken to give any further statement of the pleading or evidence than as same may be necessary for the decision of the question before us. The real question is whether there were any issues presented by the pleading and raised by the evidence touching the liability of Wilson which should have been submitted to the jury for its decision.

[1] It is urged by the plaintiff in error, Wilson, that the pleadings and evidence showed his release by virtue of the renewal and extension transaction consummated between the Crowdus Drug Company and Holman-Carder Drug Company, and that judgment should here be rendered discharging him; or, alternately, that the peremptory charge was error, and that he should have been permitted to go to the jury on the issues raised. It is well established that, where an assumption has been accepted by the payee, the assumpor becomes the principal and the original debtor is surety as to the creditor, unless otherwise specially contracted by the parties. Hill v. Huelldtke, 104 Tex. 594, 142 S. W. 871, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 672; Hardware Co. v. Wells, 90 Tex. 110, 37 S. W. 411, 59 Am. St. Rep. 783; Benson v. Phipps, 87 Tex. 578, 29 S. W. 1061, 47 Am. St. Rep. 128; Dean & Co. v. Collins, 15 N. D. 535, 108 N. W. 242, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, 125 Am. St. Rep. 610, 11 Ann. Cas. 1027; 21 R. C. L. 955, § 10.

[2] Whether injury results to the surety or not, the creditor has no right to make any contract with the principal changing the contract, without the consent of the surety to the contract actually made. Casey-Swasey Co. v. Anderson, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 223, 83 S. W. 840.

[3] In passing upon the question of suretyship, the Court of Civil Appeals holds that, by the transaction between Wilson and Holman and Carder, the latter became the principals, and Wilson a surety between themselves, but that this did not necessarily render Wilson a surety as to appellee, so as to entitle him to the treatment and protection of a surety for the debt; that this will depend upon whether appellee consented to change the character of Wilson's liability from principal to surety.

In the view of the record as here disclosed, the Supreme Court has indicated that it is of the opinion that—

"In this case there was no change in Wilson's relationship to the debt through the drug company's acceptance of Holman's and Carder's assumption of it. The allegation in the original petition relied on as the evidence establishing that the assumption had the effect to make Wilson merely a surety, expressly states that the plaintiff accepted the assumption 'without in anywise releasing the said Howard Wilson, the original debtor, from his liability, which still continues.'"

In this view of the record, the acceptance pleaded being a conditional acceptance, it is treated as insufficient to establish the relationship of surety as between the Crowds Drug Company and Wilson; his primary liability continuing. In order to obtain the advantage which may have accrued to him as a surety, by reason of the extension actually given to Carder and Holman, being different from that consented to by Wilson, it was incumbent upon him to establish an unconditional acceptance of the assumption by the purchasers of the stock of goods of the debt which he owed to the Crowds Drug Company.

In this view the Court of Civil Appeals correctly disposed of the case, and its judgment should be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

MOSS et al. v. RISHWORTH. (No. 132-3025.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 2, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1094(1)—Conclusion of Court of Civil Appeals on facts will not be disturbed.

Where the Court of Civil Appeals reversed and remanded a judgment on the theory that the verdict was unauthorized by the evidence, its conclusion on the facts will not be disturbed on writ of error.

2. Physicians and surgeons \S 12—Before operating, physician must obtain consent of patient or one authorized to give consent.

Before performing an operation, a physician must obtain the consent of his patient if competent to give it, or, if not, of some one under the circumstances who would legally be authorized to give the requisite consent, though, of course, if a person be injured to the extent that he is unconscious and his injuries require prompt surgical attention, a physician may be justified in applying such treatment as is reasonably necessary for the preservation of life or limb, and consent will be implied.

3. Parent and child \S 12—Sister having temporary custody of minor does not have authority to give consent to operation.

The sister of a minor who was intrusted with the child's temporary custody does not have authority to give consent to an operation, but only the father of the child may give consent.

4. Death \S 15—Unauthorized surgical operation held actionable.

Where surgeons operated on a child without authority, so that it amounted to a technical assault for which the child could have recovered had she survived, the parent has a cause of action under Rev. St. 1911, \S 4695, giving an action for death resulting from injuries where the injured person could have maintained an action if death had not ensued, and it is not dependent on the extent of the injury to the minor child.

5. Physicians and surgeons \S 12—Operation performed without consent of minor's parent not justified because necessary.

Where surgeons, without obtaining the consent of a minor's parents, but with the consent of the sister of the child in whose custody she temporarily was, operated on the child for diseased tonsils, the failure to obtain the parents' consent cannot be justified on the ground that the operation was necessary, and that if the tonsils were not removed serious results might have followed; it not appearing that there was any emergency.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by William H. Rishworth against Robert E. Moss and another. Judgment for defendants was on plaintiffs' appeal reversed and remanded by the Court of Civil Appeals (191 S. W. 843), and defendants bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals affirmed.

See, also, 159 S. W. 122.

H. C. Carter, Champe G. Carter, Randolph L. Carter, and Perry J. Lewis, all of San Antonio, for plaintiffs in error.

Leo Tarleton and Ryan & Matlock, all of San Antonio, for defendant in error.

SPENCER, J. Defendant in error, William H. Rishworth, sued plaintiffs in error, Robert E. Moss and Lewis K. Beck, for performing an operation upon his eleven year old child, Imogene, alleging that the operation, which resulted in the death of the child, was performed without his consent.

Imogene lived with her parents at Center Point, 60 miles distant from San Antonio. On May 8, 1910, the father placed her in the immediate care and custody of her adult sister, Clara, and permitted her to go with her to San Antonio. Clara, who had had three years' experience in training to become a graduate nurse, took Imogene to Dr. Moss, stating to him that she had brought her down to have her examined to ascertain whether an operation was needed for the removal of adenoids, explaining that the child had difficulty in breathing and was subject to attacks of rheumatism. An examination by Dr. Moss disclosed badly diseased tonsils and the appearance of adenoids, and he informed them that a real necessity existed for an operation to remove the diseased tonsils and adenoids.

Having agreed upon a date for the operation, Imogene returned with Clara and another sister, Nellie, who had had two years' training as a nurse. After an examination of the heart, an anesthetic was administered, and the tonsils and adenoids removed; but, before coming from under the influence of the anesthetic, the child died.

Defendant in error by amended pleading abandoned all allegations of negligence and unskillfulness, and relied for recovery solely upon the ground that the operation was without his consent. The court instructed the jury that if plaintiffs in error, without the consent of the parents, operated upon the child, using an anesthetic, and that she died as the result of the operation or the effect of the chloroform or both, to find for the defendant in error, without regard to any question of negligence or unskillfulness.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs in error, and a judgment was rendered in their favor. Upon appeal the Court of Civil Appeals held that the plaintiffs in error failed to show that the adult daughters or either of them had any authority, expressed or implied, to have the operation performed upon the minor sister. The court also held that, as the child, on account of her minority, could not, and the parents did not, give consent, had she survived the operation, she would have had a cause of action as for a technical assault and battery, and that therefore the parents, in virtue of article 4695, R. S. 1911, have a cause of action. 191 S. W. 843. The writ was granted upon application referred to the Committee of Judges.

[1] The Court of Civil Appeals in the exercise of its power having reversed and remanded the judgment of the trial court upon the theory that the verdict in favor of plaintiffs in error was unauthorized by the evidence, its conclusion on the facts will not be disturbed, nor will its judgment be reversed, unless it has committed errors of substantive law rendering its conclusion on the facts immaterial.

[2] This leads us to consider whether the sisters as temporary custodians of the child had the right to give consent to the operation; or whether the physicians' act in performing it was justified, regardless of the parent's consent, upon the ground that the paramount interest of the child demanded the operation. The authorities are unanimous in holding that a surgeon is liable for operating upon a patient, unless he obtains the consent of the patient, if competent to give such consent, or, if not, of some one who, under the circumstances, would be legally authorized to give the requisite consent. If a person should be injured to the extent that he is unconscious, and his injuries of such nature as to require prompt surgical attention, a physician called to attend would be justified in applying such treatment as might reasonably be necessary for the preservation of his life or limb, and consent on the part of the injured person would be implied upon the ground of an existing emergency. Mohr v. Williams, 95 Minn. 261, 104 N. W. 12, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439, 111 Am. St. Rep. 462, 5 Ann. Cas. 303; Pratt v. Davis, 224 Ill. 300, 79 N. E. 562, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609, 8 Ann. Cas. 197; Rotater v. Strain, 39 Okl. 572, 137 Pac. 96, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880; Schloendorff v. Society of New York Hospital, 211 N. Y. 125, 105 N. E. 92, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 505, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 581.

[3-5] The evidence is to the effect that the germs, seeping from the diseased parts, and carried by means of the circulation of the blood, permeate and poison the system, and unless arrested by an operation such as was had in this case will eventually undermine the whole constitution and result in death. The evidence shows that there was an absolute necessity for a prompt operation, but not emergent in the sense that death would likely result immediately upon failure to perform it. In fact, it is not contended that any real danger would have resulted to the child had time been taken to consult the parent with reference to the operation. Therefore the operation was not justified upon the ground that an emergency existed.

The physicians, acting in good faith, in assuming the sisters had authority to give consent, undertook to perform the operation, and, although the operation was skillfully performed and without negligence, death ensued, either as the result of the operation or of administering the anesthetic, or both. The sisters were but the temporary custodians of the child, and as such temporary custodians had no authority to give consent to perform the operation in the absence of an emergency. The parent was the only one who could legally give consent to perform it, and, if not given, the physicians' act in performing it was a legal wrong. If performed without the consent of the parent, it would amount to a technical assault for which the child could have recovered had she survived the operation, and it follows that, under article 4695, the cause of action would survive to the defendant in error, not dependent, however, upon the extent of the injuries to the minor child.

It is insisted that the paramount interest of the child alone must be considered in determining whether such an operation shall be performed, and that if health demanded an operation, and that, if skillfully performed, no cause of action would arise, even though it resulted disastrously. The law wisely reposes in the parent the care and custody of the minor child, and neither a physician nor those in temporary custody of the child will be permitted, in a case of this character, to determine those matters touching its welfare.

We recommend, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing and remanding the cause be affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

KINNEY v. TRI-STATE TELEPHONE CO. et al. (No. 175-3190.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section B.
May 26, 1920.)

1. Divorce \S 156 — Interlocutory judgment does not dissolve marriage.

Interlocutory divorce order, "that when one year shall have expired after the entry of this interlocutory judgment a final judgment and decree shall be entered granting a divorce herein," etc., held not to have dissolved the bonds of matrimony.

2. Judgment \S 216—"Interlocutory judgment" defined.

A judgment which leaves something further to be determined and adjudicated by the court in disposing of the parties and their rights is "interlocutory."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interlocutory Decree or Judgment.]

3. Judgment \S 217—Requisites of a "final judgment" stated.

A "final judgment" should contain the judicial ascertainment of the facts, together with the manner of their ascertainment and a recorded declaration of the court pronouncing the legal consequences upon the facts thus ascertained.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment.]

4. Marriage \S 40(6, 10)—Presumption that first wife has been divorced on proof of a second marriage.

On proof that deceased had been married to both women claiming to have been his lawful wife at time of his death, the presumption, in absence of other proof, is that the subsequent marriage was lawful and that he had obtained a divorce from wife by first marriage; but such presumption is rebutted by proof that no divorce has been granted.

5. Divorce \S 156—Final judgment after death of husband for whom interlocutory decree had been rendered held not valid.

Where husband for whom interlocutory divorce judgment had been rendered died before entry of final judgment but after expiration of the year he was required to wait before final judgment could be entered, the final judgment where not entered nunc pro tunc had no validity as a judgment.

6. Marriage \S 40(10)—Interlocutory divorce decree from first wife held to rebut presumption of validity of second marriage.

In an action for death benefit, involving question of whether deceased's first or second wife was entitled thereto, evidence of interlocutory divorce judgment against first wife held to break down prima facie case for second wife established by proof of her marriage and to present issue as to whether deceased had married second wife without being divorced from first wife, in rebuttal of presumption of validity of second marriage; such judgment not severing bonds of matrimony with first wife and negating any presumption that divorce had been obtained in any other jurisdiction.

7. Appeal and error \S 1082(1)—Holding of Court of Civil Appeals as to inadmissibility of evidence held reviewable by Supreme Court.

Holding of Court of Civil Appeals that judgment roll was inadmissible in evidence to prove no divorce had been granted from deceased's first wife, under allegation that she was his lawful wife at the time of his death, held reviewable by Supreme Court, being based upon a legal conclusion in contravention of established rule in the state.

8. Marriage \S 39—Judgment roll held admissible under the pleadings to prove no divorce.

In an action for death benefit involving issue of whether deceased's first or second wife was entitled thereto, judgment roll in divorce action against first wife held admissible to prove first wife was not divorced, under allegation that she was his lawful wife at time of his death.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Eighth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Elsie Kinney and another against the Tri-State Telephone Company, in which Nellie Kinney intervened. Judgment for intervener was reversed and judgment was rendered for named plaintiff by Court of Civil Appeals (201 S. W. 1180), and intervener brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of trial court affirmed.

Charles H. Haines, of Denver, Colo., and Archibald Dorman, and Joseph M. Nealon, both of El Paso, for plaintiff in error.

Jno. T. Hill, Leigh Clark, Dell W. Harrington, and Turney, Culwell, Holliday & Pollard, all of El Paso, for defendants in error.

SADLER, P. J. This case is before us upon writ of error to the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals, in which the judgment of the trial court is reversed and judgment rendered for the appellant, Elsie Kinney. 201 S. W. 1180. The statement and findings of fact by the Court of Civil Appeals are as follows:

"Elsie Kinney and Nellie O'Favenger brought this suit as the wife and mother of H. B. Kinney, deceased, against the Tri-State Telephone Company for $3,060, being the amount of a benefit fund in the latter's hands, due, under a plan of insurance to be hereinafter described, to them as the beneficiaries therein. Nellie Kinney intervened and claims the fund, alleging that she was the lawful wife of said Kinney, and, further, that she had not been divorced from deceased. The telephone company answered that it had the money; that, by the terms of the contract, it was payable, first to the wife of deceased, second to the children, and third to the dependent relatives, and that in the absence of either to lapse, tendered the money into court, to be paid to the party to whom the court determined by its judgment it should be paid. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of intervenor, Nellie Kinney, for the entire fund.

"Findings of Facts.

"The findings of facts by the trial court are very lengthy, so we make such statement of the undisputed facts as are, in our judgment, pertinent to the issues raised by the assignments and counter propositions of appellee.

"Harry B. Kinney and Nellie Flaherty were married June 16, 1909, separated October 5, 1911, and never lived together afterwards. She continued to live in the state of Colorado to the date of the institution of this suit. March 26, 1914, he filed his complaint for divorce in the court of Los Angeles county, Cal. Service was had by delivering a summons to Nellie Kinney in Colorado, and on August 19, 1914, the following judgment was entered:

"In the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles.
"Harry B. Kinney, Plaintiff, vs. Nellie Kinney, Defendant. Interlocutory Judgment by Default in Action for Divorce.

"This cause came on regularly to be heard the 19th day of August, 1914, before the said superior court, in department 5 thereof; Geo. S. Richardson appearing as attorney for plaintiff herein, and no one appearing for said defendant. And it appearing that the defendant was duly served with process herein, and said defendant not having answered plaintiff's complaint herein, within the time provided by law or otherwise; and the default of the defendant for not answering the said complaint having been duly entered herein in the manner provided by law; and evidence having been introduced on behalf of said plaintiff at said hearing of this cause; and said cause having been submitted to the court for its consideration and decision:

"Now therefore said court, having duly considered the same, makes its findings of fact and decision as follows. The court finds that all of the allegations contained in the complaint are true, and that a divorce ought to be granted as prayed for in said complaint. Wherefore it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plaintiff is entitled to a divorce from the defendant; that when one year shall have expired after the entry of this interlocutory judgment a final judgment and decree shall be entered granting a divorce herein, wherein and whereby the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said plaintiff and said defendant shall be dissolved, and at that time the court shall grant such other and further relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of this action.

"Done in open court this 19th day of August, A. D. 1914. Charles Wellborn, Judge."

"On November 14, 1914, Harry B. Kinney and Elsie Kinney were married and lived together as husband and wife to his death. She believed that he had obtained a divorce, though she later and before his death, found and read the above decree. Concerning the matters next above she testified:

"We became engaged some time about the first of December, 1912. I knew he had been married. He told me he had been married and he intended getting a divorce when I first met him—when I had known him about a week. I learned that he actually instituted a suit for divorce. I did not understand that an interlocutory decree had been entered before our marriage. I did not know anything about what happened to the case. I thought I knew he had been divorced because he told me he had. I did not see a copy of the decree before we were married, but I did before Harry's death see a copy of the interlocutory decree. I read it. It was about December 1, 1912, when we became engaged. That was during his first trip to Raton."

"On January 14, 1916, Harry B. Kinney was accidentally killed while in the service of the telephone company.

"On February 10, 1916, deceased's attorneys of record appeared in the court of Los Angeles, and upon motion the above decree was made final by the following decree: * * *

"Harry B. Kinney, Plaintiff, vs. Nellie Kinney, Defendant. Final Decree of Divorce.

"This cause came on regularly to be heard the 19th day of August, A. D. 1914, Geo. S. Richardson appearing as attorney for plaintiff herein, and not any one appearing for said defendant, and said defendant having been duly served with summons and copy of complaint herein, and said defendant not having answered plaintiff's complaint herein within the time provided by law or otherwise, and the default of said defendant for not answering said complaint having therefore been duly entered herein in the manner provided by law, and evidence having been introduced on behalf of said plaintiff herein on said 19th day of August, A. D. 1914, and said cause having been submitted to the court for its consideration and decision, and the court having duly considered the same, filed its findings of fact and decision in writing therein on said 19th day of August, 1914, and on said 20th day of August, 1914, entered its interlocutory decree ordering and decreeing that upon the expiration of the period of one year from the date of entry of said interlocutory decree a final judgment and decree be entered herein ordering and decreeing that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said plaintiff and said defendant be dissolved, and freeing them and each of them from each and all of the obligations thereof, and said findings of fact and conclusions of law, and said interlocutory decree, having been duly filed and entered, and said period of one year having elapsed since the entry of said interlocutory decree, and no appeal having been taken from said interlocutory decree, and said interlocutory decree not having been modified or set aside, and the same being in full force and effect, and said plaintiff, Harry B. Kinney, through his attorney, Geo. S. Richardson, having in open court on this day, to wit, the 10th day of February, A. D. 1916, moved said superior court in and for the county of Los Angeles, is department 5 thereof, for a final order, judgment, and decree in accordance with said findings of fact and conclusions of law, and said interlocutory decree and said motion having been duly heard and no one appearing to contest the same, said motion was duly granted by said court, and said court having made its order that a final order, judgment, and decree be made and entered herein in accordance with said findings of fact and conclusions of law and said interlocutory decree:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered and decreed that the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said plaintiff, Harry B. Kinney, and said defendant, Nellie Kinney, be and the same are hereby dissolved, and that said plaintiff and said defendant, and each of them, be and they are hereby freed from each and all of the obligations thereof.

"Done in open court this 10th day of February A. D. 1916.

"Charles Wellborn, Judge."

"Nellie Kinney had known nothing of the whereabouts of her husband from October, 1912, until she learned of his death. She appeared in the court of Los Angeles by attorney by motion to set aside the two decrees, and her motion was overruled. She did not appeal.

"January 18, 1914, Harry B. Kinney went into the service of the Tri-State Telephone Company, and at this time it had in effect the plan of disability and death benefits to its employees as follows:

"Plan for Employees' Pensions, Disability Benefits and Death Benefits.

"Sec. 8. Death Benefits. (1) In the event of the death of any employé, resulting from accidental injury, on or after January 1, 1913, arising out of and in the course of employment by the company, there shall be payable to the employé's beneficiaries, as provided in paragraph 3 of this section (subject, however, to the conditions elsewhere imposed in these regulations), a death benefit which shall equal three years' wages, as hereinafter in this section defined, which shall in no case exceed five thousand dollars. In addition to the death benefit, the necessary expenses of the burial of the deceased employé, not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars ($150.00), shall be paid from the fund.

"(3) The death benefit, in case of an employé's death by either accident or sickness, shall be paid only to the wife (or husband) or dependent relatives of the employé, and such payment shall be made in the following order: Provided, however, that upon written application of an employé, and good cause shown, the committee may authorize a change in such order of payment, but no persons other than the beneficiaries herein designated shall receive payment on account of such benefit: First, to the wife (or husband) of the employé. * * *

"At the time Kinney entered the employment of the company he designated his mother as the beneficiary. After his marriage he, in the manner provided, designated Elsie Kinney as his beneficiary."

We, however, desire to add to the above the following additional statement:

The judgment roll in the case of Kinney v. Kinney in the superior court of the state of California for the county of Los Angeles was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff in error, over the objection made by defendants in error. Thereafter, and without any limitation as to its purpose, counsel for Elsie Kinney introduced and read in evidence the entire judgment roll in said cause. Dohoney v. Womack, 1 Tex. Civ. App. 354, 19 S. W. 883, 20 S. W. 950; Panhandle National Bank v. Emery, 78 Tex. 498, 15 S. W. 23; Sanger v. Craddock (Sup.) 2 S. W. 196. The uncontradicted evidence is that H. B. Kinney filed suit for divorce against Nellie in Colorado, and dismissed it on his own motion; that the Colorado and California suits were the only actions begun for divorce by H. B. Kinney. Nellie Kinney testified that she never had been divorced from H. B. Kinney; that she never had any notice of any other suits for divorce than as above stated; that she never sought to obtain a divorce from H. B. Kinney.

The trial court found these facts, and the Court of Civil Appeals does not make any finding of fact adverse to those by the trial court.

The uncontradicted evidence is that H. B. Kinney did not make any written application showing good cause for change of beneficiary as provided by the plan, and designated no beneficiary other than his lawful wife. The committee having charge of the management of the fund so found, Howard C. Vallie so testified, and the trial court so found.

The Court of Civil Appeals disposed of every assignment by appellants, and the case is before us solely upon the assignments raised by plaintiff in error in application for the writ of error.

The real parties to the appeal and to this writ of error are Elsie Kinney on the one part, and Nellie Kinney on the other; each claiming to be the lawful wife of H. B. Kinney at the date of his death. The Court of Civil Appeals rendered judgment in behalf of Elsie Kinney for the fund involved.

Opinion.

As we construe the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals, it is not a finding that the evidence is insufficient to support the judgment of the trial court, or that the judgment is against the weight of the evidence. It is rather a holding that, although the judgment roll was introduced in evidence, yet, as a matter of law, it did not prove anything, and that therefore there was no evidence to sustain the judgment of the trial court; that on the uncontradicted facts which the evidence established in law Elsie Kinney should recover. The whole question, therefore, is with reference to the soundness of the propositions of law on which the Court of Civil Appeals bases its conclusion that there is no evidence to support the judgment of the trial court, and that the uncontradicted evidence authorizes the judgment which it renders.

The uncontradicted and undisputed facts are that H. B. Kinney married Nellie Flaherty June 16, 1909; that they separated October 5, 1911, and never thereafter lived together; that on August 19, 1914, in a divorce suit filed by H. B. Kinney against Nellie Kinney in California, an interlocutory order was entered which was not made final until February 10, 1916, subsequent to the death of Harry B. Kinney; that in 1914 H. B. Kinney married Elsie, and they lived together to his death.

The Court of Civil Appeals takes the position that the introduction of these orders of the California court does not constitute evidence which negatives the presumption of a lawful marriage between deceased and Elsie Kinney. In other words, that although this judgment roll is in evidence, yet that it has no probative force, because Nellie Kinney failed to plead the law of the state of California with reference to the effect of these orders; and further that, not having done so, it is presumed that the law of California with relation to the subject is the same as that of Texas.

[1] Whether we undertake to construe the effect of the court proceeding in California under the law of California or under the laws of Texas is, in our judgment, immaterial. In our opinion, under the laws of Texas the interlocutory judgment rendered August 19, 1914, possessed no power destructive of the relation existing between Nellie Kinney and H. B. Kinney until it later should be strengthened by a final judgment pronouncing the decision of the court with reference to the rights of the parties. The interlocutory order did no more than to announce the conclusion of the court on the value of the facts proved, and to determine that under those facts a divorce ought to be granted. The order does not of itself, either by its terms or under any known rule of interpretation, pronounce the judgment of the court dissolving the bonds of matrimony. It specially excludes the idea of its finality or definiteness as an adjudication of the final status of the parties. It provides:

"That when one year shall have expired after the entry of this interlocutory judgment a final judgment and decree shall be entered granting a divorce herein, wherein and whereby the bonds of matrimony heretofore existing between said plaintiff and said defendant shall be dissolved, and at that time the court shall grant such other and further relief as may be necessary to complete disposition of this action."

This order shows, therefore, on its face, that the court held within its bosom the final judgment to be rendered, and that it was postponed, subject to rendition of final decree at some future date.

[2, 3] As announced in Linn v. Arambold, 55 Tex. 611, Fitzgerald v. Evans, 53 Tex. 461, and Easthan v. Sallis, 60 Tex. 576, a judgment which leaves something further to be determined and adjudicated by the court in disposing of the parties and their rights is interlocutory. A final judgment should contain the judicial ascertainment of the facts, together with the manner of their ascertainment, and a recorded declaration of the court pronouncing the legal consequences upon the facts thus ascertained. To be a "final judgment," it must contain:

(a) "Declaration in the record of the decision or sentence of the law pronounced by the court upon the matter contained in the record."

Under the law of this state the first order entered in the divorce proceedings in California must be held inoperative to effect a dissolution of the existing bonds of matrimony between H. B. Kinney and Nellie Kinney.

This condition of affairs continued until after the death of H. B. Kinney. At the time of his death and during the preceding time that he lived with Elsie Kinney, he was the lawful husband of Nellie Kinney, unless there had been granted at some other time or place a valid decree of divorce. The uncontradicted evidence is that he made only two efforts to obtain a divorce from Nellie Kinney; one in Colorado, which he voluntarily dismissed, and the other in California, in the cause in which the interlocutory judgment was rendered. After the death of H. B. Kinney, an effort was made to make final the interlocutory decree which had been rendered in the California court, thereby recognizing that it was not final. This is a circumstance corroborative of the testimony of Nellie Kinney that she had never been divorced, and a recognition of the continuance of the marital relationship in the absence of the final decree.

[4] It is true that, without any other proof save that showing the marriage of Nellie Flaherty in 1909 and the marriage to Elsie in 1911, the presumption would be in behalf of a lawful act on the part of the deceased and that he had obtained a divorce before his marriage to Elsie. But when the prior marriage is shown, and the testimony is offerred showing that no divorce has ever been granted—taking the acts of the deceased with reference thereto which were extant as showing that they fell short of a divorce—an issue of fact was thereby presented in rebuttal of this presumption. The trial court found the facts against Elsie Kinney, and in our opinion under the law of Texas no other conclusion could have been drawn than the one which was found by the trial court.

[5] The final judgment rendered on February 10, 1916, was not a judgment nunc pro tunc. The judgment roll does not show it to be entered nunc pro tunc. It has no validity as a judgment.

To have maintained the plaintiff's cause of action, it was necessary for Elsie Kinney to show that she had been lawfully married to H. B. Kinney, and was his lawful wife at the date of his death. We assume that this may be shown prima facie by the facts, which disclose that she was married to him in 1914, and that she continued to live with him to the time of his death. It then became necessary for Nellie Kinney, in order to defeat the contention of Elsie, to show, not only that H. B. Kinney had been married prior to his marriage to Elsie, but that that marriage never had been dissolved. When Nellie showed by her evidence that H. B. Kinney married her prior to the time he married Elsie, and then introduced evidence showing without contradiction and undisputed that H. B. Kinney never had been divorced from her, she rebutted the presumption of law in favor of Elsie and destroyed by facts the effect of that presumption. The court found that she had done this.

[6] The Court of Civil Appeals does not hold that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court in favor of Nellie Kinney. It holds that, although the proof was in, it constituted no evidence of the facts which it was intended to establish; that as a matter of law it proved nothing; that Nellie Kinney stood in the court having proved only one fact (the previous marriage); and that this fact was not sufficient to destroy the case made by Elsie. We cannot accede to this holding. We think the evidence sufficient in law to present the issue of no divorce. The only evidential effect—if it should be given any—of the final judgment in the California court, is to show a recognition of the inefficacy of the interlocutory judgment to dissolve the bonds of matrimony. It manifests a recognition of the fact that in the California court was pending the only divorce suit by H. B. Kinney; its effect is to negative any presumption that H. B. Kinney had obtained a divorce in some other jurisdiction.

The good faith of Elsie cannot affect the transaction, because the property involved in this litigation is not property which has been accumulated by the joint efforts of H. B. Kinney and Elsie during the purported marriage estate. It is rather a donation or bounty provided by the telephone company for the protection of specific beneficiaries. The fund clearly goes, not by designation of H. B. Kinney, but by virtue of the provision of the plan, to the lawful wife at the date of his death, whomsoever she may be.

We do not desire to be understood as holding that under the pleading in this case the laws of California could not have been introduced in evidence. That is a question that is immaterial to the disposition of the case, and upon which we express no opinion.

[7, 8] If the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals can be construed into a holding that the judgment roll was not admissible in evidence because not pleaded, we are of opinion that, even then, the Supreme Court would have the right to review that holding, since it is based upon a legal conclusion in contravention of the established rule in Texas. It was necessary for Nellie Kinney to show that H. B. Kinney had never been divorced from her. She pleaded that fact, and pleaded that she was his lawful wife at the time of his death. This pleading raised the issue as to whether or not any divorce had ever been granted, and as a matter of law it was not necessary for her to plead her evidence.

There is no evidence in the record tending to show that H. B. Kinney ever endeavored to designate in accordance with the "plan" a beneficiary other than as contemplated by the designation specifically set forth in the plan. Clearly, the sole question at issue and decisive of the rights of the parties is as to who occupied the relationship of wife to H. B. Kinney at the date of his death. The trial court found, and we think properly, in favor of Nellie Kinney on that issue.

We think the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that of the trial court affirmed.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case.

DUNCANSON et al. v. HOWELL.
(No. 147-3094.)

(Commission of Appeals of Texas, Section A.
June 9, 1920.)

1. Associations \S 15(1)—Purchasers of shares in colony held equitable owners of separate tracts and of excess acreage.

Purchasers of shares in a colony, with understanding it contained not less than 12,800 acres, each share representing 1/1232 part of the whole tract, on paying the price became collectively equitable owners of their interests in the entire tract, and also acquired equitable title to an excess area of 135.92 acres subsequently discovered in the tract, which was not reserved from sale to them or in any way designated or segregated, though deed was not made by the vendors as provided in the contract, but deeds were executed to each undivided purchaser or shareowner for specific property designated by a meeting of shareholders.

2. Tenancy in common \S 38(1)—One cotenant may maintain action against another who has ousted him.

One tenant in common may maintain action to establish title and to recover possession against his cotenant, when the latter has ousted him of possession of the property owned in common.

3. Tenancy in common \S 55(1)—Title to undivided interest warranted recovery of whole tract as against trespasser.

Title of a tenant in common to an undivided interest in the land involved in an action to establish title and to recover possession was sufficient to warrant recovery of the entire tract as against a trespasser, though such right does not exist as against a cotenant.

4. Trusts \S 30½(1)—Commission appointed by colony shareholders not trustees, but agents.

Committee appointed by shareholders in a colony, though denominated trustees, held in fact mere agents, not vested with the title of any of the shareholders.

5. Trespass to try title \S 26—One without title cannot maintain action for benefit of another with title.

One without title cannot maintain an action to establish title, and to recover possession for the use or benefit of another having title.

6. Trespass to try title \S 47(1)—Plaintiffs, without title to defendant's interest, could only be admitted into joint possession.

Where plaintiffs in trespass to try title showed no title, legal or equitable, as to the interest of defendant in the land involved, a common tract set apart by shareholders in a colony, among whom plaintiffs and defendant were all numbered, the full extent of plaintiffs' right was to have their interests adjudicated, and to be admitted into joint possession with defendant.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. H. Duncanson and others against Lee Howell. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which reversed, and rendered judgment for defendant (195 S. W. 349), and plaintiffs bring error. Judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and cause remanded for new trial, on recommendation of the Commission of Appeals.

C. C. Thomas, of Cotulla, J. O. Rouse, of Vernon, and Hicks, Hicks, Teagarden & Dickson, of San Antonio, for plaintiffs in error.

T. F. Mangum, of San Antonio, for defendant in error.

SONFIELD, P. J. W. H. Duncanson, Ed. C. Taylor, and O. G. Harris, plaintiffs, brought this action against Lee Howell, defendant, to establish title to, and recover possession of, 60 acres of land, known as "Howell Gardens," constituting part of a larger tract of land known as "Bermuda Colony." Plaintiffs sued "for themselves and as trustees for, and as tenants in common with, the shareholders in what is known as 'Bermuda Colony' and 'Brundage Townsite,' in Dimmit county, Texas," alleging that the shareholders numbered probably 600, and that it was practically impossible to give all their names and residences.

Plaintiffs' first amended original petition, in addition to the formal allegations in trespass to try title, alleged, in the alternative, possession of the land in virtue of a gift, and further that they, and those in whose behalf they sued, purchased an undivided interest in the entire Bermuda Colony, and upon division among themselves, by agreement, appropriated to each shareholder specific sections and lots, and kept the remaining undivided 60-acre tract, known as "Howell Gardens," as common or undivided property; that plaintiffs and defendant claimed under common source, defendant deraining title through an execution sale, under a judgment which plaintiffs alleged had been satisfied long prior to the levy upon and sale of the land by the sheriff to defendant.

It appears from the evidence that in the year 1908 the firm of Hust & Brundage owned 20 sections of land in Dimmit county, which they designated as "Bermuda Colony." In that year the firm proceeded to sell out the colony under a colonization scheme, through the sale of 1,232 shares to various purchasers. A uniform contract was adopted, styled "General Purchaser's Application." These applications were signed by those desiring to purchase shares of the colony; they agreeing to pay for each share the sum of $220, in payments as provided in the contract. The application stipulated that one share should represent an undivided 1/1232 part of the colony, and that the "Guaranties and Privileges" printed on the reverse side of the application should constitute a part of the contract. The guaranties and privileges, material to this inquiry, were in effect as follows:

When all the shares in Bermuda Colony were sold, a meeting of the shareholders, or their representatives, should be held, Hust & Brundage to notify the shareholders of the time and place of such meeting; that at such meeting a committee of five of the shareholders, or their representatives, should be selected, to whom Hust & Brundage would deliver warranty deeds, with complete abstract, to all the lands and lots in Bermuda Colony, each shareholder being entitled to $\frac{1}{1232}$ part of the entire colony; that at that meeting the shareholders, or their representatives, should determine whether the colony land should be partitioned or held in common, a partition to be had unless by unanimous vote it be determined to hold the land in common; and that the tract of land in Bermuda Colony contained not less than 12,800 acres.

Pending the sale of the shares, Hust & Brundage sold to H. C. King and Eli Howell an undivided one-half interest in the 20 sections constituting Bermuda Colony, and thereafter the joint owners conducted the sale under the firm name of Hust & Brundage Company. This firm continued in existence until on or about the 1st day of February, 1911, when King and Howell sold to Hust & Brundage their interest in the property. All the shares were duly subscribed for, and the first meeting of shareholders and their representatives was called. Practically all the shares were represented, and all the members of the firm of Hust & Brundage Company were present and participated in the proceedings.

Prior to this meeting Hust & Brundage Company caused a survey and a map of the colony to be made, and discovered an excess of 135.92 acres, making a total acreage of 12,935.92 acres. At the meeting of the shareholders, a committee was appointed to look into the matter of the partition of the lands. It reported that, after examining the official map of the colony, and talking with the county surveyor of Dimmit county, they found that the tract contained 12,935.92 acres, that by reason of the uniform character and topography of the land it could be partitioned without prejudice, and that they had so partitioned the same. Through the partition each shareholder was given a 10-acre tract, a residence lot, and an undivided interest in a business lot in the town site of Brundage. The committee recommended the setting aside, without partition, of various tracts, for the mutual interest of the shareholders, in accordance with the suggestion of the Hust & Brundage Company. Included in these tracts was Howell Gardens, the land in controversy. The report of the committee contained this further recommendation:

"In our opinion it will be proper for you to provide—before closing this matter—some form of agency or trusteeship to look after the future interests of the shareholders in the land not partitioned, which is now held in common by you in the ratio of your respective shares in said colony, as well as the lots in the town not partitioned to any club, and for such other purposes or contingencies as might arise concerning the future interest of the several shareholders."

The report of this committee was adopted, the partition accepted, and the commission as recommended provided for. Harry Hust, of the firm of Hust & Brundage Company, was to be chairman, with authority to designate from the pioneer settlers of the colony the two other members. This commission was to act as trustees of the land not partitioned, for a period of three years, and until their successors were elected. The 135.92 acres excess includes the land in controversy, and was not deeded by Hust & Brundage Company to any person. Hust and Brundage each testified that Bermuda Colony in its entirety was sold to the shareholders; that they had been willing at any time to execute a deed to this excess acreage, but did not know to whom the deed should be executed. Hust appointed W. H. Duncanson, one of the plaintiffs herein, as trustee in his stead, and Duncanson named his coplaintiffs as the other two trustees. Duncanson testified that subsequently, at a meeting of the shareholders, he and the other plaintiffs herein were elected trustees.

It is thus seen that plaintiffs assert that title to the land in controversy is in the purchasers of the shares of Bermuda Colony, under the contract; all of the purchase money having been paid. Defendant, Howell, claims under an execution sale. W. W. Gray recovered a judgment against Hust & Brundage, which judgment was assigned to defendant, who caused execution to issue; levy was made on Howell Gardens, and at the sale thereunder defendant became the purchaser. The judgment, execution, and sale were all subsequent to the sale of the shares of the Bermuda Colony and of the first meeting of the shareholders. At the sale, intended purchasers were advised of the claim of title by the shareholders. Defendant credited the amount of his bid on the judgment. Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are instructed on the law of this case as follows:

"(1) Under the 'General Purchaser's Application,' with the 'Guaranties and Privileges' printed on the back thereof, shown in evidence as the contract under which the shareholders of Bermuda Colony became purchasers of shares, it is provided that the purchasers of the 1,232 shares (being the whole number of shares) shall be the owners of the entire colony, each share representing $\frac{1}{1232}$ part of the whole of the land, which was represented to be 12,800 acres, and not less than 12,800 acres. The purchasers, upon complying with the terms of their contracts by paying the agreed price, became collectively the equitable owners of such interests in the entire tract, and upon receiving their deeds to the 10-acre tracts and town lots they became the separate owners in fee simple of the tracts specified in their respective deeds.

"(2) The map of Bermuda Colony shows that the same consist of 20 sections of land, each divided into 64 equal parts in a square form, called 10-acre tracts, being 1,280 such tracts, all of them being numbered, except 36, marked 'Town of Brundage,' 4, marked 'King Park and Lake,' and 6, marked 'Howell Gardens'; the latter being the land in controversy. These 20 sections of land contain 640 acres of land, each more or less, and together they contain 12,935.92 acres, or an excess of 135.92 over 12,800. All the land in the 20 sections was platted on the map as Bermuda Colony; the 135.92 acres excess was not reserved from sale to the shareholders, or in any way designated or segregated, and in law the equitable title thereto passed to them as part of the entire colony, when they complied with the terms of their contracts by paying the agreed price of their shares. Their uninterrupted possession is notice to the world of their claim of right.

"(3) The fact that the land in controversy has at times been called a donation does not affect the character of the title therein of the shareholders of the colony.

"(4) The plaintiffs, as shareholders and trustees of the shareholders, for their common benefit, are entitled to maintain this action, although many shareholders living at a distance may know nothing of their trusteeship or of the pendency of this suit.

"(5) It is in evidence that Hust & Brundage Company at the time of the allotment owned 23 shares, which had not been sold by them, and they were therefore owners of an undivided 23/1232 of the land in controversy. This 23/1232 was subject to levy and sale as the property of Hust & Brundage, assignees and successors of Hust & Brundage Company, at the time of defendant's levy, and under the execution sale to him defendant became the owner thereof.

"(6) You will therefore return your verdict for plaintiffs, as trustees, for all the shareholders, which includes the defendant, to the extent of 23 shares."

Verdict was rendered accordingly, and thereon judgment was entered that plaintiffs, as trustees for all of the shareholders of Bermuda Colony, including defendant, to the extent of 23 shares, recover of and from defendant possession of the land sued for; that, as such trustees, plaintiffs be quieted in their possession of the land; and decreeing the cancellation of the deed by the sheriff of Dimmit county to defendant, and the record thereof, except as a muniment of title to 23/1232 of the land adjudged as belonging to defendant, and ordering a writ of restitution to issue in favor of plaintiffs, as trustees, for possession of the land. On appeal, the Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the district court, and rendered judgment that plaintiffs take nothing by their suit. 195 S. W. 349.

The Court of Civil Appeals held that plaintiffs and the other shareholders acquired no title, legal or equitable, to the excess acreage; that this excess was found only after a survey, and was not contemplated when many, if not all, of the applications for purchase of shares were executed; that no interest in the land in controversy was ever deeded by Hust & Brundage, who held the legal title, to any one, except by the sheriff to defendant, and that there is no contract or memorandum thereof in writing, signed by or authorized to be signed by Hust & Brundage, for the sale or donation of all or any part of the 60 acres.

[1] We think the Court of Civil Appeals reached an erroneous conclusion in the matter of title, and concur in the conclusions of the trial court in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the charge to the jury. Hust & Brundage owned 20 contiguous sections of land, each section supposed to contain 640 acres. Upon this was predicated their guaranty that Bermuda Colony contained not less than 12,800 acres. The evidence establishes beyond the peradventure of a doubt that the 20 sections, in their entirety, were included in the colony, and that it was the intention of the vendors, through the sale of shares, to dispose of the whole of the colony lands. The contracts clearly, and without ambiguity, define the rights of each shareholder. There were 1,232 shares, each share representing "an undivided twelve hundred and thirty-second part of said colony." All the shares were to be subscribed for during the year 1908; failing in which, the money paid by intending purchasers should be returned. It cannot be questioned that the intention was that the shareholders should be and become the owners of the entire colony. This intention is not left to mere inference, but finds expression in the stipulations under "Guaranties and Privileges" which formed a part of the contract. It is provided therein that, when all the shares shall have been sold, the shareholders, or their representatives, should hold a meeting, whereat a committee of five from among their number should be selected by them, to whom the vendors were "to deliver warranty deeds, with complete abstract to all of the lands and lots in said Bermuda Colony, and this contract shall entitle the shareholder to one twelve hundred and thirty-second part of said entire colony." The vendors were thus to divest themselves of title to all of the lands and lots in the colony, and the shareholders were to become tenants in common of the colony in its entirety.

It is true, as stated by the Court of Civil Appeals, that the deed was not made by the vendors as provided in the contract, and that, in the language of that court, "on the contrary, Hust & Brundage executed deeds to each undivided purchaser for specific property designated by the convention of shareholders. Each deed conveyed a described section of acreage property, certain residence lots in the town of Brundage, and a designated interest in a described business lot in Brundage." It is also true that the contract provides in effect that, when deeds to the various shareholders for the particular part apportioned to each have been delivered, the same should be accepted in full satisfaction of the share applied for in the application. These facts, viewed in the light of the attending circumstances, in no manner militate against our view.

The contract contemplated that the land should be held in common by the shareholders, or partitioned between them by a committee appointed for that purpose. Only through a unanimous vote of the shareholders, or their representatives, could the lands be held in common. The committee was appointed. It had before it the map, recognized as the official map of the colony, based upon the survey made by the vendors, showing the excess. This map showed the colony to consist of 20 sections, subdivided into 10-acre tracts, all being numbered, except the tracts marked and designated thereon "Town of Brundage," "King's Park," and "Howell Gardens." The committee's report to the shareholders was based upon this survey and map, and stated that the colony contained 12,935.92 acres. The partition, recommended by the committee and accepted by the shareholders, was with reference to the survey and map. The committee advised the shareholders to accept the suggestion made by vendors that certain tracts, including Howell Gardens, be left unpartitioned, to be held in common by the various shareholders, and that a commission be appointed to look after the interests of the shareholders in such tracts. From the fact that under such circumstances the shareholders received deeds to specific portions of the property, no inference arises that they deemed the partition as including all of the land to which they were entitled, and that through the acceptance of the deeds they forfeited their rights in the lands not partitioned. They accepted the partition and the deeds in virtue thereof, in view of the recommendation by the committee as to the unpartitioned land. But, whatever their belief, it did not alter or change the legal effect of the contract. No element of estoppel is present. The vendors were in attendance upon the meeting, acquiesced in the proceedings, and recognized the title of the shareholders to all of the colony, including the land in controversy. The evidence establishes that the shareholders went into immediate possession of the land in controversy, through tenants; the leases being executed by some of the shareholders in the belief that they were the duly appointed agents of all of the shareholders with reference to the unpartitioned land. We conclude that the equitable title to the land in controversy vested in the shareholders in virtue of their contracts of purchase and the payment of the purchase money.

Paragraph 5 of the trial court's charge to the jury, the verdict therein instructed, and the judgment, recognize defendant as the owner of an undivided $\frac{23}{128}$ part of the land. In view of this, the judgment decreeing exclusive possession of the land in controversy to plaintiff as trustees for all of the shareholders of the colony, including defendant, was clearly erroneous.

[2] Plaintiffs and defendant, in the view of the trial court, were tenants in common. One tenant in common may maintain an action of this character against a cotenant, when the latter has ousted him of possession of the property owned in common. The pleas and answer of defendant clearly show that he recognized no right of common ownership, and this is held equivalent to an ouster. St. L., A. & T. Ry. Co. v. Prather, 75 Tex. 53, 12 S. W. 969.

[3, 4] Plaintiffs had title to an undivided interest. This would be sufficient to warrant a recovery of the entire tract as against a trespasser. This right does not, of course, exist as against a cotenant. The judgment was evidently based upon the conception that plaintiffs were trustees for all of the shareholders. Under the evidence no such relation exists. The legal title remained in Hust & Brundage; the equitable title passing to the shareholders. The commission appointed by the shareholders, though called trustees, were in fact mere agents, not vested with the title of any of the shareholders. It is in this right that plaintiffs sought recovery of all of the lands.

[5, 6] One without title cannot maintain an action of this character for the use or benefit of another having title. Hooper v. Hall, 30 Tex. 154; Birmingham v. Griffin, 42 Tex. 147; Heard v. Vineyard, 212 S. W. 489. The court recognized and established defendant's interest in the land. He had the same right of possession and enjoyment of the land as plaintiffs. As to his interest and that of the other shareholders, plaintiffs showed no title, legal or equitable. It follows that the full extent of plaintiffs' right was to have their interests adjudicated, and be admitted into joint possession of the land with defendant. Boone v. Knox, 80 Tex. 642, 16 S. W. 448, 26 Am. St. Rep. 767; Hess v. Webb, 103 Tex. 46, 123 S. W. 111.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PHILLIPS, C. J. We approve the judgment recommended in this case, and the holding of the Commission on the question discussed.

DAVIS v. STATE. (No. 5830.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Larceny \S 5—Taking of casing from abandoned oil well valued at more than $50 would be theft.

Defendant, if going with others to an abandoned oil well and taking therefrom certain casing of the value of over $50 and selling it, would be guilty of theft.

2. Criminal law \S 507(1)—One participating in theft held an accomplice whose testimony required corroboration.

In a prosecution for the theft of oil well casing, one whom the state's evidence showed to have gone with defendant and to have taken the casing would be an accomplice, if defendant was guilty, and defendant's appropriate request for a special instruction that such person, used by the state as witness, would be an accomplice and would have to be corroborated, should have been given.

3. Criminal law \S 763, 764(17)—Charge as to proof of other offenses held improper as on weight of evidence.

In prosecution for theft wherein the state put in evidence of extraneous offenses to connect defendant with the offense and to show his purpose in being connected with it, a charge that jury might consider evidence of the theft of other property at same time and place, to establish the identity in developing the res gestae of alleged offense or to prove defendant's guilt by circumstances connected with the theft or to show his intent as to property charged to have been stolen, was erroneous, as being on the weight of the evidence.

4. Larceny \S 50—Checks given for payment on sale of stolen property held admissible.

In a trial on a charge of the theft of casing from an abandoned oil well alleged to have been taken and sold by defendant, wherein he denied any guilty connection with the matter and offered evidence of an alibi, checks given for the payment of the casing in the profits of which defendant shared were admissible.

5. Criminal law \S 1099(8)—Agreed statement not filed within time owing to fault of judge will be considered.

Where the statement of facts was not filed within the 90 days requisite in order to entitle it to consideration, and an affidavit of the trial judge assumed all responsibility for the delay on account of the pressure of business and sufficiently exonerated defendant from any want of diligence, and the statement of facts was agreed to and certified by the judge to be correct, it should be considered on appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Eastland County; E. A. Hill, Judge.

G. W. Davis was convicted of the theft of property of a value of more than $50 and sentenced, and he appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

Mays & Mays, of Ft. Worth, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of the theft of 15 joints of 6 $\frac{3}{8}$ -inch casing of over the value of \$50 and allotted two years in the penitentiary.

[1, 2] The state's evidence is that appellant, his brother, and Dawson went to an abandoned oil well and took the casing mentioned in the indictment and sold it. Under the state's case, if they did it was theft. Appellant's contention was that he did not go to the place where the property was situated, and knew nothing about it being stolen property; that he was a teamster and hauled anything for which he was employed in and about the oil field. The state used Dawson as a witness. Under the law and facts, if appellant was guilty, Dawson was an accomplice. The court did not so charge as to accomplice testimony as shown by his charge copied in the record. There is a bill of exceptions which states that he did submit the issue to the jury as to whether or not Dawson was an accomplice. Outside of this bill of exceptions, we fail to find a charge in the record. It is not embodied in the court's charge. Appellant requested a special instruction to the effect that Dawson would be an accomplice and would have to be corroborated. The requested charge was appropriately in the terms of the law and should have been given. This matter is indefinite, but upon another trial the court should instruct that Dawson is an accomplice.

[3] The state introduced extraneous matters and offenses and circumstances to connect appellant with this offense and to show his purpose in being connected with it. The court charged the jury as follows, as shown by the bill of exceptions:

"In this case if you believe there is evidence tending to prove the theft of other property than that alleged in the indictment to have been stolen, and at the same time, and place, you are instructed that you can consider such testimony for the purpose for which it was admitted, that is, to establish the identity in developing the res gestae of the alleged offense or to prove the guilt of the accused by circumstances connected with the theft, if any, or to show intent with which the accused acted with respect to the property for the theft of which he is now on trial, and you will consider it," etc.

Exception was reserved to this charge, among other reasons, because it was on the weight of the evidence. This charge has been condemned in a number of opinions as being on the weight of the evidence. Appellant's exception to the charge should have been sustained and a proper charge given.

[4] Exception was also reserved to various and sundry matters that were introduced which tended to connect the defendant with this transaction criminally, and to show his purpose and to obtain the money from the results of the theft and selling the property. We are of opinion this evidence under this record was admissible. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the testimony. The appellant denied any guilty connection with it, and introduced evidence to show that he was not present at the time of the taking. There were checks also introduced given for the payment of this property in the profits of which appellant participated. This was inadmissible under the facts of this case.

There is a bill of exceptions to the manner in which the jury was obtained. This will not occur upon another trial and is not discussed.

[5] Appellant contends that he was deprived of his statement of facts without fault on his part, and for this reason the judgment should be reversed. The statement of facts was not filed within the 90 days as seems requisite under the decisions in order for its consideration. The trial judge files an affidavit exonerating appellant from any blame in not having his statement of facts filed within time and assumes all responsibility. Without setting out his reasons, we think they are sufficient to exonerate the appellant from any want of diligence. The statement of facts, however, is agreed to and certified by the judge to be correct. He says that he overlooked and failed to sign it in time on account of reasons stated; among others, the pressure of business in the trial of other cases. The correctness of the statement of facts is not assailed, but is agreed to and signed by the attorneys. See Branch's Crim. Law, § 41; Vernon's C. C. P., p. 837, and note 20, for cases; Eitel v. State, 78 Tex. Cr. R. 552, 182 S. W. 318; where quite a number of cases are collated; Gibbs v. State, 70 Tex. Cr. R. 278, 156 S. W. 687; Tankersley v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 171, 101 S. W. 234. We are of opinion the statement of facts, under the statement of the judge, should be considered and is considered in passing upon the case.

On account of the errors above mentioned, this judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

GRISSOM v. STATE. (No. 5776.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 8, 1920.)

1. Criminal law § 814(2)—Theory submitted must be supported by evidence.

To make pertinent the submission of any legal theory of a case there must be evidence to support such issue.

2. Homicide § 309(3) — Manslaughter charge properly refused under evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, held proper, under the evidence failing to raise such issue, to refuse to charge on manslaughter.

3. Homicide § 250—Conviction of murder sustained by evidence.

In a prosecution for homicide, a conviction of murder held sustained by the evidence.

4. Criminal law § 982—No suspended sentence following murder conviction.

There can be no suspended sentence following a murder conviction.

5. Criminal law § 1056(1)—Errors in charge not excepted to not considered.

Alleged errors in the charge not excepted to will not be considered on appeal.

On Motion for Rehearing.

6. Criminal law § 1144(14)—Trial court presumed to have followed the law in refusing charges.

Where special charges on manslaughter and suspended sentence were asked, but it does not appear when they were presented to the court, acting upon the presumption that the trial court followed the law, the appellate court must uphold the action of the trial court in refusing such charges, for the reason that they came too late, if for no other reason.

Appeal from District Court, Wharton County; M. S. Munson, Judge.

Manch Grissom was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. C. Allen, of Houston, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted in the district court of Wharton county of murder, and his punishment fixed at 15 years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The facts showed that Simon Grissom was an aged negro, living on a farm in Wharton county with his second wife and their three children, the oldest of whom was the deceased, a boy about 18 years of age. The old man seems to have had numerous older children by a former wife. On the day before the homicide, as we understand the record, there was a difficulty between the old man and deceased, in which deceased struck his father with a piece of tire iron, one or more blows, and the old man left the place, apparently going to the home of some of his older children, where he reported the occurrence. On the evening of the homicide he came back to his house, accompanied by three of his older boys and a grandson. The boys seem to have brought with them at least one shotgun, a Winchester rifle, and a pistol. In the mêlée which occurred, George Grissom, Simon, Jr., and the deceased, Boots Grissom, were killed, and appellant was wounded. Appellant and the grandson, Willie, or Lonnie Greer, were indicted for the murder of Boots Grissom. On this trial appellant alone was tried, his conviction resulting.

Appellant's first and principal complaint is based on the failure of the trial court to submit the issue of manslaughter. An exception was taken to the main charge for such failure, and a special instruction asked presenting the issue. It appears from the charge asked that appellant sought to have manslaughter predicated upon the proposition that if he was approaching the house wherein deceased was, and that some one from the inside of the house shot him, and thereby produced in his mind such a degree of anger, rage, resentment, or terror, as to render him incapable of cool reflection, and that he shot and killed deceased, he would be guilty of no higher grade of homicide than manslaughter.

[1] To make pertinent the submission of any legal theory of a case, it is well settled that there must be evidence to support such issue. There is no dispute as to the fact that appellant, his two brothers, his nephew, and his father, went to the place where deceased was, for the purpose of getting him; nor of the fact that the party had with them the weapons mentioned above. Looking to the testimony of the state, a case of murder seems well established. Examining that of the appellant, we find that he testified that, when his party got near the house where Boots Grissom was, his brothers Si and George got out of the vehicles and went across the field, and, when they got to the house, he heard the shooting; that he then got on a horse and loped up there; that when he went up there he had no gun; that he asked what was the matter, and that somebody shot him in the left side and hand; that he then went back to his buggy, some distance, got a shotgun, and, putting it against his knee, shot back towards the house, he being then some 75 feet distant therefrom. No one was in sight when he fired, and he said that he shot just to let them know that he had a gun.

Appellant's father testified that he and appellant were some 350 yards from the house when the shooting began, and that appellant got on a horse and loped up to the house, and was there when he got there a little later. Lonnie Greer, who was also indicted, testified for the appellant, and stated that, when he got near the Grissom house, appellant, Si, and George got out of their buggies and walked, and got to the house before he and his grandfather did; that, when the shooting took place, all of the Grissoms were there.

[2] The evidence was given in a rambling and disconnected way, but we have tried to give the salient points bearing on the issue of manslaughter. We find ourselves wholly unable to see any evidence raising such issue. No uncontrollable emotion appears, and no circumstance is in evidence from which such emotion could arise. The parties were admittedly going out after Boots Grissom because of his assault upon his father the day before. They had no warrant, though it was claimed that the sheriff had told one of them to bring Boots in. If the situation testified to by appellant and his father be literally true—that is, that young Si and George had gotten out of their buggies, and left the rest of the party, and gone on to the house, and there engaged in a battle with Boots, and that appellant, hearing the shooting, jumped on a horse and loped up to the house, and was then shot by some one, and returned to his buggy, got his shotgun, and fired it toward the house—this would not require a manslaughter charge. Deceased was not killed with No. 4 shot from a shotgun as appellant said his were, and it was testified to by appellant's witnesses that Si and George had a Winchester rifle and a pistol. Deceased was struck by a bullet that had gone through the wall of the house and went through both legs, apparently breaking the bone of one of them, from the effects of which he died within a short time. Under the charge of the court, and these facts testified to by appellant and his witnesses, unless he was a principal with George and Si, he would not be guilty of murder. That George and Si would have been guilty of murder is apparent from the fact that the entire testimony shows that the attacking party were the aggressors, the shooting began from outside the house, and that one or the other of them stated that their purpose in going there was to kill Boots.

[3] Taking the record as a whole, there seems no doubt of appellant's guilt. His half-sister said that he and George and Si were all shooting. Appellant had the only shotgun used, except a broken one used by Boots on the inside of the house, and after the battle a number of shotgun shells were picked up around the house; and the testimony showed that a number of holes in the walls and doors of the house were such as would be made by a shotgun fired at close range. That appellant, as a member of the attacking party, fully aided and acted with George and Si in their deadly assault on Boots, seems fully proved.

[4] From our view of the matter just disposed of, it would necessarily follow that the trial court committed no error in refusing to charge the law of suspended sentence. There can be no suspended sentence following a murder conviction.

[5] Error is assigned because of the failure of the trial court to charge on self-defense, but this and other errors complained of in the charge may be disposed of by the state—ment that no exception was taken to the charge of the court below as to any of these matters. We cannot agree with the contention that the evidence does not support the verdict. There seems no question that the parties, one of whom was appellant, were armed and after deceased, who was killed by them. The jury have passed on the evidence, and their finding has ample support.

The judgment will be affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

In his motion for rehearing, appellant contends that the trial court should have charged on manslaughter. As we understand the record, the case was tried entirely upon the theory of principals, and that appellant was acting with his brothers throughout the transaction; he having a shotgun, and they a rifle and pistol, respectively. There is no sort of claim that the brothers of appellant acted in self-defense, or that there is any evidence raising manslaughter as to either of them; nor do we think that there is any evidence seriously questioning the fact that deceased was killed by being shot by one or the other of the brothers of appellant.

[8] Laying aside the overwhelming testimony of the state, that appellant was present during all of the shooting, and acting with his brothers—shooting into the house with his shotgun, as they fired into it with their rifle and pistol, forgetting that appellant had the only shotgun on the outside of the house on that fatal night, and that two 12-gauge shotgun shells were picked up, lying just east of the house, and others just north of it, and that the witnesses who went out and examined the premises immediately afterwards said there were two large holes through a door in said house, that seemed to have been made by a shotgun, and that from their experience such holes could not have been made with a shotgun when fired from a distance of more than fifteen or twenty feet—leaving this mass of testimony out of consideration, and looking at the case alone from the standpoint of the testimony of the appellant, and such testimony as is undisputed, in order to determine the issues raised, we find that he testified that he went with his brothers and father that afternoon, knowing that they were going out to get Boots Grissom, who was the deceased; that, when they got within a short distance of the house, his brothers Si and George, with their arms, got out of the buggy, and walked up a ravine or slough; and that presently and at a time when he was about 300 yards from the house, he heard the shooting, and went loping up there on a horse. He says it was dark at that time, and that when he got up there he could not see any one, and he asked what was the matter, and "somebody" shot him in the hand, arm, and side, and that he whirled; that his father had come up with the buggy, and he ran out to the buggy and got a shotgun, and put it on his knee, and shot back towards the house. He stated that he was about as far from the house when he fired as "to the back of this place," and it was agreed that this was about 75 feet. Asked why he shot, appellant stated that he shot to let them know he had a gun. He also said that, when he got to the house, the firing was from the opposite side. He did not claim anywhere that deceased shot him, nor that he shot deceased, nor that he shot in self-defense, nor for any other purpose except as stated by him, to let them know he had a gun. He said he did not see any one when he shot, and did not aim at any one. His gun was loaded with No. 4 shot. Old man Simon Grissom, father of appellant, testified as a witness for him, and said that, when he got in the house after the shooting was over, he found deceased lying under a bed behind a barricade of pillows and plank. The testimony shows that deceased had been shot through the right thigh, the ball shattering the bone and going through the left leg also. It seems so incredible that a shotgun, loaded with No. 4 shot, fired at a distance of 75 feet from the wall of a building, could penetrate that wall and inflict such a wound upon the deceased as that which killed him, that no one could believe but that the fatal shot was fired by others than appellant, provided his story upon which manslaughter is sought to be predicated was true. Not one of the witnesses who examined the premises after the shooting said there was a single shot hole of any character from the inside going out through the walls. Under his own testimony, and that of the other witnesses, the most that appellant could claim would be, on his part, that he was not acting as a principal with them, and was not guilty of any offense at all. Of course, under the mass of testimony offered by the state, showing that appellant was present and participating in all of the shooting, it was claimed by the state that he was guilty as a principal; and the case was tried, and the jury instructed, upon that theory. Special charges on manslaughter and suspended sentence were asked; but, looking to the same, we nowhere find any statement as to when they were presented to the court, and in this condition of the record, acting upon the presumption that the trial court followed the law, we will have to uphold his action in refusing said charges, for the reason that the same came too late, if for no other reason.

Believing that the issues raised by the testimony were all comprehended within the charge on principals, and that no charge on manslaughter was demanded, and regretting our inability to agree with able counsel for appellant, the motion for rehearing is overruled.

HOUSER v. STATE. (No. 5807.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 249 — Volunteered statement by witness that he thought defendant was automobile thief improper.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, statement, volunteered by a witness, after testifying that when he saw defendant and another driving the car he spoke to defendant, who nodded, that he thought he would stop defendant, as he was certain defendant was an automobile thief, held improper.

2. Criminal law \S 1170½(6) — Volunteered statement of witness directed not to be considered was harmless.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, where the trial court instructed not to consider a witness' volunteered statement that when he saw defendant in the car he thought he would stop him, as he was certain he was an automobile thief, such statement did not constitute reversible error.

3. Witnesses \S 248(2) — Answer of witness that he remembered dates because he knew lawyers would frame up alibi improper.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, answer of a witness, to the question of defendant's counsel as to how he came to recollect dates, that it was because he knew "you lawyers would have an alibi framed up for him, and I fixed for it," held improper as unresponsive.

4. Criminal law \S 1170½(6)—Unresponsive answer of witness harmless to defendant in view of instructions.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, unresponsive answer of witness to question as to how he came to recollect dates that it was because he knew defendant's lawyers would have an alibi framed up for him, so that he fixed for it, held harmless to defendant, and not reversible error, in view of court's instruction not to consider it.

5. Criminal law \S 695(2)—General objection to evidence properly overruled.

Where the trial court could not know what were the grounds of objection by defendant to a statement made by a witness, general objection thereto was properly overruled.

6. Criminal law \S 1091(10)—Grounds of objection to evidence should be stated in bill of exceptions.

The grounds of an objection to evidence should be stated in a bill of exceptions to its admission, in order to present error for review.

7. Witnesses \S 270(2) — Cross-examination of witness improper as irrelevant.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, question to a witness on cross-examination whether he swore defendant stole the car, and answer that the witness believed defendant stole it, but would not swear to it, held improper, as not shedding light on the issues.

8. Criminal law \S 1137(5)—Error in answer on cross-examination invited by query.

In prosecution for theft of automobile, where defendant asked a witness on cross-examination whether he swore defendant stole the car, he thereby invited the error in the witness' answer in the negative, but that he believed defendant stole it.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Tarrant County; Geo. E. Hosey, Judge.

Charley Houser was convicted of theft of an automobile, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mays & Mays, of Ft. Worth, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. Appellant was convicted in the criminal district court of Tarrant county, for theft of an automobile, and his punishment fixed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

It appears from the record that a man named Baker parked a new Ford car near a movie playhouse, in the city of Ft. Worth, about 8 o'clock one night, and that shortly thereafter the same was taken. About 9 or 9:30 o'clock on said night Harry Hamilton, a detective in the office of the criminal district attorney, saw appellant and another party in possession of the car, driving out of the city of Ft. Worth, and in the direction of the home of appellant, who lived in Wise county. Mr. Hamilton recognized appellant, and started after him; and when opposite the car Hamilton spoke to appellant, and then drove on ahead, intending to stop and wait at some convenient place until appellant should come up, but appellant ran the car near the curb, and both parties therein hurriedly alighted and went down an alley. Mr. Hamilton carried the car to the police station, where it was turned over to Mr. Baker, the owner, some time about 11 or 12 o'clock that night. A few days later appellant was arrested, and charged with the theft. Upon his trial, his defense was an alibi, and his grandmother and his sister testified to the effect that he was not in Ft. Worth, but was in Wise county, on the night of the theft. The state introduced other witnesses, who testified to seeing appellant in Ft. Worth on the same night the automobile was taken.

[1, 2] Several bills of exceptions were reserved to the testimony of Mr. Hamilton. In the first of these, complaint is made of statements appearing in Mr. Hamilton's narration of the facts leading up to the recovery of the car. This witness stated that when he saw appellant and the other party driving the car, he spoke to appellant, who nodded, and witness then volunteered the statement that he thought he would stop him (meaning appellant), as he was certain he was an automobile thief. Appellant promptly objected to the last statement; and the court at once sustained the objection, and instructed the jury not to consider what this witness had said about thinking appellant to be an automobile thief. The statement made by the witness was not proper, but as the trial court sustained the objection, and instructed the jury not to consider it, we are unable to see what else could have been done, and do not think the matter presents reversible error.

[3, 4] By another bill, complaint is made of various matters, the only one worthy of consideration being the objection to a statement by Mr. Hamilton, who was asked upon cross-examination by appellant's attorney what day it was that he saw appellant in possession of said car, to which he replied that it was on a Thursday. Thereupon, appellant's counsel asked him how he came to recollect these dates, and the witness replied, "Because I knew you lawyers would have an alibi framed up for him, and I fixed for it." Counsel for appellant objected to this statement, and reserved his bill of exceptions. Looking to the qualification upon said bill, we find that the trial court states that he promptly instructed the jury not to consider the said answer. This answer was manifestly improper, and not in response to the question; but, as it was not the statement of any fact harmful to appellant, and as the court instructed the jury not to consider it, we do not think it such error as to necessitate a reversal of the case.

[5, 6] Appellant's bill of exceptions No. 3 contains his objection to a statement made by the witness Hamilton as to what occurred at the police station, when he went to report the finding of said car. No ground of objection is stated in this bill, and it is clear that the trial court could not know what the grounds of the objection were, and therefore properly overruled the general objection. The grounds of an objection should be stated in a bill of exceptions, in order to present error for review.

Appellant's fourth bill of exceptions is substantially the same as his second bill, which is above disposed of.

[7, 8] Bill of exceptions No. 5 complains that while counsel for appellant was cross-examining witness Hamilton, this question was asked by him, "Do you swear defendant stole that car?" to which the witness answered, "No; I believe he stole it, but would not swear to it." Appellant asked the court to instruct the jury not to consider said statement. In our opinion the character of the cross-examination was manifestly improper. Neither the question nor its answer shed any legitimate light upon the issues before the court and jury, but the knowledge of the theft called for by the question is so closely akin to the belief thereof given in the answer that we think, if any error appeared, it would be held invited by the character of the query. Finding no reversible error in this record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

HIGGINS v. STATE. (No. 5824.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law § 1159(2)—Rape § 57(1)—Evidence held to justify submission to jury; appellate court will uphold verdict.

In a prosecution for rape of a daughter under 18 years of age, held, that it was the duty of the trial court to submit the case to the jury, and the duty of the appellate court, so far as the question of sufficiency of evidence was concerned, to uphold the verdict.

2. Criminal law § 369(1)—Proof of separate criminal act admissible to controvert defensive theory.

Proof of a separate and distinct criminal act similar to that involved in the prosecution sometimes becomes admissible in evidence to controvert some defensive theory advanced by the accused, but such evidence is to be received only when brought clearly within some defined exception to the rule excluding it.

3. Criminal law § 369(8)—Distinct separate offense inadmissible in rape case.

In a prosecution for rape on July 2d, evidence that defendant made an indecent assault upon another female on September 7th was not admissible as rebuttal of defendant's evidence that upon July 2d he was suffering with ailments which rendered it improbable that he would have a desire to commit such an offense; there being no evidence to show that such ailment continued until September 7th.

Appeal from District Court, Hall County; J. A. Nabers, Judge.

J. R. Higgins was convicted for rape, and appeals. Reversed.

A. T. Cole, of Clarendon, and R. H. Templeton, of Wellington, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. The conviction is for rape, with punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for 15 years.

[1] The subject of the rape was the daughter of appellant, under 18 years of age. At the time of the trial, she and her younger sister were married women. The prosecutrix testified to the act of intercourse, claiming that it took place on the 2d day of July, while she and her sister were in bed together. She claimed to have been unwilling, and to have made some resistance. The conviction, however, is upon the theory of her consent. The sufficiency of the evidence is assailed, the circumstances, including a motive for fabrication on the part of the prosecutrix and her sister and the denial of the act by the appellant, are pointed out. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the facts further than to say that the definite testimony of the prosecutrix to the offense is not overcome, as a matter of law. It was the duty of the trial court to submit the issue to the jury, and the duty of this court under the facts, so far as the question of the sufficiency of the evidence is concerned, to uphold it.

[2, 3] The state introduced, over the objection of the appellant, the evidence of the sister of the prosecutrix that on the 7th day of September, following the alleged offense, the appellant made an indecent assault upon her. The state attempts to justify the admission of this evidence upon the theory that it was the proper rebuttal of evidence introduced by the appellant showing his physical condition. The evidence of his physical condition was that of the doctor, who testified that he had examined the appellant shortly before the 2d of July, and that at that time he was suffering from certain ailments which rendered it not impossible, but improbable, that he would have a desire for sexual intercourse. As we understand the record, the ailments of which he was complaining were not of a permanent nature. The doctor had made no further examination of them prior to the date upon which the assault upon the sister of the prosecutrix was made. There is evidence that in the meantime his physical condition had improved; in fact, the record, as we view it, rather negatives the idea that his condition upon the 7th day of September was similar to that described by the evidence as existing on the 2d day of July, at the time the offense charged was committed. It sometimes happens that proof of a separate and distinct criminal act similar to that involved in the prosecution becomes admissible in evidence to controvert some defensive theory advanced by the accused. Wharton's Crim. Evidence, vol. 1, § 41. In the instant case this principle might be invoked in support of the ruling of the court if at the time of the subsequent act the conditions existing at the time of the commission of the offense prevailed. Since, however, according to the evidence such maladies as were claimed to have reduced the appellant's vitality to a degree which rendered it improbable that he was in a physical condition on the 2d of July to have committed the offense were not shown to have continued during the two months intervening before the time of the subsequent alleged assault upon another party, we think the evidence was not relevant, and that its admission was error. The harmful nature of the proof of other offenses is recognized

(see Underhill on Crim. Evidence, § 87), and such evidence is to be received only when brought clearly within some defined exception to the rule excluding it.

This condition is not met in the instant case, and we regard the error committed and pointed out as harmful to a degree that requires a reversal of the judgment, which is ordered.

Ex parte YOUNG. (No. 5818.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 5, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, May 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law § 1158(2)—On appeal from denial of bail, evidence will not be stated in detail.

On appeal from an order denying bail to one charged with murder, the court will not make a detailed statement and analysis of the evidence.

2. Criminal law § 1158(2)—On appeal from denial of bail the question is whether verdict of guilty would probably be rendered.

On appeal from an order denying bail to one charged with murder, the question is not whether the Court of Criminal Appeals would sustain a verdict inflicting capital punishment, but whether, in the opinion of such court a jury, in due administration of the law, would probably convict and inflict capital punishment.

3. Bail § 49—Evidence held not to sustain refusal of bail.

Refusal of bail to one charged with murder of his sister-in-law held not warranted by evidence.

4. Bail § 49—Conflict in evidence not conclusive of right to bail.

In deciding whether one charged with murder is entitled to bail, that the evidence is conflicting is not conclusive of the right to bail.

Appeal from District Court, Montgomery County; D. F. Singleton, Judge.

Floyd Young was charged with murder and applied for bail. From an order denying bail, he appeals. Reversed and bail allowed.

See, also, 219 S. W. 1102.

C. W. Nugent, of Galveston, for appellant. Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. [1, 2] This is an appeal from the order of the district judge denying bail. Appellant was charged with the murder of Bertha Snooks, a girl about 18 years of age. The evidence discloses that while sitting in the kitchen at her father's home she was shot and killed, her assailant using a shotgun loaded with buckshot. The state relies upon circumstances to identify the appellant as the assassin. We refrain from making a detailed statement and analysis of the evidence, such being the practice in cases of this character. Sharp v. State, 1 Tex. App. 290; Ex parte Day, 8 Tex. App. 328; Ex parte Sperger, 62 Tex. Cr. R. 133, 137 S. W. 351. The question is not whether this court would sustain a verdict of a jury inflicting capital punishment, but whether in the opinion of this court a jury, in due administration of the law, would probably convict and inflict capital punishment. Ex parte Smith, 23 Tex. App. 100, 5 S. W. 101; Ex parte Russell, 71 Tex. Cr. R. 377, 160 S. W. 76.

[3] The deceased was the daughter of George Snooks. She had several sisters, one of whom was the wife of appellant. The members of the family were farmers, and lived in the same neighborhood, the home of appellant being about a quarter of a mile from that of the father of the deceased. The mother of appellant resided some five miles distant from him, and in traveling from her home to his own he would pass along the road near the home of deceased. At the time the homicide occurred, there was on the premises of the father of deceased a large shallow pond, caused apparently by heavy rains and insufficient drainage. This pond was between the home of appellant and the road mentioned. It was the state's theory that the appellant, after spending a part of the day at the home of his mother, left late in the evening, traveling on horseback on the road mentioned, reached the premises of the father of deceased after dark, hitched his horse to a fence some short distance from the road, waded across the pond and across a potato patch to the house, and, standing near the door, fired the fatal shot, using a 12-gauge shotgun loaded with buckshot; that he returned by the same road, mounted his horse, and rode to his home, depositing the shoes which he was wearing at the time in the pond as he returned to his horse. It was shown that appellant a short time before the homicide had purchased two buckshot shells, 12-gauge, and it was also shown that after the homicide the sheriff found at the house of appellant two such shells undischarged. He owned, and had in his house when it was searched by the sheriff shortly after the homicide, a 12-gauge shotgun, but this, according to the testimony of the sheriff, which was not disputed, had not been recently fired. Some three weeks prior to the homicide he had bought a single-barrel 12-gauge shotgun, and the next day after he bought it told the dealer he had sold it to a negro. The whereabouts of this gun at the time of the homicide was not otherwise shown. From the pond to the house, and from the house to the pond, tracks were plainly visible, they having been made by a woman's shoe with certain peculiarities, and after the homicide a pair of such shoes were found in the pond, with circumstances indicating that they had been recently deposited there. There was evidence that the shoes mentioned belonged to the wife of appellant, and had been seen at his house before the homicide. This fact was strongly controverted by the appellant, his wife, and several other witnesses. There was also a controversy and conflict of evidence as to whether the foot of appellant was of a size that would permit him to wear the shoes. There were tracks indicating that a horse had been hitched near the pond, and there were tracks near this horse, made by a person wearing heavy boots. The tracks were imperfect, and not otherwise identified. The appellant's boots and perhaps his pants were wet. This was accounted for from the appellant's standpoint by proof that the weather was rainy, that he had been working in his mother's potato patch in the rain, and had driven his wagon into a pond at her house in order to clean it out for use in hauling cotton, and in so doing had gone to a depth that wet his clothes. There was testimony that tracks made by one of the horses driven by appellant to his buggy at the funeral of the deceased were similar to the tracks of the horse which were traced to the home of appellant on the morning after the homicide. There was much room for controversy from the circumstances touching the identity of the horse making the tracks. The peculiarity was not shown to have been marked or uncommon, nor was the foot of appellant's horse examined to determine its presence thereon.

The shot was fired near 8 o'clock in the evening, there being some conflict as to the exact time. The appellant sought to show by witnesses who were with him on his way home from his mother's house that he must have reached home before the shot was fired. His wife testified at the time it was fired he was milking the cows at his home.

The deceased, some two years before her death and while living at appellant's house, had given birth to an illegitimate child. It was the state's theory that appellant was its father, and the motive for the crime was resentment because of the unwillingness of the deceased to continue illicit relations with him. The appellant and his wife took the child to Houston to an infirmary, from which it was placed with persons to raise. The mother of deceased, and some of deceased's sisters, testified that she had told them that the child was that of appellant. Against this it was proved that she had sworn in the grand jury that another person was the parent of the child, and had also made a similar statement to others. Anonymous letters found among the effects of the deceased, seeking to arrange a clandestine meeting, and threatening violence upon refusal, were introduced, and the opinion of witnesses pro and con taken as to the identity of the handwriting with that of appellant; an irreconcilable conflict being developed. Two of the sisters of the deceased had given birth to illegitimate children, with which it was made plain that appellant was not connected. He had taken some interest in aiding these women, and one of them had received some money from him. There was evidence negating any secret association with the deceased by the appellant during the 2 years intervening between the birth of her child and her death, and during this time the relations between the appellant and the members of the family of deceased were friendly, and visits were exchanged.

[4] This is a summary of the evidence upon which we reach the conclusion that we cannot approve the judgment of the trial judge refusing appellant bail. While the fact that the evidence is conflicting is not conclusive of the right to bail (Smith v. State, 23 Tex. App. 357, 5 S. W. 219, 59 Am. Rep. 773; Ex parte Jones, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 422, 20 S. W. 983) in deciding the question involved in this character of proceeding, a consideration of the nature of the evidence for both the state and the accused cannot be overlooked. Assuming that the facts proved on behalf of the state would be sufficient to support the verdict of the jury assessing capital punishment, such verdict would be supported by the judgment of the jury touching the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given their testimony. So supported on appeal, the truth of the criminating facts relied on by the state would stand established, and the issues dependent upon conflicting evidence resolved against the accused. The office of this court on appeal would be to determine whether the established facts justify the conclusion of guilt, and authorize the punishment assessed when measured by the rules applicable to circumstantial evidence. As the matter is now presented, the truth of practically all of the criminating facts is controverted, and to hold the proof evident it would be necessary for this court to determine these conflicts against the appellant, and to draw the conclusion that a jury, in the due administration of justice, would probably convict the appellant of a capital crime and assess the punishment accordingly. In our opinion, under the facts of this case, it is the right of the appellant to have bail pending the decision by a jury which of the conflicting facts are established, and whether inference of guilt would be drawn from them. Analogous cases, we think, are numerous, among them Ex parte Boyett, 19 Tex. App. 17; Ex parte Catney, 17 Tex. App. 332; Ex parte Coldiron, 15 Tex. App. 464; Ex parte Duncan, 27 Tex. App. 485, 11 S. W. 442; In re Foulk, 13 S. W. 746; Ex parte Gallaher, 25 Tex. App. 455, 8 S. W. 481; Ex parte Gilstrap, 14 Tex. App. 240; Ex parte Jones, 26 Tex.

App. 597, 10 S. W. 114; Ex parte Locklin, 72 S. W. 585; Ex parte Pace, 16 Tex. App. 541; Ex parte Smith, 26 Tex. App. 136, 9 S. W. 359.

The judgment is reversed, and bail allowed in the sum of $10,000.

On Motion for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. On a former day of this term the judgment of the district court of Montgomery county denying appellant bail was reversed, and bail granted in the sum of $10,000. Appellant has filed a motion for rehearing herein, requesting that same be granted to the extent of reducing said bail to the sum of $5,000, for the reason that it is impossible for the appellant to make bail in so large a sum, and that same is excessive.

Upon a careful review of the evidence, in connection with appellant's motion for rehearing, we have reached the conclusion that the amount of appellant's bail should be reduced, and his bond fixed in the sum of $5,000. To this extent the rehearing is granted with instructions that upon his execution of the proper bond in said sum he shall be discharged as provided by law.

HOOVER V. STATE. (No. 5743.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 268—Wooden club held not per se "deadly weapon."

In a prosecution for murder, where the weapon used was a wooden stick about three feet long, three inches in diameter at one end, and tapering to two inches at the other end, such club was not per se a "deadly weapon."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Deadly Weapon.]

2. Homicide \S 290—Instruction as to use of wooden stick as deadly weapon held erroneously refused.

In prosecution for murder, where deceased was killed with one blow of a wooden club, which was not per se a deadly weapon, it was error to refuse to instruct affirmatively that unless the jury found that in the manner used the stick was a deadly weapon, conviction should not be returned unless the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time the blow was struck defendant had the specific intent to kill deceased, in view of evidence that only one blow was struck, and that defendant did not intend to kill.

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

John Hoover was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

Hampton, Harris & Hampton, of De Leon, and George L. Sullivan and Goodson & Nabors, all of Comanche, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. The appeal is from a sentence of confinement in the penitentiary for six years for the offense of murder. The deceased was a supervisor of the construction of a "tank farm" in one of the oil districts, the construction work being done by employes of independent contractors. Appellant and his father had been such employes, and on Saturday preceding the homicide on Tuesday an altercation took place on the premises. In this altercation insulting epithets were exchanged between the deceased and the appellant; some blows were struck, the deceased obtaining and exhibiting a pistol, and ordering the appellant to leave and to refrain from coming back on the premises, also ordering appellant's father to cause this to be done. There were mutual threats made at the time, and evidence of their repetition later, those of the deceased being communicated to the appellant. Evidence pro and con touching the disposition and reputation of the deceased as a man of violence was introduced. There was also evidence that appellant had been informed after the difficulty on Saturday that the deceased was armed. The immediate scene of the homicide was at the depot of the village, near which was situated a restaurant belonging to the father of appellant, and a store kept by a witness named Barnes. Appellant testified that he had business at the depot, and while standing there the deceased passed, brushing the arm of the appellant, and then called for the railroad agent. The appellant then walked to the restaurant, and picked up a stick, which was used for packing ice in an ice cream freezer. Taking the stick to the depot for the purpose of protection, he laid it down on the ground. On his return the deceased was not observed by him, and he entered into conversation with others, and while so engaged this occurred:

"I looked up at the door, and Mr. Breen was standing in the door like, looking right down at me with his hand in his side pocket, and I looked back down again, and about that time he came out the door, and as he came out I grabbed the stick, and as he stepped on the engine, I hit him. The reason I hit him was because I thought he was going to shoot me. Just as Mr. Breen stepped on the engine he caught it with both hands, and then he dropped his right hand; and was sorter turning toward me, and just as he turned I hit him up above the ear somewhere. I did not intend to kill him, but hit him to keep him from getting his gun and shooting me. When I hit him he fell off the engine to the ground, and I threw the stick away and caught hold of his hands. I didn't know how badly he was hurt, and thought he might shoot me. When I found he was badly hurt I laid his hands down."

There were several eyewitnesses introduced by the state, one of them measurably corroborating the appellant's theory of a demonstration by the deceased. Most of them, however, exclude by their testimony this theory. The court in its charge took cognizance of the evidence raising the issues of murder, manslaughter, and self-defense based upon a demonstration following communicated threats.

In his instruction to the jury, the court embodied a part of article 1147, P. C., as follows:

"If the instrument be one not likely to produce death, it is not to be presumed that death was designed, unless, from the manner in which it was used, such intention evidently appears."

[1] The homicide resulted from one blow upon the head of deceased, struck by the appellant, using a wooden stick about three feet long, three inches in diameter at one end, and tapering to two inches at the other end, somewhat in the shape of a baseball bat. The weight of the stick is not given. Under numerous expressions of the opinions of this court, the stick in question was not per se a deadly weapon. Among these are Crow v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 202, 116 S. W. 52, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 497, in which the instrument was a baseball bat. Others in which sticks of wood of varying sizes were used will be found in Wilson v. State, 15 Tex. App. 155; Washington v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 483, 110 S. W. 751, 126 Am. St. Rep. 800; Boyd v. State, 28 Tex. App. 137, 12 S. W. 737; Fitch v. State, 37 Tex. Cr. R. 502, 36 S. W. 584; Shaw v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 442, 31 S. W. 361; Hamilton v. State, 60 Tex. Cr. R. 253, 131 S. W. 1127. Similar rulings with reference to other instruments used as a bludgeon will be found in Honeywell v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 189, 49 S. W. 586; Danforth v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 111, 69 S. W. 159; Skidmore v. State, 43 Tex. 93; Peacock v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 435, 107 S. W. 346. The fact that death results from the use of the weapon does not change the rule stated as to its character. The trial court, in recognition of the application of this rule to the instant case, gave the charge mentioned. Appellant insists, however, that there was a fatal omission in the charge in its failure to instruct the jury affirmatively that, unless they found that in the manner used the stick was a deadly weapon, a conviction of murder could not result unless the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that at the time the blow was struck he had the specific intent to kill the deceased. This view was presented in several special charges, which were refused, and represents the converse of the proposition that was submitted. Article 1149, P. C., provides that where a homicide occurs under the influence of sudden passion, but by the use of means not in their nature calculated to produce death, the person killing is not guilty of a homicide unless it appears that there was an intention to kill, but the party from whose act the death resulted can be convicted for any grade of assault and battery. Speaking on this subject, Presiding Judge White, in the case of Hill v. State, 11 Tex. App. 456, in which the same point was involved, said in substance:

"The otherwise admirable charge * * * did not submit the alternative proposition presented in article 614 [now 1149] as to the law where there was no intention to kill. * * * From a careful investigation of all the facts as they are stated in the record, we are of opinion that defendant was entitled to have this view of the law submitted to the jury in a plain, pointed and affirmative manner. If she was not actuated by an intention to kill, * * * then the killing could not be murder."

In instances in which under the evidence the instrument used in producing the homicide was not a deadly weapon, or in which there was an issue upon that point, this court, with marked uniformity, has held that upon appellant's request his theory of an absence of intent to kill should be put before the jury in a manner clearly informing them as to the law. Washington v. State, 53 Tex. Cr. R. 483, 110 S. W. 751, 126 Am. St. Rep. 800; Crow v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 203, 116 S. W. 52, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 497; Merka v. State, 82 Tex. Cr. R. 569, 199 S. W. 1123; Branch's Crim. Law of Texas, § 434, cases listed therein.

[2] In the instant case the proof was undisputed that the instrument used was a stick, and that but one blow was struck. The appellant testified that he did not intend to kill, and we think the evidence was such that the court was not warranted in refusing to instruct the jury in an affirmative way upon this theory of the appellant's.

The omission in the charge, which we have pointed out, requires a reversal of the judgment, which is ordered.

SCHELLENGER v. STATE. (No. 5650.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

War §4—Disloyalty Act unconstitutional.

The disloyalty Act passed by the fourth called session of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature (Acts 1918, c. 8) is invalid.

Appeal from District Court, Cherokee County; L. D. Guinn, Judge.

C. L. Schellenger was convicted under the Disloyalty Act, and appeals. Reversed, and prosecution dismissed.

Israel Dreeben, of Dallas, for appellant.
Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. In this case appellant was convicted under what is known as the Disloyalty Act, passed by the fourth called session of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature (chapter 8), and his punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for a term of two years. It is not necessary to go into an extended statement of the facts in this case, or a discussion of the law relative thereto. In the case of Ex parte Ben. F. Meckel, reported in 220 S. W. 81, this court held the law under which this conviction was had invalid, and we have not had any occasion since to change our views regarding same.

The judgment of the lower court will be reversed, and the prosecution will be dismissed.

BRIGGS et al. v. STATE. (No. 5803.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 9, 1920.)

1. Judgment §143(2), 145(2)—Excuse for surety's failure to answer proceeding on forfeited bail bond must be shown on motion for rehearing or new trial.

On a surety's motion for rehearing or new trial after default judgment in the state's proceeding on a forfeited bail bond, a sufficient excuse must be shown by the surety for his failure to answer, as well as a further showing that he has a meritorious defense.

2. Judgment §143(2)—Default judgment will not be set aside in absence of fraud, accident, or other cause.

In the absence of some showing of fraud, accident, or unavoidable cause, a default judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction will not be set aside.

3. Appeal and error §957(1)—No relief from default on bail bond unless discretion in denying rehearing abused.

To obtain relief at the hands of the Court of Criminal Appeals from the trial court's refusal to grant motion of surety on a bail bond for rehearing or new trial after default judgment against him, it must be affirmatively shown that the discretion of the trial court has been abused.

On Motion for Rehearing.

4. Bail §58 — Bond stating defendant was charged with unlawfully keeping intoxicating liquor, a felony, sufficient.

Under Vernon's Ann. Code Cr. Proc. 1916, art. 321, bail bond describing the offense with which the principal was charged as "unlawfully keeping intoxicating liquor in violation of law, a felony," held sufficient in the description, all that is necessary being to state that defendant is charged with a felony or misdemeanor; the remainder of the descriptive language used in the bond might be treated as surplusage.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Tarrant County; George E. Hosey, Judge.

Action on a forfeited bail bond by the state of Texas against M. D. Briggs and others. From judgment for the state, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sam S. Beene, of Ft. Worth, for appellants.
Jesse M. Brown, Cr. Dist. Atty., of Ft. Worth, and Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. This is an appeal from a final judgment upon a forfeited bail bond, had in the criminal district court of Tarrant county.

M. D. Briggs was charged by indictment in said court with a felony, and upon his arrest he executed a bail bond, in the usual form, giving one Arnold Guertler and one Frank Thomas as sureties. Thereafter, upon the call of the case, Briggs made default, and judgment nisi was entered against him and his sureties in May, 1919, and citations duly issued for the parties defendant in said proceeding. Thereafter, no answer having been filed, in October, 1919, a final judgment was entered against said parties. On December 23d a motion for rehearing, or new trial, was filed by the appellant Guertler, in which he sets up the fact that immediately after service of said citation he employed an attorney to represent him in said matter, and that he was not aware until December 12, 1919, nearly 30 days after the rendition thereof, that a final judgment had been entered against him, and that said attorney had failed to file an answer, or in any way to present his defenses. It is also alleged in said motion that Mr. Guertler has a meritorious defense, which he would have made had his said attorney not failed, etc., as aforesaid.

[1] It is the rule in such cases that a sufficient excuse must be shown for failure to answer, as well as the further showing that the party sought to be charged has a meritorious defense. We find nothing in the record which suggests any sort of an excuse or reason why the attorney employed by Mr. Guertler did not file an answer. Said attorney did not testify with regard to the matter, nor did Mr. Guertler assign any reason in his testimony for the failure on the part of such attorney.

[2] However much we may regret it, we have no right to override the authorities in such case, which seem to agree that, in the absence of some showing of fraud, accident, or unavoidable cause, a default judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction will not be set aside. Martin v. Clements (Civ. App.) 193 S. W. 437; Miller v. First State Bank et al.

(Civ. App.) 184 S. W. 614; Hester v. Baskin (Civ. App.) 184 S. W. 726.

[3] In order to obtain relief at our hands, it must be affirmatively shown that the discretion of the trial court in these matters has been abused. Boyd v. Urrutia (Civ. App.) 195 S. W. 341; Giles v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 612, 151 S. W. 1043.

We have examined the various defenses which appellant alleges he would have made if permitted. We think none of them very meritorious, and that the trial court did not abuse his discretion in this proceeding.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Appellant Guertler has filed a motion for rehearing, urging that we erred in holding that no sufficient excuse was shown for his failure to file his answer in the trial court prior to the taking of a final judgment upon the forfeited bond. The only excuse or reason suggested by the record for such failure was that an attorney whom appellant had employed failed to file any answer. It is not even attempted to be shown that said attorney was in any wise prevented or was unable to file such answer, or that he was misled; in fact, there is no effort on the part of appellant to account for the action of said attorney in any way. Under all the authorities cited in our original opinion, this is no showing why the trial court should have granted a new trial, and certainly is no showing why we should hold that in refusing a new trial the lower court was guilty of abusing the discretion confided by law in him. No authority is cited by appellant holding to the contrary, and none are known to the court.

[4] Complaint is also made that we should have held that the defenses which appellant would have made, if an answer had been filed, were meritorious. The only proposition advanced in support of this contention in his motion is that, inasmuch as the bail bond in question described the offense with which appellant's principal was charged, as "unlawfully keeping intoxicating liquor in violation of law, a felony" same was not a sufficient description, and the said bond was invalid. Appellant cites as his only authority the recent case of Saunders v. State, 216 S. W. 870. This case does not support appellant's position. The bond under discussion in that case did not state whether the principal therein was charged with a felony or misdemeanor, did not set out any offense known eo nomine to the law, nor did it set out the constituent elements of any offense known to our statutes, and hence it was correctly held to be insufficient. In the instant case it appears that the principal was charged, in terms as set out in the bail bond, with a felony; and under article 321, Vernon's C. C. P., it is a sufficient description, and all that is necessary is to state that the accused is charged with a felony or a misdemeanor, as the case might be. The remainder of the descriptive language used in the bail bond in the instant case might be treated as surplusage.

Being unable to agree with any of the contentions made in this motion, the same will be overruled.

Ex parte ROSELLE. (No. 5827.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 5, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, June 9, 1920.)

1. Evidence \S 83(1)—Courts will take judicial notice that Lieutenant Governor was duly elected and had qualified.

The courts will take judicial notice that one who signed an extradition warrant as acting Governor was the duly elected and qualified Lieutenant Governor, and had the authority, and was required, in the absence of the Governor, to act as such.

2. Evidence \S 83(1)—Presumption of regularity of acts of acting Governor.

Where an extradition warrant was signed by the acting Governor and duly certified by the secretary of state, the presumption is in favor of the regularity of the acts of the acting Governor, and in the absence of showing to the contrary his acts will be upheld.

On Motion for Rehearing.

3. Habeas corpus \S 85(2)—One attacking validity of a warrant, regular on its face and signed by acting Governor, has burden of proof.

One attacking on habeas corpus a warrant for extradition, which is regular on its face, etc., has the burden of showing that the prima facie case of regularity was not in accordance with the facts.

4. Habeas corpus \S 30(2)—Jurat of justice of foreign state, affixed to affidavit, held not open to attack on account of technical defects.

Objection to the jurat of a justice of the peace affixed to the affidavit, a copy of which accompanied the Governor's extradition warrant, and which affidavit was certified as authentic by the Governor of the demanding state, on the ground that it did not state the number of the justice's precinct, will not be considered in habeas corpus proceedings, where there was nothing to show that in the demanding state a complaint sworn to before a justice of the peace was void, unless he stated in his jurat the number of his precinct, for, even though there was a technical defect in the jurat, it might be amended.

5. Habeas corpus \S 30(2)—Fugitive not discharged because of substantial defects in state's pleadings under law of demanding state.

In habeas corpus proceedings a fugitive from justice arrested under an extradition warrant will not be discharged because of substantial defects in the pleadings of the state, under the laws of the demanding state.

6. Extradition \S 36—Not necessary that there be a certified copy of complaint and indictment accompanying warrant.

In an extradition case, it is not necessary that there be a certified copy of the indictment or of the complaint accompanying the Governor's warrant.

7. Extradition \S 34—Where requisition shows affidavit in demanding state, and demand is made, requirements of law are met.

Where a requisition shows that an affidavit has been made against the accused in the demanding state, and that a demand has been made upon the Governor of the state of the forum, which certifies that the affidavit is authentic, the requirements of the law are met, and it is immaterial, on habeas corpus to secure the release of one held under an extradition warrant, that the prosecuting attorney of a county of the demanding state was allowed to testify that certain acts constitute an offense under the law of that state.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Harris County; C. W. Robinson, Judge.

Application of P. L. Roselle for writ of habeas corpus. From a judgment remanding him to custody, he appeals. Affirmed.

Heldingsfelders, of Houston, for appellant. Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the criminal district court of Harris county, remanding appellant to the custody of certain officers of that county, and directing that he be forthwith delivered to the extradition agent of the state of Wyoming.

[1, 2] On April 12, 1920, a warrant issued from the office of the Governor of Texas, duly reciting that appellant stood properly charged by affidavit with the offense of forgery in the state of Wyoming, and that demand had been made, in accordance with the laws of the United States and of this state, for the delivery of appellant to a named officer of said state of Wyoming, to be by him extradited. The application for the writ of habeas corpus seems to set up that appellant was detained without any warrant or due process of law, it being stated therein that he was held under a telegram from a Wyoming officer. The application was dated April 7, 1920. A hearing was had in the court below, and judgment rendered, remanding appellant on April 13, 1920, and the warrant above referred to seems to have been offered in evidence. We think the judgment of the trial court correct. Said warrant was signed by W. A. Johnson, acting Governor, and duly certified to by the secretary of state. This court judicially knows that W. A. Johnson is the duly elected and qualified Lieutenant Governor of Texas, and that he has authority, and is required, in the absence or inability of the Governor, to act as Governor of the state. The presumption is in favor of the regularity of the acts of the said Johnson as acting Governor, and, in the absence of some showing to the contrary, such acts will be upheld.

The objections to the jurat to the complaint against appellant are not matters which we can consider.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[3] In a motion for rehearing it is insisted that we were in error in upholding the action of the lower court in remanding appellant to the custody of the officers, who held him under a warrant issued by W. A. Johnson, acting Governor of Texas, upon a requisition from the Governor of Wyoming. No authorities are cited intimating the incorrectness of our holding originally in this regard. The warrant is regular on its face, is signed by W. A. Johnson, acting Governor, is attested by the great seal of Texas, and the signature and seal of the secretary of state of Texas. The burden is on appellant to show that this prima facie case of regularity was not in accord with the facts, and such burden is not met by any showing in this case. We think the regularity of the acts of the acting Governor is to be presumed, in the absence of any affirmative attack and showing relative thereto. Ex parte Stanley, 25 Tex. App. 378, 8 S. W. 645, 8 Am. St. Rep. 440; Ex parte White, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 499, 48 S. W. 639; Ex parte Hancock, 75 Tex. Cr. R. 71, 170 S. W. 145.

[4, 5] The objection to the jurat of the justice of the peace, affixed to the affidavit, a copy of which accompanied the warrant of the Governor, and which affidavit is certified by the Governor of Wyoming as authentic, will not be considered by us. Said affidavit shows upon its face that it was made before one of the justices of the peace of Platte county, Wyo., and nothing appears on the part of appellant, or anywhere in the record, showing that in the state of Wyoming a complaint sworn to before a justice of the peace is void, unless the justice states in his jurat the number of his precinct, etc. If there be a technical defect in the jurat, the same might be amended. Cubine v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. R. 90, 151 S. W. 301; Sanders v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 153, 105 S. W. 803; Flournoy v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 29, 100 S. W. 151. This court will not discharge a fugitive from justice upon the ground even of substantial defects in the pleadings of the state under the law of the demanding state. Pearce v. Texas, 155 U. BRISCOE v. STATE. (No. 5804.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 12, 1920.)

1. Homicide §144, 158(3)—General threat by accused is inadmissible, and state has burden of showing that deceased was meant.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence that five hours before the killing accused made a threat to kill a man which was not shown to have referred to deceased was inadmissible, the nearness of time not being sufficient to render such threat admissible without other evidence that deceased was the man threatened, and the burden was on the state to show that deceased was meant or included.

2. Witnesses §269(7), 330(1)—Wife of accused cannot be cross-examined as to new matter.

The wife of accused cannot be cross-examined on new matter not relevant to matters brought out on direct examination, such as threats by accused, either for the purpose of impeachment or as original testimony.

3. Witnesses §389—Cannot be impeached by immaterial statements which he denies.

A witness cannot be impeached by proof of immaterial statements which he denied making.

4. Criminal law §404(4)—Clothing worn by deceased held admissible.

In a prosecution for homicide where the testimony by witnesses for the state and those for the defense were conflicting as to the attitude of the parties toward each other when shots were fired, it was not error to admit in evidence clothing worn by deceased at the time of the shooting.

5. Criminal law §404(3)—Prosecutor can introduce knife accused claimed deceased attempted to use.

In a prosecution for homicide where accused claimed that he shot in self-defense when deceased was advancing on him with a knife, it was not error to admit the knife in evidence to show that it was in a badly crippled condition.

6. Homicide §187 — Prosecutor can show physical condition of deceased known to accused.

Where accused claimed self-defense against an attack by deceased, it was not error to show that deceased was 70 years of age, clumsy, and having defective eyesight, where accused had known deceased for 40 years and knew of his condition.

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

Nathan Briscoe was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Callaway & Callaway, of Comanche, and Eldson & Eldson, of Hamilton, for appellant. Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

LATTIMORE, J. In this case appellant was charged with the murder of one Jesse Burke, and upon conviction his penalty was fixed at 50 years' confinement in the penitentiary.

Appellant and deceased were neighboring farmers. Deceased owned a binder, and, shortly before the homicide, claimed to have lost therefrom a chain. Some time prior to the killing, appellant was engaged in cutting his grain with a binder which belonged to a Mr. Lindsey and the brother of deceased. While so engaged, the parties broke a link in a similar chain. Not being able to further operate said machine, Mr. Lindsey asked appellant to go to the house of deceased and get from him a link with which to mend the broken chain. Appellant did so, and, according to the witness, returned with one link; but, in the meantime, the parties had broken another link, and could not further operate the machine. Witness Nelse Briscoe, who was assisting in said cutting, testified that he went that night on horseback down to the place of a Mr. Tunnell, and got some links, with which the chain was again repaired, and the cutting continued. When appellant returned from going after the link at the house of deceased, he reported that deceased was not there, but that he had gotten the link out of his tool box. Very soon thereafter deceased began claiming that some one had stolen a chain from his binder, and seems not only to have made that statement to several parties, but after hearing that appellant had been to his house and gotten a link out of his tool box, deceased came and examined the chain on the Lindsey binder, and claimed that it was his, and stated that the person who got the link stole the chain. To some of the witnesses, deceased made a direct charge that appellant had stolen his chain. Appellant testified that, on the day before the homicide, he had a conversation with deceased, in which he was accused of stealing the chain. He said that he told deceased he was mistaken, and that he could prove it. He further said that he told deceased that he did get the one link, and that deceased then said, "Yes, and you got the chain too." Appellant further says that he explained to deceased how they fixed the chain, and told him that Nelse Briscoe got on his work horse and rode down to Doc Tunnell's in the night and got the links with which to fix it. He says that deceased asked him if he could prove that, and he told him that he could prove it by Nelse Briscoe; that deceased then said, if he would bring Nelse and have him state as appellant claimed, he would accept that statement. Appellant said that he then promised to get Nelse and bring him to prove that the chain on Lindsey's binder was not the chain of deceased, but was a chain that they had repaired themselves. Soon after parting with deceased on this occasion, appellant said he met the witness Talley, who told him that deceased had made very heavy threats against him. It appears from the evidence that the next day appellant went to the town of Gustine, some seven or eight miles distant, where Nelse Briscoe was staying, got Nelse, and went with him and a young man named Sewell, who had also been present when the chain was broken and mended, to the farm of deceased, and then out into the field where deceased was at work. Before going, appellant placed a pistol in his pocket, giving as his reason for so doing that he did not know what deceased might attempt to do to him; that he was a much smaller man than deceased, not physically strong, and no match for deceased in a personal encounter, if deceased should attack him. When appellant and the two men who were with him approached deceased, the fatal difficulty immediately ensued, and deceased was shot, once in the hand or arm, once in the side, and once in the back from the effects of which he died at once. The account given of the occurrence by the state's witnesses, and those for appellant, were widely different, and, as the case must be reversed, we express no opinion as to the evidence, pro or con. Appellant and his witnesses claimed that deceased immediately became angry, and attacked appellant, forcing him backward quite a distance, cutting at him with a knife, and that appellant shot him in self-defense.

[1] It appears from bill of exceptions No. 3 that on the day of the homicide, and about 11 o'clock—the homicide being about 4 o'clock—and while in the town of Gustine, some seven or eight miles from the scene of the killing, appellant was heard to say, "I would kill a man before I would be done that way." The witness who gave this testimony said that appellant was across the street from him, and talking to the justice of the peace, a man named Gray, and that he had no reason to believe or suspect that appellant was referring to deceased, and that he had since been informed that appellant was referring to another man. In all the cases known to us where a general threat of the accused is introduced by the state, it is held error unless the state also show that the threat is directed toward the injured party, or embraced such person. In his qualification to this bill of exceptions, the trial court lays stress on the fact that it was only a few hours before the killing, and appellant made no explanation of this statement. This does not help the matter. The burden is on the state to show that deceased was meant or included, and not on the appellant to show that he was not meant or included. On another trial, unless there be evidence showing substantially that the threat was directed at deceased, it should not be admitted. Fuller v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 454, 113 S. W. 540; Garrett v. State, 52 Tex. Cr. R. 258, 106 S. W. 889; Hall v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 259, 64 S. W. 248; Fossett v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 400, 55 S. W. 497; Holley v. State, 39 Tex. Cr. R. 307, 46 S. W. 39. In the Fossett Case, just cited, the threat was made only a few moments before the homicide. In many of the cases, the threats were made nearer to the time of the killing than the one in the instant case. The nearness of time does not seem to be sufficient to justify the admission of such threats, unless there be something else either connected therewith, or appearing in the evidence elsewhere, which would make it reasonably certain that the injured party was meant or included in the threat.

[2] The cross-examination of appellant's wife, we think, went too far. By none of the authorities does it seem to be held that in cross-examination new matter may be gone into by the state. The bill of exceptions sets out, in question and answer, the examination and cross-examination of Mrs. Briscoe, and much of the cross-examination appears to be on new matter not relevant to the matters brought out on direct examination. In his qualification of this bill, the court below says that no objection was made to any of the cross-examination, except that portion of her testimony which related to the question addressed to her as to what Mrs. Lindsey had told her that morning about Mr. Burke's inquiry as to the chain, and this conversation was drawn out by the defendant. The explanation of the trial court is somewhat lengthy, and we are unable to tell therefrom just what was objected to. In view of another trial, unless appellant goes further in his examination of this witness than was done in the instant trial, Mrs. Briscoe should not be asked on cross-examination as to threats made by appellant to her that deceased would never accuse another man of getting his chain, either for the purpose of impeachment, or to elicit such fact as original testimony. Sections 152, 153. Branch's Penal Code.

[3] We are unable to see how the testimony, as to what was said by Nelse Briscoe over the telephone, in a conversation supposed to have been had with Mrs. Leona Parker, was material to any issue in this case. The court undertook to limit the same as affecting only the credibility of said Briscoe as a witness, but a witness cannot be impeached upon denial thereof by proof of immaterial statements. In the absence of further light on the subject-matter involved in said conversation, the disconnected part of which at one end of the telephone used was testified to, said testimony should not be admitted.

[4, 5] The attitude of the parties toward each other during the difficulty being an issue, we are unable to say that it was error to admit in testimony the clothing worn by deceased at the time of the shooting. Nor do we think any error appears in the introduction of the knife of deceased. It was shown to be in a badly crippled condition, and in view of the fact that appellant claims that deceased attacked him with his knife, and cut his clothes in several places, the condition of the knife, as seen by the jury, might have a material bearing on this issue.

[6] The objections urged to proof of the physical condition of deceased, including his sight, do not seem to us tenable. Deceased was a man about 70 years of age—large, clumsy, and shown to have eyesight more or less defective. Appellant had known him for 40 years. Appellant claimed that he shot in his necessary self-defense, against an attack then being made on him by deceased. The physical condition of deceased, as known to appellant, was material for what it is worth as shedding light on what appellant believed about his danger at the time of the shooting.

This disposes of the material matters raised on appeal.

For the errors mentioned, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BROWN v. STATE. (No. 5695.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 297—Refusal to instruct on justifiable homicide proper.

In a prosecution for murder committed upon a negro in course of an unjustifiable assault made by defendant as a member of a posse and other members upon the wife of deceased, refusal of the trial court to instruct on the law of justifiable homicide held not erroneous, the homicide not having been justifiable under any phase of the evidence.

2. Homicide \S 112(4)—Killing of negro by assailant of latter's wife not in self-defense.

If a negro assaulted a posse member who, with others, was committing an unlawful assault upon the negro's wife to compel her to reveal the whereabouts of a criminal, the attack was provoked by the posse member's unlawful acts, and killing of the negro by him to avert injury to himself was unlawful, as the negro had a right to protect his home and family, and to resist unlawful detention of his own person also attempted.

3. Homicide \S 112(4)—That person assaulted by posse member stopped when ordered did not deprive him of right to resist.

Fact that negro stopped when posse member first ordered him to do so, and afterwards advanced threatening injury to posse member if he obstructed his progress to his home, where other members of posse were illegally assaulting his wife to compel her to reveal whereabouts of a criminal, did not confer upon posse member the right to kill the negro, and, in restraining the negro by an assault with a shotgun, he was guilty of a continuous assault, which negro had right to resist.

4. Homicide \S 101—Posse member's ignorance of character of assault on wife did not justify his killing of husband.

Where a posse member knew that his companions were making an illegal assault upon a negro's wife to compel her to reveal the whereabouts of a criminal, though he was ignorant of the particular character of the force used by his companions, his ignorance did not render lawful his acts in attempting to restrain the negro with a shotgun when he was endeavoring to go to the assistance of his wife, nor render justifiable the killing of the negro.

5. Homicide \S 122, 123—Negro had right to procure arms for defense of home and family.

A negro had a right to procure arms if necessary to protect his home and family against an illegal assault by posse members endeavoring to discover the whereabouts of a criminal.

6. Criminal law \S 423(3)—Proof of acts of companions of defendant admissible on ground of common purpose or ratification.

In prosecution of posse member for murder of a negro whose wife other members of the posse were assaulting in an endeavor to extort from her the whereabouts of a criminal, proof of acts of other members of the posse while assaulting the wife of deceased held admissible, defendant having shared in their purpose to assault the woman, or else, by having heard her screams and not interfered, having ratified the assault.

7. Criminal law \S 1169(6)—Testimony of acts of companions of defendant charged with murder harmless in view of verdict.

In prosecution of posse member for murder of a negro whose wife other members of posse were assaulting in an endeavor to extort from her the whereabouts of a criminal, proof of the acts of defendant's companions while assaulting the wife of deceased held harmless to defendant, where the verdict of guilty of manslaughter was the most favorable authorized by charge or facts.

8. Criminal law \S 1171(1)—Failure of court trying murder case to require opening statement by prosecution harmless.

In a prosecution for murder, failure of the trial court to require the district attorney to make an opening statement as directed by Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 717, held harmless, no injury being disclosed by the record.

9. Jury \S 82(3)—Motion to quash venire for lack of personal summons properly denied where all present or excused.

In a prosecution for murder, defendant's motion to quash the venire because Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 668, requiring the sheriff executing the writ of special venire verbally to summon the veniremen in person, was not observed, was properly denied, where all the special venire summoned by mail were either in attendance on the court or had been excused for sickness or other legal cause.

Appeal from District Court, Nacogdoches County; L. D. Guinn, Judge.

D. Brown was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Affirmed.

S. M. Adams, C. C. Watson, and V. E. Middlebrook, all of Nacogdoches, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. The appellant shot and killed Alex Escow, was indicted for murder, and convicted of manslaughter, and punishment fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for two years.

On the 18th of May, 1918, Orange Escow, a brother of deceased, killed Jackson Carnelly, who was a cousin of appellant and a deputy sheriff, in a field near the home of deceased. Excitement followed the homicide. A posse, of which appellant was a member, was formed, and, on suggestion of search of Alex Escow's home, a remark in the hearing of appellant was made that the Escow negroes were dangerous. On the following afternoon, believing that the wife of deceased had knowledge of the whereabouts of Orange Es-cow, and was suppressing the information, the appellant, in company with Smith and Davis, went to the home of deceased, and while there the homicide took place. There is but slight conflict in the testimony relating the incidents of the transaction. Stating them as gathered from appellant's testimony, he and his companions had been deputized to aid in the apprehension of Orange Escow. They went by automobile, a distance of about 11 miles, to the home of the deceased. Davis and Smith went into the house; appellant, observing a negro attempt to run out, followed him, and on reaching the back gallery Davis and Smith were engaged in conversation with the wife of deceased, trying to get her to tell what she knew about the murder. Pausing but a short time, he followed the negro who had run out of the house, and ordered him to go in the lot, and shortly after reaching the lot he heard screaming at the house. There were several other young negroes about, and they were ordered by appellant to go in the lot. A negro boy, the son of deceased, came from the field on a mule about this time, and the deceased, with a stick in one hand and a bucket in the other, was walking behind him. Quoting from appellant:

"When deceased was up about fifteen or twenty steps of me I told him to stop, and he stopped, and I told him that no one was going to the house; that the old negro woman was at the house, and they were trying to make her tell where the murderer had gone; and he said he was going to the house. I told him to stop, that he was not going to the house, and for him to stop there, he would be all right there; and he said he was going to the house; if I didn't get out of the trail and let him go to the house he would kill me with the stick. He then started towards me, and I backed up two or three steps, maybe four or five, and I had my gun up to my shoulder. I motioned to him to stop. He kept on coming. From his appearance and looks I saw he was coming, and if I had not run or shot him or done something he would have knocked me in the head with that stick. I had been there the day before, and found a gun out there. I didn't know but what they had a gun there. They were all over the country. He was coming straight towards me when I shot him. My gun was up, and I walked backward, and I told him to stop."

From his cross-examination it appeared that he directed the younger members of the family to stay in the lot. They claimed that he told them to get in the wagon. He said he did not know what Davis and Smith did to the woman, but he heard her screaming, hollering for help, and praying, but did not think they were going to hurt her. He said that he thought the old negro woman hushed hollering about the time that the old man reached the appellant; that he supposed deceased heard her hollering, and was coming to ascertain what was the matter; that he was told by appellant that no one was going to hurt her.

Before the killing took place the companions of appellant, Davis and Smith, put a rope around the neck of the wife of the deceased, put the rope over a rafter, and pulled her up off of the floor. During their assault upon her she was screaming and calling for help in a loud voice. The younger members of the family, who were congregated in a wagon at the lot, were also screaming. There was evidence that the deceased was in the habit of walking with a stick, and that at the time he was killed he had his walking stick. Several state witnesses declared that he made no demonstration with it, and that appellant did not retreat, but shot the deceased as he approached.

[1, 2] The appellant assails as error the action of the court in refusing to instruct the jury upon the law of justifiable homicide. Under no phase of the evidence was the homicide justifiable; appellant's conduct deprived him of the right of perfect self-defense. If the deceased assaulted appellant in the manner described by him, the attack was provoked by appellant's unlawful acts, and the homicide to avert injury to himself was unlawful. The deceased had the right to protect his home and his family (Richardson v. State, 7 Tex. App. 486; Wells v. State, 66 Tex. Cr. R. 618, 141 S. W. 96; Ross v. State, 10 Tex. App. 455, 38 Am. Rep. 643), and to resist unlawful detention of his person, and in the interference with the exercise by the deceased of these rights the appellant was the aggressor. He was a trespasser upon deceased's premises, and without warrant in law put deceased under such restraint as was tantamount to an illegal arrest. His acts were unlawful, and sufficient and reasonably calculated to provoke the difficulty. Ross v. State, 10 Tex. App. 458, 38 Am. Rep. 643; Peter v. State, 23 Tex. App. 684, 5 S. W. 228; Goodman v. State, 4 Tex. App. 349; Williams v. State, 41 Tex. Cr. R. 365, 54 S. W. 759; Miers v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 161, 29 S. W. 1074, 53 Am. St. Rep. 705; Miller v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 609, 21 S. W. 925, 37 Am. St. Rep. 836.

[3] The fact that deceased stopped when appellant first ordered him to do so, and presented his gun, and that he afterwards advanced, threatening injury to appellant if he obstructed his progress to his home, did not confer upon appellant the right to kill deceased. In restraining deceased by force of an assault with a shotgun he was guilty of a continuous assault. Alford v. State, 8 Tex. App. 545; Johnson v. State, 5 Tex. App. 47. The deceased had a right to resist it to regain his liberty and to go to his home. These rights continued, notwithstanding he stopped when the appellant first commanded him to do so. There was no abandonment of the aggression on the part of the appellant, so long as he opposed by force the freedom of action of deceased. Woods v. State, 3 Tex. App. 204; Maner v. State, 8 Tex. App. 361; Staples v. State, 14 Tex. App. 136.

[4] If, as claimed by appellant, he was ignorant of the character of force in use by his companions in making the wife of the deceased divulge facts within her knowledge, such ignorance would not render his acts lawful nor the homicide justifiable. He was aware that in making the woman disclose the facts within her knowledge the treatment of her by his companions was such as to cause her to utter screams, calls for help, and prayers for mercy.

[5] Whether her outcries continued up to the moment the shot was fired or not, they were heard by the deceased and by the appellant before the deceased was commanded to refrain from going to the aid of his wife, and were known to appellant when he killed the deceased while he was resisting the force used by appellant to compel obedience to his commands. The fear which appellant says possessed him that deceased might obtain arms if not restrained does not justify the appellant. The deceased had the right to procure arms, if necessary to protect his home and his family. Ross v. State, 10 Tex. App. 455, 38 Am. Rep. 643.

[6] The complaint of the proof of acts of Davis and Smith, while they were assaulting the wife of deceased, in our judgment is not well founded. The appellant and his companions in entering the premises had the common purpose to make the negro woman divulge facts supposed to be within her knowledge. If, as he claims, the means of accomplishing this purpose were not agreed upon, his conduct in preventing interruption of their effort by keeping her son and daughters and her husband away, when by her protestations he was advised that the means used by Davis and Smith were putting her in terror and in pain, was such as to raise the issue that he and they were acting together. We find no evidence that in the design to compel the woman to divulge the facts the intent of appellant was different from that of Davis and Smith. But, if the contrary were true, the conduct of appellant in continuing to act with them, with knowledge that personal violence was being used against her, would justify the conclusion that he ratified and adopted their acts, and make him a principal with them in the unlawful act.

[7] Moreover, the admission of the evidence showing the conduct of his associates towards the woman was not injurious to appellant, because, despite such proof, the verdict rendered by the jury was the most favorable to him that was authorized by the charge as justified by the facts.

absence of injury disclosed by the failure of the court to restrict attorney to make an opening statement, as directed by article 717, G. C. P., harmless. Holsey v. State, 24 Tex. App. 35, 5 S. W. 523.

The motion to quash the venire was overruled. The facts attending it are set out in the agreement contained in the bill of exceptions certified and qualified by the trial judge. From the bill we copy it as follows:

"That the said veniremen were served by the officer mailing out a post card and mailing the same to their addresses as known by them; that said original venire facias consisted of 100 men, as drawn by the district clerk, but that only 42 appeared in obedience to said summons; and that defendant was compelled to select the jury, or attempt to select the jury, from less than 50% of the venire facias, and forced to go to trial; and, notwithstanding which said motion and agreement so made by the state, the court declined and refused to sustain motion and quash venire facias, but overruled the same, and renders said venire so drawn, and required defendant to proceed with the selection of the jury therefrom, and from which the defendant was compelled by the court to select the jury which tried said cause;" to which action of the court the defendant then and there excepted and tendered his bill of exceptions No. 2 (latter half Tr. p. 23), which bill of exceptions was tendered to the court and allowed by the court (Tr. p. 24), with this proviso: "Further, all of the special venire were either in attendance upon court or had been excused by the court on account of sickness or some legal exemption."

The statute (article 668) requires the sheriff executing the writ of special venire to verbally summons the veniremen in person. The failure of the sheriff to comply with this statute does not in every case work a reversal. In the early case of Charles v. State, 13 Tex. App. 664, the venire called for 60 men. But 36 were summoned. The motion to quash was overruled. The court said:

"In this case it does not appear that the trial judge committed any error in overruling the motion to quash the venire, nor that any right of the defendant was prejudiced thereby. For aught that appears from the record, the jury that tried the case was composed of men selected from the thirty-six summoned jurors. If so, the defendant certainly cannot complain that he was injured by the ruling of the court upon his motion. It is not shown that the defendant, by reason of the ruling of the court, was compelled to pass upon talesman jurors, or to accept any objectionable juror, or in any other manner suffer injury by reason of the overruling of his motion."

Rulings following the Charles Case will be found in Parker v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 111, 21 S. W. 604, 25 S. W. 967; Jones v. State, 214 S. W. 325; Whittington v. State, 215 S. W. 457.

[9] The application of this rule to the instant case is emphasized by the qualification of bill by the trial judge to the effect that all of the special venire were either in attendance upon the court, or had been excused by the court on account of sickness or some legal exemption. The purpose of the personal summons is to procure the attendance of the jurors. When that is accomplished by an irregular summons, the form of summons is not available as a ground for quashing the writ, unless some injury is shown. Whittington v. State, 215 S. W. 457. From the 12 American & English Encyc. of Pleading and Practice, p. 324, we make the quotation:

"Where a venireman appears, though irregularly summoned, or in fact not summoned at all, the irregularity or omission will be deemed immaterial, since his attendance, which is all that the service of process would effect and which is its object, has been attained."

The case of Johnson v. State, 218 S. W. 496, to which we are referred, is not analogous. In that case the statute designated the list of names drawn by the jury commissioners from which to draw a special venire. In drawing the special venire a different list was used. The record failed to disclose that any of the men composing the jury was legally drawn. The accused was denied a jury selected by law. This is not such a case. Here all of the jurors were legally drawn. The summons was irregular, but their appearance cured this fault. The jury illegally drawn in Johnson's Case assessed against him the death punishment. The jury in this case lawfully drawn, and attending in response to an irregular summons, convicted appellant of the lowest grade of offense which, under the law and the charge of the court, was authorized, and assessed against him the lowest punishment.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHARLES v. STATE. (No. 5746.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. April 21, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 9, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §366(4)—Recognition of slayer by deceased res gestæ.

A statement made by decedent immediately after defendant shot him, showing his recognition of the defendant as the party who fired the shot, was admissible as res gestæ.

2. Witnesses §268(5)—Proper to cross-examine witness as to age.

On cross-examination of a witness for the state, who testified that he was 16 years of age, defendant had the right to show that the witness was not 16.

3. Witnesses §271(1)—Census report not made by witness not relevant on cross-examination.

On cross-examination of a witness for the state, who testified that he was 16 years of age according to information from his mother, court did not err in refusing to permit defendant to examine the witness in connection with a report of the school census made by the father of witness, showing his age as 14.

4. Witnesses §240(4)—Question not leading.

In a prosecution for homicide, decedent having been shot while plowing, a question by the district attorney, "Well, was that plowed to the end of the row, or partly plowed?" was not objectionable as a leading question.

5. Homicide §170—Measurements of footprints and foot of defendant admissible.

A witness, who had measured accurately the footprints of person slaying another and the shoe of accused, could testify to such measurements.

6. Criminal law §419, 420(10)—Objection of hearsay held properly sustained.

Where on cross-examination of an accomplice in a prosecution for homicide witness was asked whether he had not been told that deceased was a "hoodoo negro," the court properly sustained state's objection that it was hearsay.

7. Criminal law §1091(3) — Bill of exceptions held not to show prejudice in cross-examination.

A bill of exceptions, reciting that a witness was testifying that he lived about one-half mile from the place where deceased was killed, and that he had not heard a gun "over there" before he left for C. and that on cross-examination district attorney asked witness if he could hear a gun from where deceased was killed to C., did not show any injury to defendant; the answer of the witness not being stated.

8. Witnesses §388(2)—Statement no ground for impeachment where no foundation is laid.

The mere fact that a witness, testifying for the state in telling about the killing soon after it occurred had not claimed that he had seen two persons at the time of the shooting did not render competent evidence of his statement of the occurrence, the defendant claiming that witness had only seen one person, and had not seen defendant, the mere fact that witness had not included defendant in statement being no ground for impeachment; no predicate having been laid or any question asked the witness as to the statement.

9. Criminal law §1091(3)—Bill held insufficient to show error in examination of witness.

A bill in a homicide case, reciting that a state's witness was asked "concerning a matter of the deceased losing some seed cotton some 10 months before the killing, the deceased having charged defendant with the theft of the seed," was insufficient to present the matter for consideration, the bill not stating defendant's objection, the answer to the question, nor any of the facts and circumstances that would show whether the matter was material or not.

10. Criminal law §1091(4)—Bill held insufficient to show error in admission of evidence.

A bill, reciting that the state "sought to bring out by B. matters concerning some cotton that deceased claimed to have lost some 10 months before the killing, and deceased claimed that defendant was implicated in getting the cotton," and that the witness was permitted to testify to a conversation he had with defendant with reference to the matter, did not show that the admission of such testimony was error; it not appearing what the conversation was.

11. Witnesses §345(2)—Impeached by showing charge of murder.

A witness may be impeached by showing that he is under a charge of murder.

12. Witnesses §359—Details of accusation of murder not admissible.

Although a witness may be impeached by showing that he is under a charge of murder details of the murder are not admissible.

13. Criminal law §1166(9)—No error in overruling application on ground of absence of witness who later testified.

A bill of exceptions to the overruling of an application for a continuance on the ground of the absence of a witness will not be considered, where the witness was brought into court and testified.

14. Criminal law §600(3)—Admission after conclusion of testimony of truth of matter to be testified to by absent witness did not relieve of error in denying continuance.

Admission by district attorney after the conclusion of the testimony that absent witness would have testified as indicated in an application for a continuance, and that his testimony was true, cannot relieve any error of the court in overruling the application for continuance, as such admission by the state's attorney must be made at the time of overruling a continuance as a means of avoiding such continuance.

15. Criminal law §1166(9)—Overruling continuance harmless, where other witnesses testified to some facts.

Error of the court in overruling an application for continuance was harmless, where matters which would be testified to by absent witness were placed before the jury by other witnesses.

16. Criminal law §511(5)—Evidence held sufficient to corroborate testimony of accomplice.

In a prosecution for homicide, evidence that a son of decedent saw defendant and the accomplice at the place of the shooting, and as to measurement of tracks, held sufficient to corroborate testimony of an accomplice and to sustain a finding that defendant fired the shot which killed deceased.

Appeal from District Court, San Jacinto County; J. A. Platt, Judge.

Jim Charles was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. McMurrey, of Cold Springs, for appellant.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. The trial of appellant resulted in a conviction of murder with the death penalty assessed.

[1] There are two theories involved under the testimony; one that appellant in connection with the accomplice White went into the woods near the field where deceased was plowing, and that appellant shot the deceased, from which shooting he died a few days later. The accomplice testified to these facts. A son of deceased was with his father at the time, and in front of him. The deceased was plowing and walking from the direction from which the shot came, he receiving a shot in the back. The boy was ahead of his father a few feet, and when he heard the shot looked around, and saw defendant and White in the edge of the woods. Appellant had the gun. He holloed at him, expressing his recognition. It is also shown that deceased at the time recognized defendant as the party who shot him. This was a res gestae statement. The sheriff also testified to measurements of tracks of two men in the woods at or near the place where White and appellant were supposed to have been stationed at the time of the shooting. These tracks corresponded with the shoes worn by the two men. There were no exceptions to the charge.

[2, 3] The first bill was reserved to the refusal of the court to permit the cross-examination of the son of deceased as to his age. The bill shows that he testified he was 16 years of age, and had received such information from his mother. Counsel stated to witness he had a report of the school census, and in connection with this desired to examine the witness. This was objected to by the state because irrelevant and immaterial. Appellant contended that it was relevant, and would be direct testimony as to the age of the boy testifying. The court permitted the boy to testify as to his age, and his information from his mother that such was his age, being 16. The bill does not show the stated age of the boy in this census report. In the testimony, if we should revert to that, it is shown by the census that his father stated the age of the boy to be 14. This report was made in March, 1918, and the killing occurred in August of the same year. The answer of the witness would seem to preclude further examination, as he had no connection with the report, and it involved no act of his. That the defendant had the right to show the boy was not 16, as the boy testified, is not to be questioned, but from census report we think the examination of the boy would not be material, as it was not his act. Had he made the report, it would have been proper to examine him. The bill is indefinite from any viewpoint of it, and, as it is presented, there could have been no possible error.

[4] Another bill shows that, while the sheriff, Patrick, was testifying he was asked this question by the district attorney:

"Well, was that plowed to the end of the row, or partly plowed? A. It was plowed to the end of the row, four or five feet from the end of the row."

The appellant objected to the district attorney leading the witness, and asked that the question be stricken out. The objection was overruled. This would not be termed a leading question. The bill does not show any attendant fact or circumstance that led to this inquiry.

[5] Another bill recites the same witness was asked with reference to the measurements of the tracks found in the woods to which he had testified. The main objection was that there was no proper predicate laid, and proper measurements were not made. These objections were not well taken. These tracks were measured as stated by the sheriff rather accurately, and this measurement was applied to the shoes of the two men, appellant and White, and found to correspond. This was legitimate. The next bill was in regard to the same matter, and rather an amplification of the former bill in regard to the attendant circumstances and the condition of the ground where the tracks were made, showing that the tracks were easily identified upon the ground; it being soft and damp and the impressions distinct.

[6] Another bill recites that while the accomplice, White, was testifying, on cross-examination he was asked if certain people, "named in the question," but not specified in the bill, had not told witness White that Lester Green "was a hoodoo negro." The state's objection was sustained. What was the object and purpose of introducing this testimony is not stated, nor are there any connecting facts to show that this testimony was admissible. The state's objection was that it was hearsay. As presented in this bill, such objection was well taken. If the question of the deceased being a "hoodoo negro" got into the case in such way as to make it a question for examination, it might have been proper to have asked and elicited the answer, but the expected answer is not stated.

Another bill recites that, while White was being cross-examined by defendant, he was asked if he told defendant a day before deceased was shot that he (witness) had killed a tall negro with boots on. The state's objection was sustained. This bill is too indefinite for consideration.

[7] Another bill recites, while Mr. Kennedy was testifying and had stated he lived in about one-half mile of the place where deceased was killed, and that he had not heard a gun "over there" before he left for Cleveland, on cross-examination the district attorney asked witness if he could hear a gun from where deceased was killed to Cleveland. The answer is not stated. How this could have injured the appellant is not shown by the bill.

[8] Another bill recites that appellant offered the testimony of Elmore Charles. The bill further recites that it developed that Elmore Charles had not been subpoenaed as a witness, and "had been in the courtroom during the examination of other witnesses, and heard a great many of them testify"; that the state had invoked the rule, and objected to the witness testifying on that ground. Appellant insisted that, inasmuch as he had not had time to get his testimony together, and his counsel had not had time to learn who were witnesses for the defendant, and did not know that Elmore Charles had information that would make him a witness, the court should permit him to testify. The defendant offered to show by this witness that he had heard Lester Green tell about the occurrence soon after it occurred, and that he had not claimed that he had seen two persons at the time of the shooting. The appellant also claimed that Lester Green had only seen one person, and that that person was White, and not defendant. The state objected to this witness being permitted to testify. This is the entire bill. This bill does not manifest error. That Lester Green may have made a statement at some time with reference to the killing, and had not included appellant, would not subject him to be impeached upon this ground. Had he been called upon to testify in regard to all the facts in the case, or during his testimony his attention had been directed to whether there were more than one person present, and he had stated that there was not, and thereafter testified that two persons were present, it would have subjected him to impeachment. The bill does not even show that Lester Green was asked, while testifying, with reference to any statement he may have made that Elmore Charles may have heard. As the bill presents the matter the ruling of the court is not brought within any of the decisions or any rule of evidence that has been called to our attention that shows error in regard to the ruling. The bill fails to show that a predicate had been laid or any question asked of the witness Green as to these statements.

[9] Another bill recites that the state's witness Hightower was asked "concerning a matter of the deceased's losing some seed cotton some 10 months before the killing, the deceased having charged the defendant with the theft of the same, or rather it appeared that defendant had been implicated in some way." Appellant objected, the objection not being stated. It is stated the district attorney asked the question, but it does not give the answer, and none of the facts and circumstances are set forth in the bill that would show whether this was material or not. The bill is not sufficient to present the matter for consideration.

[10] Another bill recites that the state "sought to bring out by her witness Billie Noraworthy matters concerning some cotton that deceased claimed to have lost some 10 months before the killing, and deceased claimed that defendant was implicated in getting the cotton." Objection was urged to this, and the witness was permitted to testify to a conversation he had with defendant with reference to deceased having accused him of stealing the cotton. What that conversation was, otherwise than it was a conversation, is not stated, nor is the ground of objection stated. The bill recites that appellant objected to the introduction of the testimony, and the court overruled it. This may have entered into the motive for the killing. In order to have brought this question before the court for consideration, enough of the facts should have been stated to manifest what the defendant supposed to be error.

[11,12] While the witness Jenkins was testifying for the state, it developed that he had been brought from the county jail to testify. Upon cross-examination this occurred.

"What have they got you in jail for? A. For murder—supposed to be murder. Q. Murdering who? A. Jim Wynne. Q. What was his age?"

The state objected to any further examination. The court sustained the objection, and would not permit the appellant to go farther into details. There seems to be no error in this matter, nor is it shown what was the purpose of seeking the age of Jim Wynne. That a witness may be impeached by showing that he was under a charge of murder is sustained by the authorities, but the authorities announce the rule that in such impeachment usually the details of the accusation will not be permitted. The same may be said of the following bill of exceptions, as it is upon the same subject, and from the same witness.

[13-16] There is a bill of exceptions reserved to the action of the court overruling the application for a continuance. There were two witnesses sought, the wife of appellant, and a witness named Charles who seems to have been in some way related to appellant. The wife of appellant was brought into court and testified. It is unnecessary to consider the application further as to her. By the other witness, Charles, appellant expected to show a son of appellant on the evening of the killing had been sent by appellant to a certain house for shucks. This house seems to have been not far from where the killing occurred. What effect this testimony would have had upon the case is not made to appear. The testimony shows that the boy was sent for the shucks. The court signs the bill with the qualification that the district attorney, after the conclusion of the testimony, offered to admit before the jury that witness would have testified as indicated, and that his testimony was true. We are of opinion that this does not relieve the error of the court in overruling the continuance, if there was error. Such admission must be made at the time of overruling the continuance as a means of avoiding such continuance. The reasons for this seem to be obvious. Had the admission of the truthfulness of the statement been made at the time and before the introduction of testimony, the state would have been precluded from contradicting it. The state will not be heard to admit the truthfulness of a statement and then introduce contradictory testimony of that admission. But the matter was testified by witnesses before the jury. Taking the evidence from the statements in the motion for new trial, we are of opinion that whether this testimony was or was not before the jury would not be very material, but the jury had the matter before them anyway for their consideration for whatever it was worth. Viewing the record in the light of the motion for new trial, we are of opinion the court did not commit error in this matter.

[10] It is contended as a final proposition that the evidence is not sufficient to support the conviction. The testimony of White, the accomplice, is corroborated by the son of deceased, who saw both White and appellant at the place of the shooting, and appellant was armed with the gun that fired the shot, and is further corroborated by the sheriff with reference to measurements of tracks. This would justify the jury in arriving at the conclusion that appellant did fire the shot from the woods which killed deceased. The testimony for the defendant shows, both by positive evidence and circumstances, that he was not present. In other words, he himself swore to an alibi, and other witnesses swore to facts which tend strongly to corroborate him. These matters were all before the jury. They heard the witnesses, noticed their manner of testifying, and had the whole matter in front of them, as did the trial court. Under such circumstances this court would scarcely feel justified in setting aside the conviction. This was either an assassination, or it was nothing so far as the appellant is concerned. We would not feel justified in reversing the case for want of sufficient evidence under the stated circumstances.

Finding no reversible error in the judgment, or one that would justify this court in reversing the judgment, it is ordered to be affirmed.

BOCKNIGHT v. STATE. (No. 5826.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 26, 1920.)

1. Criminal law §614(3)—Diligence to procure attendance of witness not shown.

Diligence to procure the attendance of a witness, for whose absence a second application for continuance of a trial for homicide was made, was not shown, where it appeared that after the first continuance defendant saw the witness, but did not get out process for his appearance, relying on his promise to appear.

2. Criminal law §917(2)—Testimony of absent witness for which continuance was refused must be such as would probably change result.

A new trial need not be granted because of the absence of a witness for which continuance was refused, unless it was reasonably probable that with his presence a verdict more favorable to accused would have resulted, and the probable truth of the testimony of the absent witness must therefore be made to appear.

3. Criminal law §956(5)—Showing as to testimony of absent witness held not to make denial of new trial an abuse of discretion.

An affidavit by accused alone that an absent witness would testify to threats by deceased, which accused testified were confirmed by a witness who was present, but which were denied by the dying declaration and by the witness who was present, do not establish the truth of the alleged testimony or the probability that it would affect the result sufficiently to show an abuse of discretion in denying the new trial.

4. Criminal law §1141(2) — Appellant must overcome presumption of correctness of denial of new trial.

The overruling of a motion for new trial by the trial judge will not be arbitrarily overturned, but the burden rests upon accused to overcome the presumption favoring the correctness of the decision.

5. Homicide §250—Evidence held to sustain conviction for manslaughter.

Evidence that accused sought the meeting with deceased and was the aggressor in the encounter held to sustain a conviction for manslaughter though accused claimed threats and an attack with a knife by deceased.

Appeal from District Court, Brown County; J. O. Woodward, Judge.

Earl Bocknight was convicted of manslaughter and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wilkinson & McGaugh, of Brownwood, for appellant.

Alvir M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. Under an indictment for murder, appellant was convicted of manslaughter, and punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of 5 years. A reversal is sought upon the ground that, in view of the weakness of the state's case, and the importance of the alleged testimony of an absent witness, the court, having overruled an application for continuance, abused his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

The appellant, a negro youth 19 years of age, shot and killed the deceased, a negro boy about 17 years of age. The homicide occurred at night, both appellant and deceased and several of the witnesses having previously been at a dance. Appellant's theory, arising from his testimony, was that there had been no previous trouble, but that while at the dance Lilton Davis said to him:

"Jimmie Barnes (deceased) says he is going to make you break out of here to-night. If you don't believe what I said, go and ask Mary Bean; she heard it, and can tell you all about it" —and further said: "He has got a knife up his sleeve sure enough." Appellant testified that he asked Mary Bean about the matter, and she said: "Yes; he said it, but I think it was just nigger talk." He then borrowed a pistol from the witness Lane, who was at the dance, and started to go home; that before going home he started to go by his brother's house on an errand for his mother, and that he met the deceased, and said: "Jimmie, what caused you to make the talk you did about me? They say that you are going to make me tear out of the hall." Deceased replied: "You are a God damn liar, you, Mary Bean and Lilton Davis both"—at the same time starting toward the appellant with a knife. Appellant, while running backward, fired one shot, striking the deceased in front, and inflicting a wound from which he later died. He claimed that the knife in the hands of the deceased was open, and that he had been informed on the previous day that the deceased had said he intended to kill him.

The state's theory, as developed by the statement of the deceased at the examining trial, was, in substance, that the deceased had walked from the dance with a girl named Nina to her home, and, returning, met the appellant near the home of the girl; that the appellant stopped deceased, and appeared to be mad; that he had his hand in his pocket. Deceased said:

"He asked me what made me tell Mary Bean that I was going to put him out of the house. I told him I didn't tell Mary that, and he said: 'Oh yes, you did,' and began to draw his pistol. I got my knife out, but never did get it open. I never had trouble of any kind before with him. Last night as I left the hall with a girl, he told me he wanted to see me. I told him I would be back in a few minutes."

Mary Bean testified that she had no such conversation as that described with deceased, and that in answer to appellant's inquiry while at the dance whether the deceased had made remarks to her about the appellant, her reply was that he had not done so. She also denied that she had made such statement to Lilton Davis. A pocketknife was picked up near the deceased, after he fell, and there was a conflict as to its condition, whether the blade was open or not. The homicide took place within a short distance of the dance hall, and after the appellant left the dance hall he met a witness, and inquired for the deceased, and was told that he had gone home with the girl Nina. Appellant proceeded in the direction in which the deceased had gone, and a few minutes later the shot was fired.

[1] The indictment was filed in May, 1919. The trial took place in the latter part of December of the same year. The application for continuance was to secure the testimony of Lilton Davis, whose residence was alleged to be unknown. It was alleged that on a date not stated a subpoena had been issued for the witness to Brown county, and had been returned with the indorsement, "Not found in Brown county"; that a subpoena was issued on the request of the state to Cameron county, and which was on December 4th, returned, marked, "Not found after diligent search." The application was described as a "subsequent application," and it appears from the court's qualification of the bill of exceptions that at the preceding term of the court the case had been continued upon the application of the appellant for the same witness; that after that time the appellant saw the witness in Texas City, Tex., and at that time the witness promised that he would be present at the trial, but no process was issued for him. Under the facts, the action of the trial court in overruling the application cannot be made the subject of just criticism. There was an absence of the diligence which the law requires. The witness had been served with no process. The appellant, after continuing the case for the absence of the witness, failed to embrace the opportunity to serve him with process in Texas City, and relied upon the promise of the witness to make a voluntary appearance. His residence at the time of the trial was unknown, and we fail to discern upon what facts a reasonable expectation of procuring his testimony at a subsequent term could be based. Sinclair v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 453, 30 S. W. 1070; Roquemore v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 568, 129 S. W. 1120; Vernon's Texas Crim. Statutes, vol. 2, p. 819, note 30. The circumstances were such that diligence would have demanded the prompt issuance of process for the witness when his whereabouts, after the continuance for his absence, became known to the appellant. Todd v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 26, 121 S. W. 506; Hamilton v. State, 74 Tex. Cr. R. 219, 168 S. W. 537; Brittain v. State, 40 S. W. 297.

[2] The testimony expected from the witness was that the appellant had been told by him that the deceased had threatened to run the appellant away from the dance. To justify annulment of the verdict, there must be a reasonable probability that with the presence of the absent witness a verdict more favorable to the appellant would have resulted. Covey v. State, 23 Tex. App. 388, 5 S. W. 283; Pruitt v. State, 30 Tex. App. 156, 16 S. W. 773; other cases, Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 319. Viewed in the light of the evidence on the trial, the probable truth of the testimony of the absent witness must appear. Casinova v. State, 12 Tex. App. 554, and other cases, Branch's Annotated Texas Penal Code, § 319. Primarily these matters were for the trial court. Vernon's Texas Crim. Statutes, vol. 2, p. 320, note 34, and cases referred to.

[3] It was by the affidavit of the appellant alone that proof was made that the witness would, if present, give the testimony alleged. If given, the evidence of the absent witness would have been in conflict with the testimony of the deceased and the witness Bean, and corroborated by that of appellant alone. The court remained in session for 30 days after the verdict was rendered, and almost that long before the motion for new trial was overruled. No affidavit of the absent witness or other fact developed after the trial to strengthen the contention of appellant that the witness would give the testimony, or would be present at another trial, or to enhance the probability of the truth of the alleged evidence, or its affecting the verdict on another trial.

[4] It is not within the province of this court to arbitrarily overturn the judgment of the trial judge in overruling a motion for new trial (Bronson v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 20, 127 S. W. 175), and in the instant case no measure or standard or changed condition is pointed out from which we can determine that the trial judge abused his discretion in deciding matters involved in the motion for new trial against the appellant. The burden rests upon the appellant to overcome the presumption favoring the correctness of the decision of the trial court, and this burden in the instant case has not been discharged.

[5] From the state's standpoint, the evidence shows an unlawful homicide. It suggests that the appellant had been attentive to the girl whom the deceased accompanied to her home; that the appellant followed the deceased, and sought the meeting with him, and in the encounter was the aggressor. The deceased, by his testimony, negated any previous threats and any assault by him, except in response to the demonstration by the appellant. The appellant's version puts threats into the mouth of the deceased, and makes him the aggressor. An issue of fact for solution by the jury arose, and we cannot concur in the view that, accepting the testimony of the state's witnesses as true, the verdict of the jury is not authorized by the evidence.

We find no error in the record, and order the judgment affirmed.

OTT v. STATE. (No. 5833.)

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. May 19, 1920.)

1. Homicide \S 300(3) — Instruction on self-defense submitting converse of defendant's theory not erroneous.

In a prosecution of a wife for killing her husband, charge on self-defense, which in applying the law to the facts directed the jury specifically to the theory of the case on which defendant predicated her right of self-defense, held not erroneous, though submitting the converse of defendant's theory that the mere belief she was in danger in the absence of reasonable grounds did not excuse her.

2. Criminal law \S 829(5)—Refusal to instruct on defendant's right to arm self not erroneous in view of charge given.

In a prosecution for homicide, where no limitation was placed on the right of perfect self-defense in the charge, there was no error in refusing to instruct on the right of defendant to arm herself.

3. Criminal law \S 806(2)—Element of main charge need not be repeated.

In a prosecution for homicide, the trial court in the main charge having instructed that defendant was in no event bound to retreat in order to avoid the necessity of killing deceased, it was not incumbent upon him to repeat it in a special charge.

4. Criminal law \S 419, 420(6)—Testimony of attorney for husband killed by wife inadmissible as hearsay.

In prosecution of a wife for killing her husband, evidence for defendant of an attorney for the deceased husband as to what decedent told him preparatory to bringing suit for divorce against defendant, being explanatory of the details under which defendant had received a pistol shot wound, as she claimed, from decedent, while living with him some time before the homicide, held inadmissible as hearsay.

5. Witnesses \S 201(2) — Testimony of husband's attorney in prosecution of wife for killing husband not privileged.

In prosecution of a wife for killing her husband, testimony of the attorney for the husband in his divorce suit that the husband asked him for advice as to what punishment would likely be meted out to him if he killed his wife, etc., who was defending on the ground of self-defense, held not excluded as a privileged communication between attorney and client.

6. Homicide \S 189 — Course of conduct between deceased husband and defendant wife admissible.

In prosecution of wife for killing her husband, defended on ground of self-defense, trial court properly allowed to come before the jury the various difficulties, quarrels, threats, and encounters constituting the course of conduct between husband and wife; such matters including a conversation wherein the husband asked his attorney for advice on killing his wife, being competent on the controverted question of self-defense.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Robt. B. Seay, Judge.

Ida Ott was convicted of manslaughter, and she appeals. Reversed.

Alvin M. Owsley, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MORROW, J. Under an indictment for murder appellant was convicted of manslaughter, and punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for a period of three years.

The deceased, Andrew Ott, was the husband of the appellant. The tragedy occurred on one of the streets of the city of Dallas. Six shots were fired by the appellant from a pistol. The first shot, fired while the deceased was walking in front of the appellant, took effect on the side of his head, back behind his ear, and was a fatal one. He fell at once, and other shots were fired into his body. Deceased, a short time before the homicide, had filed a suit for divorce against the appellant, and secured an injunction against her interference with him. He was living in adultery with another woman at the time he was killed. A long course of ill treatment was described by appellant in her testimony, in which she claimed that the deceased first seduced her, and after marrying her required her to prostitute her person for his profit; that he had at one time wounded her severely by shooting her with a pistol, and had frequently threatened to take her life. Some of these matters were controverted, the state introducing evidence to show that the appellant was shot accidentally with her own pistol while she was undertaking to shoot deceased, and also that she had threatened and attempted to kill him on other occasions. She was a young woman. She claimed that, frightened by his repeated and specific threats to kill her, she obtained an automatic pistol and learned to use it. On the morning of the killing she phoned to the place of business of the employers of deceased, desiring, as she said, to get one of them to intercede with her husband, whom she still loved, and, ascertaining that her husband was not at the place of business, she went there for the purpose of an interview with his employers, and that while on her way she saw deceased walking on the street with a lady. As they were about to meet, the lady walked across the street and entered deceased's automobile. When they met, appellant said: "Who is your sweetheart?" Deceased replied: "None of your damn business who she is. I told you not to come down here, and God damn you I am going to get my gun out of my car and blow your God damn brains out"—and, uttering these words he started to run toward his car. Appellant said: "Andrew don't do that," she following him and asking him to wait. He continued his course until he had nearly reached the car, when, as she says, "I pulled my gun and fired." The state's eyewitnesses heard none of the conversation, but said that while the appellant was about an arm's length behind the deceased she fired the first shot, and when he fell she fired the remaining shots, and then knelt down by his body, and uttered some endearing terms with reference to him, apparently being very nervous and excited.

[1] The criticisms of the court's charge on the law of self-defense, we believe, are without merit. This issue arose alone from appellant's testimony, and, in applying the law to the facts, the mind of the jury was directed specifically to the theory of the case upon which the appellant predicated the right of self-defense. The court said:

"Now if you believe from the evidence, or have a reasonable doubt, that at the time the defendant killed the deceased that the deceased had started across the street in the direction of an automobile, and that he had said he was going to get his pistol and kill the defendant, and if it reasonably appeared to the defendant that the deceased was about to attack her in such manner that it reasonably appeared to her, as viewed from her standpoint, under all facts and circumstances within her knowledge, that she was in danger of losing her life or suffering serious bodily injury at the hands of the deceased," etc.

[2] In submitting the converse of appellant's theory, to the effect, in substance, that the mere belief that she was in danger in the absence of reasonable grounds upon which to base such belief, testing the reasonableness of the grounds as viewed from her standpoint at the time, would not excuse her, we think there was no error. Appellant has referred us to no precedent supporting her contention that in this respect the court's charge placed upon the appellant's right of self-defense an unwarranted limitation. See Tillery v. State, 24 Tex. App. 251, 5 S. W. 512, 5 Am. St. Rep. 882; Ruling Case Law, vol. 13, p. 816. There being no limitation placed in the charge of the court upon the right of perfect self-defense, there was no error in refusing to instruct the jury upon the right of appellant to arm herself. Willford v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 383, 42 S. W.

[3] The court in the main charge having told the jury that the appellant was in no event bound to retreat in order to avoid the necessity of killing the deceased, it was not incumbent upon him to repeat it in a special charge.

[4, 5] The deceased, in his conference with his attorney preparing to bring suit for divorce against the appellant, made certain declarations which the appellant sought to reproduce on the trial through the attorney, and their exclusion as privileged matter is made the basis of complaint. Part of these declarations were explanatory of the details under which appellant had received a pistol shot wound while living at San Antonio some time before the homicide. Aside from the question of privilege, we think the effort to prove the circumstances of the transaction mentioned by the declaration of deceased in the presence of the witness was not admissible, because obnoxious to the rule against hearsay testimony. The other declaration offered was to the effect that deceased sought to obtain the legal advice of the witness as to what punishment would likely be meted out to him in the event he killed his wife, and that in this connection deceased had expressed his belief to the witness that in the event he should elect to kill his wife, a jury would not affix his punishment any greater than confinement for five years; that the witness advised against such a course. We think this statement was not protected by the rule which excludes privileged communications between attorney and client. Ormon v. State, 22 Tex. App. 604, 3 S. W. 468, 58 Am. Rep. 662; Id., 24 Tex. App. 485, 6 S. W. 544; Everett v. State, 30 Tex. App. 682, 18 S. W. 674; Underhill on Crim. Evidence, § 175.

In the case of Ormon v. State, the accused complained to the attorney that one had been guilty of insulting language toward a female relative, and made inquiry as to the extent of the culpability in the event he slew the utterer of the language. The attorney read to him the statute on the subject. Subsequently, upon his trial for murder, the state was permitted to prove this transaction, the court in substance recognizing as the rule existing in criminal cases that the communications must be in the course of legitimate professional employment, and not communications made for the purpose of being guided in the commission of an offense, and that these rules obtain notwithstanding the innocent purpose of the attorney giving the advice; in other words, declaring that the public policy which prevented the disclosure of confidential communications between attorney and client would not seal the lips of the attorney who was consulted by one who, contemplating the commission of a crime, sought the advice of the attorney as a means of evading or modifying punishment.

In Everett's Case, the deceased went to the offices of his attorneys, threatened the life of the accused, and asked the advice of his attorneys as to how to avoid the legal consequences of the killing of accused. This testimony was excluded upon the grounds that it embraced a confidential communication between attorney and client. The court on appeal overturned this ruling, and made it one of the grounds for reversal.

In the instant case there was evidence of previous attempts on the part of deceased to take the life of the appellant, and on numerous occasions, according to the evidence, he had, with her knowledge, threatened to do so. She claimed that it was his practice to carry a pistol, and to leave it in his automobile when he was walking on the streets. The evidence that immediately before he was killed he declared that he would get his pistol and kill the appellant depended upon her evidence alone. From his acts, as described by her, in endeavoring to reach the automobile, and from the other facts in the case, the jury were to determine whether from her standpoint at the time there was reasonable apprehension of danger. To solve the doubt as to whether the actions of the deceased amounted to an attack, or a threatened attack, his declaration made to his attorney, expressing an intention, desire, or motive to kill the appellant, and seeking an expression of opinion as to the probable consequences, might have been of value to the jury. Upon this subject Mr. Wharton in his work on Evidence says:

"For the purpose, therefore, in cases of doubt in showing that the deceased made the attack, and, if so, what motive, his prior declarations, uncommunicated to the defendant, that he intended to attack the defendant, are proper evidence." Wharton's Crim. Evidence, vol. 2, § 757, p. 1507.

[6] The case of Wallace v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 801, 70 S. W. 756, 100 Am. St. Rep. 855, was one in which the accused killed her husband. There was no proof of an actual demonstration on his part at the time, yet it was held that the exclusion of his uncommunicated threats was not warranted; and, generally speaking, we understand the rule to be that, in cases of self-defense upon apparent danger, the prior hostile declarations of the deceased are to be received. The court properly allowed to come before the jury in the instant case the various difficulties, quarrels, threats, and encounters; in other words, allowed to be detailed the course of conduct between the husband and wife who were the parties to this tragedy. It was in the light of this evidence that the jury was called upon to solve the controverted questions (Hall v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 565, 21 S. W. 368; Medina v. State, 49 S. W. 380; Wallace v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 804, 70 S. W. 756, 100 Am. St. Rep. 855), and the evidence excluded might have been of material aid. At all events, it was relevant, tending to show the state of mind of deceased toward appellant, and, as we understand the record, was excluded upon what we regard as a mistaken theory that the witness in whose knowledge it existed was not privileged to disclose it because he had received it in conference between attorney and client.

We are constrained to the opinion that in rejecting the evidence an error was committed requiring reversal of the judgment.

MASTERSON v. GINNERS' MUT. UNDERWRITERS' ASS'N OF TEXAS. (No. 2215.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 20, 1920.)

1. Mortgages ⇨497(2)—Foreclosure of senior mortgage with no notice of junior mortgage bars rights of junior mortgage.

The foreclosure of a lien on land at the suit of the senior mortgagee who did not have notice of the right in the owner of the junior mortgage in the property bars such right, notwithstanding the junior mortgagee was not a party to the foreclosure suit.

2. Bills and notes ⇨350—Transferee after maturity held to have no greater rights than transferor.

If pledgee of pledgor's notes payable to bearer, and deed of trust to secure notes, was bound by foreclosure of a senior mortgage, subsequent holder who took notes after maturity with notice of nature of transaction between pledgor and pledgee and of senior mortgagee's claim to land as foreclosure sale purchaser was also bound thereby, since such holder could not assert a right which pledgee could not assert.

3. Mortgages ⇨427(2)—Mortgagee held not chargeable with facts not shown by record of junior deed of trust and holder thereof not necessary party to foreclosure proceedings.

Where notes payable to bearer secured by deed of trust were deposited with maker's creditor as security for debt, senior mortgagee with no actual notice thereof was not chargeable with constructive notice requiring it to make such creditor a party to foreclosure proceedings, though deed of trust was of record, and though by inquiry it could have ascertained such facts.

4. Mortgages ⇨1—Existence of debt necessary.

The existence of a debt is indispensable to existence of a mortgage.

5. Mortgages \Leftrightarrow 224—Purchaser of mortgage apart from debt takes nothing.

Where debtor deposited his notes payable to bearer and secured by deed of trust with creditor as collateral for payment of his debt, purchaser of the notes and trust deed, after maturity with knowledge of such facts took nothing by his purchase, since an assignment of the mortgage alone without the debt is nugatory and confers no right whatever upon assignee.

Appeal from District Court, Smith County; J. R. Warren, Judge.

Suit by the Ginnners' Mutual Underwriters' Association of Texas against N. T. Masterson and others. From judgment rendered, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed as reformed.

This was a suit by appellee against T. N. Jones, N. T. Masterson, and J. E. Winfrey on facts substantially as follows:

January 25, 1912, said Jones made and delivered to appellee 11 promissory notes, each of them being for $1,000, interest and attorney's fees, payable to appellee or order, the first of them on or before January 15, 1914, and one of the others on or before January 15 of each of the ten years next following said year 1914. Each of the notes contained a stipulation that a failure to pay it when it matured should, at the option of the holder, operate to mature the other not then due. At the time Jones made the notes he executed and delivered a deed whereby he conveyed certain land to Dabney White as trustee to secure the payment of the notes.

February 10, 1913, Jones executed 10 notes, bearing that date, each for $1,000, interest and attorney's fees, payable to "bearer" on or before February 10, 1918, and to secure the payment of the notes (it was recited in the instrument) executed a deed, also dated said February 10, 1913, whereby he conveyed to W. H. Marsh, as trustee, the land he had before conveyed to White as trustee. The deed to Marsh was duly recorded March 4, 1913. The 10 notes just mentioned did not at the time they were made, or ever afterward, represent an indebtedness of Jones to any one.

February 27, 1913, Jones made and delivered to the Harris Lumber Company a promissory note, bearing that date, for $1,000, interest and attorney's fees, payable to the order of said lumber company October 1, 1913. Attached to this note was an instrument executed by Jones, referred to in the record as a "collateral agreement," in which it was recited that the 10 notes to "bearer," secured by the trust deed to Marsh, had been deposited with the lumber company as collateral security for said $1,000 note made to it by Jones. By said instrument Jones authorized the lumber company "to collect said collateral when due, crediting the proceeds thereof on the foregoing note," and in case of default "in the payment of the foregoing note at maturity" "to sell said security with or without notice, at public or private sale."

Jones having defaulted in the payment of the 2 notes which first matured of the 11 he made to appellee, the latter declared all of them due, and on October 15, 1915, in a suit against Jones alone, recovered judgment for the amount of the notes, to wit, $12,298.40, and foreclosing the lien of the deed to White on the land conveyed to him as trustee. January 4, 1916, the land was sold by virtue of process issued on the judgment. Appellee was the purchaser at the sale, and the sheriff by deed dated said January 4, 1916, conveyed the land to him. At the time it commenced said suit and at the time it purchased the land at its foreclosure sale appellee had no actual notice or knowledge of the existence of the 10 notes made by Jones to bearer or of the trust deed made by Jones to Marsh to secure same.

The note for $1,000 dated February 27, 1913, to the Harris Lumber Company, was renewed by Jones September 21, 1917. No part of it had been paid December 31, 1918, when the lumber company at Dallas agreed with H. Masterson at Houston to sell the note to him and to deliver to him with it the 10 notes made by Jones to bearer, together with the collateral agreement, deposited with it (the lumber company) as collateral security. The papers were accordingly sent through a Dallas bank to a Houston bank, where they were delivered to said H. Masterson January 2, 1919, he then paying to the Houston bank for the lumber company the sum he had agreed to pay therefor. On the next day thereafter, to wit, January 3, 1919, H. Masterson, by authority of the collateral agreement before referred to, sold the collateral notes (that is, the 10 notes made by Jones to "bearer") to appellant for $1,000, and indorsed the amount as a credit on the principal note (that is, the note for $1,000 made by Jones to the lumber company). At the time H. Masterson paid for the principal note and received it and the collateral notes he knew that appellee had foreclosed its lien on and was in possession of the land, claiming to own it, and also knew that Jones was never indebted to the lumber company except for the amount of the principal note, to wit, $1,000, and 10 per cent. interest thereon from February 27, 1913.

W. H. Marsh, the trustee named in the deed of trust made by Jones February 10, 1913, died September 29, 1916. January 4, 1919, appellant, as the owner and holder of the 10 notes made by Jones to bearer, in writing appointed J. E. Winfrey to act as trustee under the deed, and thereupon Winfrey, as such trustee, at appellant's request advertised the land for sale on the first Tuesday in February, 1919. This suit was commenced January 30, 1919. By it appellee sought: (1) To enjoin a sale of the land by virtue of the trust deed to Marsh; (2) to cancel said trust deed and the notes it was made to secure, on the ground that same were a cloud on its title to the land; (3) if the court thought that should not be done, and that appellant had a lien on the land to secure the payment of the principal note made by Jones to the lumber company, to be permitted to pay the amount thereof to appellant, and so bar the lien; (4) or, if the court thought that appellant had a lien on the land to secure the payment of the 10 notes made by Jones to bearer, to have its (appellee's) lien thereon to secure the payment of Jones' notes to it foreclosed and declared to be a prior lien on the land; that the land be sold, and that the proceeds be applied to the payment of Jones' indebtedness to it and the amount it had expended for taxes and improvements on the land, before any part of same was paid to appellant. Appellant in his pleadings tendered to appellee the amount of the 11 notes Jones made to it, and sought, if the tender was declined, a recovery against Jones of the amount of the 10 $1,000 notes he made to "bearer" and a foreclosure of the trust deed to Marsh made to secure them.

The appeal is by appellant, N. T. Masterson, alone from a judgment in his favor against Jones for $1,792.84, the amount of the note for $1,000 made by Jones to the lumber company February 27, 1913, and foreclosing the lien of the trust deed to Marsh on the land in question, directing a sale thereof by the sheriff, and directing that the proceeds of such sale be applied: First, to the payment of the judgment recovered by appellee against Jones October 15, 1915; second, to the payment of said $1,792.84 adjudged in favor of appellant against Jones; third, to the payment of the costs of this suit; and, fourth, the balance remaining, if any, to be paid to appellee. But it was provided in the judgment that the sale of the land ordered should not be made if appellee should pay to appellant the $1,792.84 and interest adjudged in his favor. The judgment canceled the 10 notes made by Jones to bearer and the trust deed he made to Marsh, "except," it was recited, "as herein provided," and perpetuated a temporary injunction granted to restrain the sale of the land by virtue of said trust deed to Marsh.

Simpson, Lasseter & Gentry, of Tyler, for appellant.

Marsh & McIlwane, of Tyler, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant attacks the judgment as erroneous because it is not in his favor for the amount of the 10 notes for $1,000 each deposited with the Harris Lumber Company as collateral security, and for a foreclosure of the trust deed to Marsh, instead of for the amount of the principal note for $1,000 made by Jones to said lumber company. Appellee, in cross-assignments, attacks as erroneous, because without the support of testimony, it says, the finding that it was chargeable with notice of the rights of the owner of indebtedness secured by the trust deed to Marsh at the time it commenced its foreclosure suit against Jones and at the time it purchased the land under the judgment in its favor in said suit, and on the ground that it did not have and was not chargeable with such notice, and on the ground that "there were no pleadings nor facts" authorizing it, attacks the judgment as erroneous in so far as it awarded appellant a foreclosure of the trust deed on said land for any amount.

In the view we take of the case, a determination of the contentions presented by the cross-assignments referred to will dispose of the appeal.

[1] It seems to be the law that the foreclosure of a lien on land at the suit of the senior mortgagee who did not have notice of the right in the owner of the junior mortgage in the property bars such right, notwithstanding the junior mortgagee was not a party to the foreclosure suit. 2 Jones on Mortgages, § 1425; Rogers v. Houston, 94 Tex. 403, 60 S. W. 869; Reel v. Wilson, 64 Iowa, 13, 19 N. W. 814; Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 332, 5 Pac. 488.

[2] It appears from the record that appellee, as a matter of fact, did not know of the existence of the deed of trust to Marsh at the time it commenced its foreclosure suit against Jones, not, indeed, until June 7, 1917, which was long after the time when the land was conveyed to it as the purchaser at the sale thereof made by the sheriff as directed by the judgment in said foreclosure suit. Therefore, unless the record of said trust deed of March 3, 1913, operated to charge appellee with notice that the lumber company had acquired a right in the land, appellee was not bound to make that company a party to its foreclosure suit in order to bar such right. If the lumber company was bound by that judgment, of course appellant was; for he, as well as his assignor, H. Masterson, acquired the collateral notes and trust deed long after said notes matured and with full notice of the nature of the transaction between Jones and the lumber company and of appellee's claim to the land as the purchaser thereof at the sale under the judgment in its foreclosure suit. Therefore appellant was not in a more favorable position than the lumber company was in, and as the holder of the collateral notes could not assert a right it could not have asserted.

Finding, in accordance with the statement hereinbefore made, that appellee had no actual notice of the existence of the collateral notes and trust deed to Marsh until June 7, 1917, the trial court further found that the record of the deed operated to charge appellee with constructive notice—

"that Jones had executed his 10 promissory notes of $1,000 each payable to bearer, and to secure said notes he had executed a deed of trust upon the land, naming W. B. Marsh, of Tyler, Tex., trustee in the mortgage."

Unquestionably, we think, the record was notice of that much, and we do not understand appellee to be in the attitude of contending to the contrary; but the court further found, and appellee attacks the finding as without support in law, that the effect of the record and recitals referred to was to put appellee on inquiry and to charge it with notice of the existence of such other relevant facts as inquiry pursued with proper diligence would have disclosed.

"From these facts," said the court, "that is, the execution of the notes and deed of trust, and causing same to be recorded in the record provided by law for record of such instruments, it would be presumed that the notes had in some way gone into the channels of trade, and a lien had become fixed. To hold otherwise would be to assume that the entire proceedings were for no purpose and not intended for what they speak. With this information given by the record, a reasonable inquiry of either Jones, the maker of the notes, or of Marsh, the trustee, would have disclosed the fact that the notes were held by the Harris Lumber Company."

[3] As supporting his view of the law, the court cited Wilkerson v. Ward, 137 S. W. 159. In that case Ward claimed under a deed from Miles made in 1888, and duly recorded, in which the land was described as block 49, containing lots numbered 1 to 20, inclusive, in the Jonathan Miles First addition to San Angelo, and Wilkerson claimed under a deed from Miles made in 1909, in which the land was described with reference to streets in said addition. The court of civil appeals held Wilkerson to be chargeable with notice that the land Miles sold him was the same land he had conveyed to Ward. If the case is not within a qualification of the general rule announced in Carter v. Hawkins, 62 Tex. 393, it is opposed to the doctrine recognized in this state by the Supreme Court. The general rule and the qualification was stated by Chief Justice Phillips in Wiseman v. Waters (Sup.) 174 S. W. 516, as follows:

"The general rule that under the doctrine of constructive notice there is imputed to the subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer notice only of that which appears on the face of the recorded instrument, and that where there is substantial discrepancy between the property intended to be conveyed or mortgaged and that described in the instrument, the record will not operate as notice, is subject to the qualification that where the description in the instrument is ambiguous, inconsistent in its parts, or correct in one particular and false in another, the record is such as to naturally excite inquiry, and under such circumstances it therefore becomes the duty of the subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer to make inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining what property was actually the subject of the instrument."

And in discussing the question further the Chief Justice added:

"With the qualification announced in Carter v. Hawkins, the rule is established, at least in this state and in others, that the record of instruments provided or permitted by law to be recorded operates as notice only of the facts actually exhibited by the record, and not those which might have been ascertained by such inquiries as an examination of the record might have induced a prudent man to make" citing numerous authorities, to which may be added Adams v. Lumber Co., 162 S. W. 974.

The reason for the distinction between the effect of constructive and actual notice appears in the statement of the Supreme Court of Minnesota in Bailey v. Galpin, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. 1054, as follows:

"Constructive notice of the contents of a deed arises as an inference or presumption of law from the mere fact of record, and is in law equivalent to actual notice of what appears upon the face of the record to the party bound to search for it, whether he has seen or known of it or not; that is, constructive notice under the recording acts may bind the title, but does not bind the conscience; while actual notice binds the conscience of the party."

If, as seems to be true by force of the rule in question, appellee was chargeable with notice only of facts recited in the trust deed to Marsh, and not with notice of the existence of facts which inquiry suggested by recitals in the deed if diligently pursued would have disclosed, we see no way of escape from the conclusion that it was not bound to make the Harris Lumber Company a party to its foreclosure suit in order to bar its right to enforce the lien it claimed on the land; for appellee did not otherwise know and it was not informed by anything in the trust deed who was the owner of the debt it was made to secure. Appellee could not have made the owner of the debt a party to its suit without first identifying him, and he could have done that only by making inquiry he was not bound to make.

The operation of the rule cannot be regarded as unfair or inequitable in this case, in view of the fact that the notice appellee had of the lumber company's claim on the land was presumptive only, and not actual so as to be "binding on its conscience," and in view of the fact that the lumber company, by taking from Jones and placing of record proper evidence of its claim, could have charged appellee with notice thereof and compelled it, in order to bar its rights, to make it a party to any foreclosure suit it brought. Rogers v. Houston, 94 Tex. 403, 60 S. W. 869; Gamble v. Martin, 151 S. W. 327.

[4] If, however, the conclusion reached by us that the right of the holder of the note for $1,000 made by Jones to the lumber company to look to the land as security for the payment thereof was cut off by the judgment in appellee's foreclosure suit was shown to be erroneous, the conviction we have as to the disposition which should be made of the appeal would remain unchanged; for we think the contention of appellee that the judgment was not warranted by the pleadings and the evidence in other particulars so far as it was in appellant's favor for a foreclosure of the lien he claimed on the land also should be sustained. It is clear that the only effect as between Jones and the lumber company of the delivery by the former to the latter of the 10 $1,000 notes and the deed of trust to Marsh was to create a lien on the land to secure the note for $1,000 made by Jones to the lumber company. As between those parties the transaction could not have had any other effect; for the 10 notes did not represent indebtedness of Jones to the lumber company or to any one else. Jones owed the lumber company only the amount of the note for $1,000 he made to it February 27, 1913, and, so far as the record shows to the contrary, owed no other debts except the one to appellee. Therefore, unless the transaction by which Jones passed the 10 notes and the trust deed to Marsh to the lumber company operated as stated, it did not operate at all as between said parties, but was a nullity; for there was no other debt to be secured by it, and the existence of a debt (or other obligation, and there was no pretense in this case that there was any other obligation) is indispensable to the existence of a mortgage. Carroll v. Tomlinson, 192 Ill. 398, 61 N. E. 484, 85 Am. St. Rep. 344; Richards Trust Co. v. Rhomberg, 19 S. D. 595, 104 N. W. 268; 19 R. C. L. 294, and authorities there cited. In the work last referred to it is said:

"Since a conveyance cannot be a mortgage unless given to secure the performance of an obligation, the existence of an obligation to be secured is an essential element without which the mortgage instrument is but a shadow without substance."

[5] If such was the effect of the notes and trust deed as between Jones and the lumber company, such was the effect thereof as between Jones and H. Masterson; for, taking the papers as he did after the maturity thereof with full knowledge of all the facts relating thereto, said H. Masterson, as the holder thereof, had the rights, and only the rights, the lumber company had while it held same; in other words, H. Masterson could look to the land described in the trust deed as security (not for the amount of the 10 $1,000 notes to bearer, but) only for the amount of the $1,000 note to the lumber company. It was on that theory, it seems, and the theory that N. T. Masterson by his purchase of the 10 $1,000 notes made by Jones to bearer became the owner of Jones' debt to the lumber company, that the court below rendered the judgment he did in appellant's favor. But appellant in his pleadings did not seek a recovery as the owner of the note, or of an interest therein, made by Jones to the lumber company. The recovery he sought was on account of and as the owner of the 10 $1,000 notes made by Jones to bearer. And the testimony was that H. Masterson intended to sell and appellant intended to buy those notes, and not the note nor an interest in it made to the lumber company; in other words, it appeared from both the pleadings and the testimony that the thing H. Masterson intended to sell and appellant intended to buy was what we have held operated as between Jones and the lumber company and Jones and H. Masterson as a mortgage only. And we do not think the 10 notes to bearer and the trust deed to Marsh operated differently in favor of appellant, for he purchased same after the notes matured and with knowledge of the facts shown by the collateral agreement under which the lumber company, and after it H. Masterson, held same. He purchased paper he was bound to know was only a mortgage, and, for anything appearing to the contrary in the record before us, took nothing by his purchase; for the rule is that—

"An assignment of the mortgage alone, without the debt, is nugatory and confers no right whatever upon the assignee." 27 Cyc. 1286, and authorities there cited.

The judgment, so far as it awards appellant a foreclosure of the trust deed to Marsh and directs a sale of the land therein described, will be so reformed as to deny him such relief, and, as so reformed, will be affirmed.

STRINGER et al. v. JOHNSON. (No. 568.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 12, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 19, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §101—Actual possession insufficient to give title to contiguous tract subsequently purchased.

Where a person who has acquired title by adverse possession to a certain portion of a league purchases a tract contiguous thereto, the continued actual possession of the land to which he had acquired adverse possession without enlargement or extension so as to reach the land purchased would not give him title by adverse possession to land purchased; his possession of other tract not being extended thereto by construction.

2. Adverse possession §115(4) — Inclosure by fence and use for pasture for required period held for jury.

In trespass to try title, whether plaintiff's predecessor, who plaintiff claimed to have acquired title by limitation under 5 and 10 year statutes, had kept the land continuously inclosed by a fence for any period of 5 or 10 years, and during such period continued its use and enjoyment as a pasture for stock, held for the jury.

3. Adverse possession §112 — Limitation claimant must prove every fact necessary to give title.

One asserting title to land by limitation has the burden of proving every fact necessary to give such title; inferences never being indulged in favor of a limitation claimant.

4. Adverse possession §14—Mere fencing of land without actual occupancy not sufficient.

The mere fencing of land, though land is claimed under a deed duly of record, and taxes are duly paid thereon, will not, of itself, without the statutory contemplated use, cultivation, or enjoyment, give such purchaser title by limitation under either the 5 or 10 year statutes.

5. Adverse possession §115(2) — Possession at times by tenants for cutting timber held not to give landlord title by adverse possession as matter of law.

That a grantee had several Mexican tenants who at times camped upon the 30-acre tract in tents for purpose of cutting timber for wood and charcoal, etc., and at times cultivated a small garden on the land, held not as a matter of law to give grantee title by adverse possession as against true owner.

Error from District Court, Jefferson County; E. A. McDowell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Annie H. Johnson against T. A. Stringer and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

E. M. Chester and E. E. Easterling, both of Beaumont, for plaintiffs in error.

John Hancock, of Thurber, and Smith & Crawford, of Beaumont, for defendant in error.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. This was an action of trespass to try title, brought by Mrs. Annie H. Johnson, as plaintiff, against T. A. Stringer and B. M. Chester, as defendants, to recover about 60 acres of land, a part of the Absalom Williams league in Jefferson county, the land being sued for as one tract, and so described in the plaintiff's petition by specific metes and bounds. Plaintiff also specially pleaded title to the land under the statutes of limitation of 3, 5, and 10 years. Defendants disclaimed as to all the land sued for by plaintiff, save and except a tract consisting of about 30 acres, which was described by metes and bounds in their answer, and as to this 30-acre tract they pleaded the general denial, not guilty, and also interposed the 3, 5, and 10 year statutes of limitation.

The case proceeded to trial with a jury, but at the conclusion of the evidence the trial court, at plaintiff's request, peremptorily instructed a verdict in her favor for all the land sued for by her, and upon the verdict thus obtained, judgment in her favor was rendered. Defendants, at the proper time, objected and excepted to the trial judge's action in instructing the verdict against them for so much of the land as was described in their answer and claimed by them, and after their motion for new trial was overruled defendants prosecuted a writ of error to this court.

For convenience, plaintiffs in error will be referred to as "appellants," and defendant in error as "appellee."

At the trial below, appellee never attempted to show title in herself from the sovereignty or from any other source, but relied solely upon her claim of adverse possession as to all the land sued for, while appellants established title in themselves from the sovereignty; and, therefore, appellee was not entitled to an instructed verdict in her favor as to the 30-acre tract described in appellants' answer, unless it can be said that the evidence as a whole showed, without contradiction or dispute and was therefore conclusive, that appellee had acquired title thereto by limitation, as claimed by her. This alone was the issue between the parties below, and we shall try to state, as succinctly as possible, the substance of the material evidence relative to such issue, as the same is reflected by the record.

In August, 1878, Joseph Nassis and wife, who were not shown to have any title, executed and delivered to one Ezekial Janes a deed purporting to convey to Janes a tract of approximately 33 acres of land, a part of the Absalom Williams league. The deed specifically described the 33 acres by metes and bounds, and was duly recorded soon after its execution. Janes at once took actual possession of this 33-acre tract, claiming it under his deed duly of record, made permanent and substantial improvements thereon and lived thereon, claiming the land as his own, and paid all taxes as they accrued, and continued in peaceable and adverse possession of this 33-acre tract until 1910. By such continuous adverse possession, Janes acquired title to said 33-acre tract, and this is admitted by appellants. In 1892, one C. U. Connelley, who was not shown to have any character of title, but who, it seems, was asserting some character of claim antagonistic to Janes, made a deed to Janes, purporting to convey to Janes said 33-acre tract, title to which at that time Janes had already acquired by limitation under both the 5 and 10 year statutes, and such deed also purported to convey to Janes the 30-acre tract which is claimed by appellants in this suit, and of which they were the true record owners, the two tracts, however, being conveyed as one described by specific notes and bounds. This deed from Connellee to Janes was duly recorded within a few weeks after its execution, and the proof showed, without dispute, that Janes thereafter regularly paid all taxes due on the 30 acres in controversy until 1910. The undisputed proof shows that up to the time Janes got said deed from Connellee, his improvements of every kind and character had been confined to the 33-acre tract, which lies immediately south of the 30-acre tract in controversy, and Janes, up to that time, never had any character of possession of any portion of the 30-acre tract owned by appellants, or rather their predecessors in title. As to whether Janes ever had such actual possession of the 30-acre tract here in controversy, or any portion thereof, subsequent to the deed from Connellee and for such length of time as would confer title by the 5 or 10 year statute of limitation (there could be none under the 3-year statute, because there was no connection with the sovereignty) was, we think, an issue of fact for the determination of the jury.

Counsel for appellee, in their argument in this court, conceded that her right to recover the 30-acre tract in controversy must depend upon proof that title to that tract was acquired by Janes by limitation subsequent to the execution of the deed to him from Connellee in 1892. If the evidence upon that point showed, conclusively, that is to say, without dispute or contradiction, that Janes had so acquired title to the 30-acre tract, then the instructed verdict was proper; but, if not, the issue should have gone to the jury.

Appellants have attacked the action of the trial court, in peremptorily instructing the verdict against them, by several assignments of error, but the gist of their contentions may be stated as follows:

(1) That Janes' possession of the 33-acre tract under the deed from Nassis and wife having continued for such period of time as to give him perfect title by limitation, the 33-acre tract was thereby effectively segregated from all remaining portions of the league, and just as much so as if the true owner had conveyed the 33-acre tract to Janes; and that when Janes took the deed from Connellee in 1892, which, according to the boundaries specified, conveyed both the 33-acre tract and the 30-acre tract here in controversy, Janes' actual possession of the 33-acre tract was not thereby extended by construction to the 30-acre tract, and that Janes' actual possession of the 33-acre tract remaining the same after the deed from Connellee as before, and being in no manner enlarged or extended to the larger tract described in the Connellee deed, such continued actual possession of the 33-acre tract, however long continued, without enlargement or extension so as to reach the 30 acres here in controversy, was insufficient to require the true owner of the 30-acre tract to go to the records to ascertain the extent of Janes' claim.

(2) That as to whether Janes ever had and held such continuous, actual possession of the 30-acre tract in controversy, and so used, cultivated, or enjoyed the same for a period of time sufficient to give him title by limitation under either the 5 or 10 year statute, after taking the deed from Connellee, was under the evidence adduced, an issue of fact for the jury.

We do not find in appellee's brief any counter proposition which absolutely and unequivocally denies the soundness of the first contention made by appellants, as shown above, but by the second counter proposition, which comes nearer to doing so than any of them, appellee replies that the undisputed evidence showed that Janes, subsequent to taking the deed from Connellee, and while still in actual possession of the 33-acre tract, as before, also took actual possession of the 30-acre tract, and used, cultivated, and enjoyed it for some period of time, and that, even if less than the statutory term, still such possession, however brief, was sufficient to require the true owner of the 30-acre tract to go to the record to ascertain the extent of Janes' claim to that tract, and that such possession, regardless of its duration, put the statutes of limitation in motion as to the 30-acre tract, which continued so long as Janes occupied and used either of said tracts.

As to the second contention made by appellants, as we have shown it above, appellee replies that the evidence adduced upon the trial showed, conclusively and without conflict or contradiction, that Janes had and held adverse and peaceable possession of the 30-acre tract for a period of time sufficient to perfect title in him under both the 5 and 10 year statutes.

[1] After careful consideration of the proposition involved, we have reached the conclusion that appellants' first contention, as above shown, is sound, and must be sustained. We do not think, however, that either of the cases cited by appellants in support of their contention can be said to be exactly decisive of the point in their favor, for we think that none of such cases is precisely relevant in its facts to the instant case. The cases cited by appellants in support of their contention are Broom v. Pearson, 98 Tex. 469, 85 S. W. 790, 86 S. W. 733; Hill v. Harris, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 408, 64 S. W. 820; Holland v. Nance, 102 Tex. 177, 114 S. W. 346; Bird v. McHargue, 182 Ky. 27, 205 S. W. 957, the last mentioned being a Kentucky case. But though the cited cases are not squarely relevant in their facts, yet the reasoning by which the conclusion was reached in them all, and especially that of Hill v. Harris, supra, applies, strongly we think, in favor of appellants' contention here. Hill v. Harris was a decision by the Galveston Court of Civil Appeals, speaking through Justice Gill, and the Supreme Court of this state denied a writ of error. There was but one point in the case for the consideration of the Supreme Court, and that court's action denying the writ of error meant, of course, that in the opinion of the Supreme Court the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals was correct, but it would not necessarily follow, of course, that the Supreme Court approved in toto the reasoning of the Court of Civil Appeals in reaching its conclusion. But, however that may be, it occurs to us that the reasons given for the conclusion by the Court of Civil Appeals in that case are sound and logical, and that the reasoning there applies to the point here under consideration. It was substantially held in Hill v. Harris that, where a person held a part of a league of land under a deed duly recorded until title thereto was perfected in him by limitation, his possession could not be extended, by construction, so that limitation would run in his favor as to any other portion of the same league by his taking a deed to the remainder of the same league, of which he did not take actual possession also, notwithstanding it was shown that taxes upon the whole league were regularly and duly paid after the second deed was taken. In reaching the conclusion there, the court, among other things, said:

"It seems to us, therefore, that it is not so much a question of extent of claim on the part of those asserting limitation as it is a question of the sufficiency of the possession to send the true owner to the record to ascertain the extent of the claim. The taking and recording of a deed to land will not of itself put the statute in motion in favor of a claimant thereunder. Neither will adverse possession put the 5-year statute in motion, in the absence of a duly recorded deed and the payment of taxes. The true owner may ignore such a deed until his domain is actually invaded. The record of it is not notice of the adverse claim as to the true owner until some act is done upon the land itself amounting to adverse possession. When this occurs, the owner must take notice of it, and the record of the deed immediately becomes constructive notice of the extent of the adverse holder's claim. That the record of a junior deed is not constructive notice to prior purchasers is now well settled. * * *

We mention this only to emphasize the fact that the record of the deed under which defendants claim the 1,000 acres was utterly without significance as to plaintiffs, if unaccompanied by adverse possession. It has been shown that the adverse possession of the 3.234-acre tract had ripened into perfect title in those holding it prior to the purchase by the senior Kennedy, so that, conceding that the legal title to the entire league had been in the plaintiffs, the senior Kennedy, by his purchase of the last-named tract, acquired a title thereto as unassailable as if plaintiffs themselves had conveyed it. It was thereby as effectually segregated from the remainder of the league as if it had been conveyed to him by the true owner. At the time of Kennedy's purchase of the 1,000-acre tract, his possession of the larger tract had served its purpose and had ceased to be unlawful. * * *

So in this case title to the 33-acre tract was complete in James by limitation long before he took the deed from Connellee in 1892 and therefore the 33-acre tract was, at the date of the last-mentioned deed, effectively segregated, in legal contemplation, from all other portions of the Absalom Williams league; and since the undisputed evidence showed that James, after taking the deed from Connellee, did not enlarge his improvements upon the 33-acre tract so as to extend them in any way to the 30 acres here in controversy, and the character of his possession of the 33-acre tract being in no manner changed, his continued actual and unchanged possession of that tract did not have the effect to extend, by construction, his possession to the 30-acre tract now in controversy, the true ownership of which is admitted to be in appellants. And we cannot agree with counsel for appellee in their broad contention that any act or conduct on the part of James that constituted actual possession for any period of time, however brief, after recording the deed from Connellee, was sufficient to put the statutes of limitation in motion in his favor, and that limitation then continued as long as James held actual possession of the 33-acre tract. On the contrary, we cannot escape the conclusion that in order for James to have acquired title by limitation to the 30-acre tract in controversy, notwithstanding the fact that he placed the Connellee deed promptly of record and paid all taxes accruing thereon, it was incumbent upon appellee to show, by conclusive evidence, in order to entitle her to an instructed verdict in this case, that James took and held actual possession of the 30-acre tract, claiming the same adversely, and held such possession continuously for a term sufficient to give him title under either the statute of 5 or 10 years; and we shall not proceed to discuss that point.

Appellee, in this connection, first contends that the undisputed proof conclusively showed that James, shortly after taking the deed from Connellee in 1892, inclosed the 30-acre tract in controversy with a wire fence, and that he kept it continuously inclosed until 1910, when he sold the land to appellee's predecessor in title, and that during all that period of time, James was using this inclosure for a pasture for stock, both cattle and horses, and that such inclosure, use, and enjoyment of the land constituted, in contemplation of law, adverse possession in him as against the true owner, and that, it being undisputed that the Connellee deed describing the 30-acre tract was duly of record during such period of possession, and that all taxes were regularly paid, title by limitation was shown to have been complete in Janes, under both the 5 and 10 year statutes, long before appellee acquired the title through him. Of course, if appellee is correct in this contention as to what the undisputed evidence was, we would not be required to go any further, but would sustain the contention and affirm the judgment. After a careful consideration of all the testimony found in the record, we think that it cannot be held that it was shown by the undisputed evidence, in its entirety, that Janes kept this 30 acres continuously inclosed by a fence for any full period of either 10 or 5 years between the time he took the Connellee deed and 1910, when his possession ended; neither can it be said that the evidence, as a whole, showed conclusively and without dispute that the land was used continuously as a pasture during any such period of time while Janes had it. It may be conceded, and we might add it is the opinion of this court, that the evidence on the part of appellee, if there were no other, was sufficient to warrant the court in instructing the verdict in this case, and therefore it will be unnecessary to discuss the evidence of any witness for the appellee, nor will it be necessary to discuss the evidence in detail of the several witnesses who testified for appellants; but, in disposing of the point now under consideration, it will be sufficient to note or mention such portions of the evidence introduced by appellants, as defendants below, as was of such character, we think, to require the submission to the jury of the issue whether Janes' possession and use of the 30-acre tract as a pasture was such as to give him title by limitation. As stated above, it was conclusively shown upon the trial that appellants have the record title to the 30 acres in controversy, lying just north of and contiguous to the original 33-acre tract purchased by Janes from Nasis and wife, and that appellants hold such title under a regular and consecutive chain of transfers from the sovereignty, and that they also claim title under a deed from the heirs of one Emma Fennels, whatever that claim of title may amount to. Among other witnesses introduced by appellants, as defendants below, on the issue of limitation, was the witness George Simmons, whose testimony in full was as follows:

"I am 58 years old and have been living in Beaumont all my life. I live in the north end of town about a quarter of a mile north of the place where Zeke Janes use to live. I have known Zeke all my life. I have lived up there north of Zeke's old place 30 years. He had about 30 or 40 acres of land fenced in out there, and he had it fenced when I moved out there. It was north from him and south from me. He had it fenced with a pew fence, made out of pews. That is the kind of fence he had around his field. He had a wire fence north of his field right close to where we live, and about 30 acres of land was fenced inside that fence. That fence was put up about 6 years after I went out there. It was black land, and nothing inside that fence but woods, pine, oak, and gum, some large and some small. There were no houses inside of that pasture. That fence stayed there 3 or 4 years; it had some gaps in it, so that we could go through this land. There were no gaps left here, and the fence was down so you could pass through it, and I have seen it down in different places, during the 3 years it was up there. There was no horses or nothing of that kind in there; nothing but woods. After that 3 years Zeke quit keeping the fence up, and it was torn down by people going through there. The first time I ever saw any horses in Zeke's pasture was about a year after that wire fence was put up; Dan Gill put them in there. That pasture was not on the 30-acre tract; it was between the 30-acre tract and Zeke's homestead. It was a little round place, about two or three lots, something like that, that he would bring horses up and put them in there. It was south of where Emma Fennels lived. It was not inside of Zeke's field. Dan kept his horses in there about six or eight months. He didn't keep them in there all the time either. He would keep them in there three or four days at a time. That little pasture fence where Dan kept his horses was built after the wire fence was built, and before the wire fence was torn down. There wasn't any horses or cows in the 30-acre tract, except some time when people would go through and leave the gate open stock would get in there. I never saw Dan Gill's horses in the 30-acre tract. I saw his horses, about seven or eight head in that little pasture. The fence around that 30-acre piece was a three-wire fence. It was fastened to trees and posts. The fence was sufficient to keep stock in and out, except when the gaps were down. When the gaps were down stock would get in there. I have seen that fence down at other places than the gaps, but cannot say how often. I never saw any stock in there except when the fence was down. I went through there very often. In going to my work, sometimes I would go through there and sometimes I would go to Magnolia. I cannot say whether I went through there as often as once a week or as often as once a month but I would go just which way I wanted to. I lived about two blocks from the north fence of that 30-acre tract. The Connellee tract had about 30 acres in it, and was right next to us, and was between us and Zeke Janes' field. The fence I spoke of is on the Connellee tract. There was no cross fence that I know of between the Connellee tract and the Zeke Janes 30-acre tract. The fence stayed around the Connellee tract about 3 years. It went down when Zeke quit fooling with it. All the fence I have been telling about was on the Connellee tract, except the little fence where Dan Gill put his horses. That was not on the Connellee tract. No, sir; Zeke Janes never had any pasture out there. None at all. There was no fence south of the Connellee fence, except the fence around Zeke's field. That is the only fence that I saw. I don't know exactly how far Zeke's field was from the Connellee fence, but it was about three-quarters of a mile. I know where Zeke's house was; it was on the Nancy White tract. I lived north of the Connellee 30-acre tract. I never saw any fence around the land between the Connellee 30-acre tract and the tract where Zeke had his field."

Cross-examination:

"The pasture that I am testifying about came up in about two blocks of where I live, and is on the Connellee land. Yes; I know where the Connellee land is. There is 30 acres of it. That was the pasture that I had been going through and about which I testified about being down in about 2 or 3 years after it was built. Zeke Janes built that fence. No; we had nothing against Zeke Janes. I did not cut his fence down. He put gaps in there so that we could open and close them. Zeke had no pasture between the Connellee tract and Zeke's field. There was no pasture in there. I never did see any horses in there. Emma Fennels lived kinder to the side of her father's field, but it wasn't between Zeke's field and the Connellee tract. She lived about two blocks from his field fence. When we came through the Connellee pasture we would come right up on the south and come out there (pointing to north line of Connellee's fence). The Connellee pasture, the pasture that I have been testifying about, is about three-quarters of a mile from Zeke's house, I guess. The closest person living around the place where we would go out of the Connellee pasture was Emma Fennels. The pasture fence that I have been testifying about did not take in Zeke's field. If there was any other pasture there I know nothing about it. Yes; I know Dan Gill. I know Mr. Johnson, the merchant that lives on Concord road. I don't know exactly how far I live from him. He has delivered groceries to my place. He has bought produce from me. He has been living there a good while. He lives about a mile from that pasture.

"Q. And you say that Zeke didn't have any fence around the north part of his field? A. No, sir."

Redirect examination:

"Amos Prater did not live in that pasture. He lived west of Zeke's field, and kinder west of Emma Fennels. Amos Prater had a house and a patch fence around it. Amos' girl tore the house down and moved it before Emma Fennels died. I saw Zeke Janes cutting wood on the tract of land where Emma Fennels lived, but he is about the only one I ever saw cutting wood in there. Some Mexicans lived there on the Amos Prater place, but I don't remember ever seeing them cutting any wood. I don't know exactly how long they lived there. I never saw anybody living in a tent on that tract of land or camping on it. That tract of land had been pretty well cut over before Zeke sold it. Emma Fennels lived there 7 years. I remember when the house was built there. Her papa helped to build it; I don't remember who else. From the place where I would come out of the Connellee pasture it was about three or four blocks before I would come to Emma Fennels' house. I think all that land between the south fence on the Connellee tract and Emma Fennels was open land. I never saw any fence around it."

Appellants also, as defendants below, introduced the witness Frank Thomas, whose testimony in full was as follows:

"I am 49 years old, and live on the Concord road about a quarter of a mile from where Zeke Janes used to live. I have known Zeke Janes all my life, and know where his house was out there. I don't know how many acres he had in the field around his house. He had a pasture around his house, but I don't know how many acres, neither do I know how long he kept the pasture up. I don't exactly remember when he had the pasture there. I know he had a pasture, and him and Dan Gill and Sid Milligan use to pasture some horses up there, and it was up as often as it was down. I remember when Zeke sold out and moved. I don't know how long it was before that, that I saw this fence around that pasture; I didn't pay any attention to it. That Milligan boy was running around with Dan, and they pastured some horses in that pasture, but I couldn't tell you exactly how often. I don't know how many years they did that; I didn't keep any account of that. They didn't keep the stock in that pasture all the time. Whenever they wanted to go in the cove and catch wild horses they would put them in that pasture. Sometimes the pasture was down, sometimes it was up. I couldn't tell you how long it would stay down; they were always fixing up fence around there. Sometimes I went through there hunting and saw it down. I was up in that neighborhood all the time. Sometimes in the evening I went out there hunting. I used to hunt in that pasture. Sometimes there would be one or two cows in there. They were supposed to be Zeke Janes' cows. He didn't keep his cows in there all the time. Everybody would turn their stock out, and when they wanted to go in that pasture they would go on through. There wasn't any stock law out there at that time. I knew Emma Fennels, but don't remember what year she died. At the time she died Archie (her husband) had quit her. The fence was down then. I don't know how long it was down. All the posts were down where stock ran over it and knocked it down, and they would go there and repair it. It was torn down that way around about in different places. It was a two or three wire fence; I don't remember. When that fence was down other peoples horses and cattle went in there, because I had a little mare named Nellie, and she got away one day, and I found her in that pasture; the fence was down. That was a good many years ago. It was after Emma Fennels and Archie broke up, but before Emma died. I don't know exactly how long before she died. I suppose Emma and Archie lived together about 6 or 7 years. I remember Dan Gill used to have horses out there in that pasture, but whether or not they were his I don't know. That was after Emma Fennels' death, I believe. At that time they would go and repair that fence whenever they wanted to put anything in there; they would build it up again. They would put stock in there a month or two, and then the fence would get down, and if they wanted to put some more stock in there they would have to repair it. I don't know how long that would be between times. I didn't keep no account, and I didn't keep the days, years, months, or weeks of that at all. Sometimes it was down weeks and months as far as I know exactly. Whenever I would go through there sometimes it would be down and sometimes it would be up."

Cross-examination:

"I have been living in and around Beaumont all my life. I have been married 23 years, and have one child, and have been living on Concord road about two miles north of Beaumont all those 23 years. Zeke Janes was living on the Gold Hill addition, north of town, when I married. I remember when he sold his place. He had a daughter named Emma Fennels. She died right there in Zeke's house before he moved away. She lived in the house that Archie built on Zeke's property in the pasture. Zeke was supposed to give her some land. She lived up in the pasture. I don't exactly remember how long she lived in there. She and Archie broke up while they were living in there. There was a pasture up north of Zeke's pasture. It was supposed to belong to Zeke. The pasture that I was testifying about being down was the one that Dan and Milligan used to put horses in. I have no interest in this case. I am just letting my testimony come out just like I haven't got any interest whatever in this case. I haven't talked about this case at all. Yes, sir; I talked to Mr. Chester about what my testimony would be in this case. There was one big pasture, and there was a fence that cut across there. I don't know the difference in the size of those pastures; I only saw them sometimes when I went through there hunting. I don't know which pasture was the largest, because I never paid much attention to them, but I did pay attention to the fence, because I was through there hunting. That has been a long while ago. I couldn't tell you how long it has been since that fence was built. I cannot tell you which fence fell down first. Sometimes the fence was down in panels. In other words there was no fence there at all. I don't know whether it would turn stock or not, but I do know that they had to repair it occasionally. I am a carpenter. I have handled horses and cattle. I have seen stock in that pasture. The fence was sufficient to hold cattle for a while, but if they wanted to get out they could get out. There never was a bunch in there. They could break out. I didn't pay any attention to which fence was down, whether it was the north or south pasture. I know that the fence was down sometimes, and that is all I know about it. I couldn't tell you whether or not all that fence was down when Zeke left, because some fellows went there and put a new wire fence around there. I think George Simmons put a new wire fence around there. A new wire fence was put there a year ago. I drove a wagon through there, and saw where the new fence was put up. It was around the land where Zeke had the pasture, and around the Amos Prater place. There was a pasture there when Zeke used to live there, but I cannot say that it was a pasture that would hold stock if they wanted to get out. I don't remember now whether or not Archie Fennels was around his wife when I found my little mare Nellie in that pasture. I think they had broken up. Nellie was a gray mare, and I bought her from Gilbert Scott and paid $75 for her."

Redirect examination:

"I used to play around Amos Prater's place before Amos and Adeline died. I used to be over there all the time. They lived on that side (indicating west) of the pasture. His house was right off here, and the pasture was in here, running up toward the Simmons settlement. There was a fence running along by Prater's house up to Ike Black's house. I couldn't tell you how that fence was; it ran in such a zig-zag way; that fence ran all kinds of ways. Just to come to the facts about it, there wasn't much of a fence at all."

Cross-examination:

"I have built some fences; a good many. That fence that we have been talking about is just like some children had been playing. If a horse wanted to get out he could do so; that is the way that fence was. I think a fellow would be foolish to try to keep a horse in there. I know I wouldn't put a horse in there if I expected him to stay in there. He could go right on about his business."

[2] We think that it must be conceded, after the testimony of these two witnesses is considered as a whole, that the issue of whether Janes kept the 30 acres in controversy continuously inclosed by a fence for any period of 5 or 10 years, and during such period continued its use and enjoyment as a pasture for stock, was a question of fact for the determination of the jury. It must be borne in mind that the question is not whether the evidence was sufficient to have warranted a finding in favor of appellee on the issue of limitation, but the question is, Was the state of the evidence such that the trial court could take the issue away from the jury, and determine the credibility of all the witnesses and the weight to be given to all the testimony? According to the evidence of the witnesses Simmons and Thomas, the jury could have found that the fence which Janes had around the 30-acre tract in controversy was down for "weeks and months at a time," and that stock passed in and out at will, not only stock belonging to Janes, but other stock in the community belonging to other owners, and while the evidence of these witnesses also shows that the fence was frequently repaired, and especially at times when it would be needed to hold stock that was being gathered, it nevertheless leaves the matter in such shape that a jury would be warranted in concluding that the fence was not kept up around the land for any continuous period of 5 or 10 years, and we think that the burden was upon appellee, in order to warrant an instructed verdict in the case, to show that the fence was kept up for at least some continuous period of five years during the time Janes was claiming the land under the deed from Connellee, and that if there were breaks in the fence they were repaired within a reasonable time, and also that the land so inclosed for such period of time was used continuously as a pasture, or used or enjoyed in some other way contemplated by the statute.

[3, 4] One asserting title to land by limitation has the burden of proving every fact necessary to give such title, and inferences are never indulged in favor of a limitation claimant. Dunn v. Taylor, 102 Tex. 80, 113 S. W. 265. But even if it had been shown conclusively by all the witnesses that Janes kept the land inclosed by a fence for a continuous period of 5 or 10 years, without any breaks whatever, still such mere inclosure, unaccompanied by such use, cultivation, or enjoyment as the statute contemplates, would not have been sufficient to give Janes title by limitation. In other words, the mere fencing of land, although claimed under a deed duly of record and taxes duly paid thereon, will not, of itself, without the statutory contemplated use, cultivation, or enjoyment, give such possessor title by limitation under either the 5 or 10 years' statute. Niday v. Cochran, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 292, 93 S. W. 1027; Buster v. Warren, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 644, 80 S. W. 1063. As we construe the evidence as a whole, it not only fails to show, conclusively and without dispute or contradiction, that Janes kept the 30-acre tract inclosed by Janes during any consecutive 5 or 10 years while he claimed the land, but it also fails to show, conclusively, that he used the land as a pasture for stock for any period of 5 or 10 years consecutively. It is true the evidence shows that he very frequently gathered and pastured stock upon this land, but it also shows, or at least a jury would be warranted in concluding, that there were periods of time of perhaps months that no stock was kept on the land as a pasture, but, on the contrary, stock belonging to people in general in the community would come in at will and go out at will, and it cannot be said, therefore, that the proof was conclusive, as a whole, that Janes kept this tract of land inclosed and used it as a pasture for any consecutive period of 5 or 10 years.

[5] But appellee further contends that the trial court correctly instructed the verdict in her favor, for the reason that the evidence was such as to show, without reasonable dispute, that Janes after taking the deed from Connellee, at times had Mexican tenants upon the 30-acre tract, who were engaged in cutting timber from the tract for wood and charcoal, etc., and that these Mexican tenants were upon the land some 6 or 7 years; that these Mexican tenants lived in tents while they were engaged in cutting the timber, and that they also cultivated portions of the land. It is true, as shown by the undisputed evidence, that Janes had several Mexican tenants who camped upon the 30-acre tract in tents at times, and that they were engaged in cutting the timber into wood and burning coal, etc., and that the cutting of this timber was quite extensive, but we do not think that it could be said, as a matter of law, that the cutting of the timber through these Mexicans was such use or enjoyment of the land, of itself, as would constitute adverse possession and divest title out of the record owner, but that such use of the land, together with all other uses made by Janes, would be matters for the determination of the jury; that is to say, the jury should be permitted to determine whether such acts upon and use of the land constituted adverse possession, under proper instructions from the court. As to the cultivation which appellee claims these Mexicans did upon the land, it was quite meager indeed—nothing more than a garden, a small potato patch at times—and we are of opinion that it cannot be held, as a matter of law, that such character of alleged cultivation was sufficient to divest title out of the true owner under either of the statutes of limitation.

We cannot tell, of course, since the record does not disclose, upon what theory the trial judge peremptorily instructed the verdict in this case, but it is stated in appellants' brief that the trial judge did so upon the theory that when Janes took the deed from Connellee in 1892, which embraced or included the 30-acre tract in controversy, and continued to remain in undisputed actual possession of the 33-acre tract already owned by him, such possession extended immediately, by construction, to the 30-acre tract in controversy, and, having continued until 1910, title to Janes under both statutes of limitation was complete in him, without regard to the character of possession had by Janes of the 30-acre tract, or the use made by him of that tract. If such was the trial court's theory, we think, as we have said above, that he was in error, and also think that the question as to whether Janes ever had such actual possession of the 30-acre tract, and so used, cultivated, or enjoyed it for any consecutive period of 5 or 10 years as would give him title by limitation was an issue of fact for the jury, and that the trial court, therefore, erred in peremptorily taking that issue from them. Appellants' assignments of error based upon that action of the court are sustained, and the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded; and it is so ordered.

HARTFORD ACCIDENT & INDEMNITY
CO. v. DURHAM. (No. 1643.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 21, 1920. On Motion for Rehearing, May 19, 1920.)

1. Master and servant §375(1) — Automobile truck helper held killed in course of employment.

Where furniture driver, after having delivered furniture to nearby town, instead of immediately returning, proceeded to another city, where he became intoxicated, a helper on the truck who was under the control of the driver, and who was killed on return trip, was killed in the course of his employment, since, upon driver's failure to immediately return, he was not required to abandon the truck and seek other conveyance back to home town.

2. Master and servant §403—Employer has burden of proving intoxication as defense.

In an action under Employers' Liability Act, where intoxication of employé is pleaded as a defense under Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, art. 5246-1, defendant has burden of affirmatively establishing such intoxication.

3. Master and servant §381—Intoxication, to constitute defense under Employers' Liability Act, must have contributed to accident or disability.

Intoxication, to be available as a defense under Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, art. 5246-1, in action under Employers' Liability Act, must have contributed to the happening of the accident or the disability resulting therefrom.

4. Master and servant §381—Intoxication of employé held not proximate cause of accident.

That employé killed when truck in which he was riding overturned as result of driver's negligence was intoxicated would be no defense in action for his death under Employers' Liability Act, where no act of employé contributed to injury, causing death; such intoxication not being the proximate cause.

5. Master and servant §418(5)—Method of calculating compensation for death held not ground for complaint.

In action for death of employé under Employers' Liability Act, defendant could not complain, on appeal, of court's failure to calculate the compensation due exactly as required by the statute, under Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 5246-14, 5246-82, where amount allowed was less than it would have been if statute had been strictly followed.

6. Master and servant §405(6)—Lump sum held properly awarded for employé's death.

In action for death of employé under Employers' Liability Act, held, under the facts, that court properly awarded a lump sum rather than a weekly allowance.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County;
Kenneth Foree, Judge.

Suit by Sophronia Durham against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Eckford, of Dallas, for appellant.
W. R. Simmons, of Weston, W. Va., and Parks & Hall, of Dallas, for appellee.

HALL, J. This suit arose under the Employers' Liability Act (Acts 1913, c. 179 [Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 5246h-5246zzzz]), and was instituted by appellee, the widow of George Durham, deceased, against the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, the Haverly Furniture Company, and the Texas Employers' Insurance Association. At the time of the trial appellee dismissed her cause of action as to the last-named defendants, proceeding against the appellant alone. It was shown that Geo. Durham was injured December 22, 1917, and that death resulted from said injuries on December 28th following. Appellee filed her claim with the Industrial Accident Board of Texas, which on April 26, 1918, rendered judgment for her against appellant in the sum of $9.52, for 360 weeks, being 60 per cent. of a weekly wage of $15.87. The Accident Board refused to render judgment for a lump sum. Both parties filed objections to the award of the Accident Board, and the case was transferred to the district court of Dallas county.

Appellant's defense is, in substance, that George Durham did not sustain the injuries which produced his death while in the course of his employment, in that he, together with one Fred Meyers, a fellow employé of the Haverly Furniture Company, were sent by said Company from its place of business in the city of Dallas with an automobile truck loaded with furniture to be delivered to a customer at Arlington, a town situated in Tarrant county, about 16 miles west of the city of Dallas, and midway between Dallas and Ft. Worth; that, contrary to the rules and regulations of said furniture company, prohibiting employes from drinking intoxicating liquors while on duty, and while in the course of their employment, the said George Durham and Fred Meyers, after delivering said furniture at Arlington, went in said truck to the city of Ft. Worth, where intoxicating liquor was purchased and drunk by both of them; that said Meyers became irresponsibly intoxicated, and in said condition undertook to drive said truck from Ft. Worth to Dallas, and while in such condition the truck was overturned by negligence of Meyers, which produced the injuries directly and proximately causing Durham's death; that the said Durham accepted intoxicating liquor from Meyers, drank the same, acquiesced in, consented to, and participated in the said acts of said Meyers in going to Ft. Worth and not returning to Dallas from Arlington, and by reason of their skylarking and other acts stated, and by reason of violating the instructions and rules of their employer while outside the course of their employment, and at the time of the injuries, neither the said Durham nor the said Meyers were acting in the course of their employment; that said injuries which caused the death of Durham occurred while the said Durham was in a state of intoxication.

The court submitted to the jury only two issues, the first being:

"What was the average weekly wage of George Durham for the year immediately preceding his death?"

The jury answered: "$16.50."

The second question is:

"Would a failure of the defendant to make a lump sum settlement with the plaintiff of the compensation due her on account of the death of her husband work manifest hardship and injustice to her?"

This was answered in the affirmative.

Appellant requested first a peremptory instruction, which was refused. Whereupon it requested two special issues, as follows:

"(1) Were the injuries sustained by George Durham in the course of his employment?"

"(2) Did George Durham sustain his injuries while in a state of intoxication?"

The refusal to submit these special issues is made the ground of several assignments of error. The evidence shows that the deceased, George Durham, was a negro about 33 years of age; that he had been working for the Haverty Furniture Company, in their furniture store in the city of Dallas, for several years, performing any and all duties required of him and which he was capacitated to perform. James L. Hogg, the shipping clerk for the furniture company, testified that his employer had sold some furniture to a customer at Arlington; that he had ordered Meyers, as the truck driver, and George Durham, to load the furniture on a truck and deliver it to the customer at Arlington, to obtain the customer's receipt for the shipment, and return to Dallas; that they were not authorized to go on to Ft. Worth, beyond Arlington. He further testified that Durham was not the driver of the truck; that Meyers had charge of it, and Durham was wholly a helper and under the direction of Meyers while on the trip. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the delivery was made; that Durham had nothing whatever to do with handling or driving the truck. Meyers testified that after delivering the furniture at Arlington he went on to Ft. Worth to get some whisky for Christmas; that he did not say anything to anybody about going over there, and that Durham did not know he was going until witness told him at Arlington; that Durham said nothing but just went along. The accident occurred on the return trip after the truck had passed Arlington en route to Dallas. On direct examination Meyers testified with reference to the issue of intoxication as follows:

"While in Ft. Worth I drank two or three glasses of beer. George Durham only took one glass of beer; that is all he took to my certain knowledge; if he drank any more, I know nothing of it. He was on the truck, and we just got off and went into the saloon. * * * I was drinking at the time. George Durham didn't have anything whatever to do with the driving of that truck at any time on that trip. He had nothing whatever to do with my going to Arlington, thence to Ft. Worth, and returning to Dallas by way of Arlington and Grand Prairie. George Durham was sober at the time of the accident and at all times on the trip."

On cross-examination upon this issue he testified:

"On the way back I opened a half pint of whisky and drank some and gave George a drink. I didn't give the half pint to him. I bought about 11 or 12 pints of whisky at Ft. Worth, and all of them were in the truck when we started on the return trip. I only took one drink of whisky after leaving Ft. Worth. George didn't drink over two or three glasses of beer at Ft. Worth. * * * George didn't buy any whisky. * * * The barkeeper made me a present of half a pint. While I was in the saloon the truck was standing out at the front. I didn't stand there and watch it, but when I went in George was on the seat. I got a glass of beer for him when I drove up, and he got out and went in and drank it, and when I came out he was sitting up there on the truck waiting for me. I was in the saloon about 30 minutes or an hour, perhaps."

The appellee testified that she saw her husband at the sanitarium in Dallas after his return and asked him how the accident happened, that he had not received any medical attention at that time, and her testimony is:

"He was not drunk at the time. He talked with just as good sense as I do, and I asked him if he was drunk, and he told me that he was not, and I know he was not, because he talked with too good sense to be drunk. I never knew him to be drunk while I knew him. * * * I never saw him drunk in my life."

Article 5246—1, Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes, provides that, in an action to recover for the death of an employé resulting from personal injuries sustained in the course of his employment, it shall not be a defense: (1) That the employé was guilty of contributory negligence; (2) that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow employé; (3) but said article further provides that the employer may defend upon the ground that the injury was caused while the employé was in a state of intoxication.

[1] Under this record we are of the opinion that the injuries were sustained by George Durham in the course of his employment. He was under the direction and control of Meyers, the driver of the truck. While he entered no protest when he learned that Meyers intended to go to Ft. Worth, it does not appear that any objection of his would have been considered. He was not required to abandon the truck and seek other means of conveyance back to Dallas. He had the right to return to Dallas in the conveyance provided by his employer, and had no authority to demand that Meyers, who had been placed in control of the truck, and was temporarily in authority over him, should abandon the trip to Ft. Worth and return direct to Dallas from Arlington.

[2-4] Where intoxication is pleaded as a defense, the burden of proof rests upon the defendant to affirmatively establish the fact of such intoxication. 1 Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, § 142, p. 567. "To be available as a defense, intoxication must contribute to the happening of the accident or the disability resulting therefrom." Id. If it be admitted that the evidence quoted above is sufficient to require the submission of the issue to the jury, yet, under the circumstances, an affirmative finding upon that issue would not exonerate appellant. The injury did not result from any act of the deceased. He was not driving the truck, did not fall from the seat and was not injured until the truck overturned as the result of the negligence of his fellow employé, Meyers. Under these circumstances his intoxication could not be the proximate cause of the injury if the fact had been established. We conclude the court did not err in refusing the requested instructions.

[5] Upon the jury's findings the court rendered judgment in favor of appellee for the sum of $3,353.13. The judgment recites in part:

"It appearing to the court from the undisputed evidence in the case, coupled with the findings of the jury, that the average weekly wages of plaintiff's husband, George Durham, for the last year immediately preceding his death, was the sum of $16.50 per week, and that plaintiff therefore is entitled to compensation at the rate of $9.90 per week for 360 weeks, beginning the 22d day of December, 1917, which would total the sum of $3,564, and at the date of this judgment the sum of $514.80, being 52 weekly payments at $9.90 per week, commencing December 22, 1917, to December 22, 1918, is due and unpaid, and the court finds that a discount of $210.87 should be taken from the total amount of $3,564, and the remainder, $3,353.13, should be awarded to plaintiff as a lump sum settlement in this case; that the court, in arriving at such discount, takes into consideration the fact of the unpaid 52 weekly payments for the year commencing December 22, 1917, to date of trial, for which plaintiff has received no benefit or interest thereon, and the court offsets the discount or interest on a like amount of $514.80 due the plaintiff for the succeeding year; that is, from December 22, 1918, to December 22, 1919. Allowing the defendant no discount on said sum for its payment now, the failure to pay the compensation for the preceding year being offset by payment now of compensation for the succeeding year, and then upon the balance of $2,534.40 due during the remainder of the 360 weeks, the court allows a discount on the basis of 5 per cent. for payment now in a lump sum the sum of $210.87, leaving a balance after the discount of $2,323.53, which, after adding the sum of $1,029.80, makes a total lump sum now due plaintiff of $3,353.13, which amount the court finds to be a reasonable and proper lump sum settlement to which plaintiff is entitled, under all the facts of the case, of her total claim for compensation at the rate of $9.90 per week for 360 weeks commencing December 22, 1917."

V. S. C. S. 1918 Supp. art. 5246—14, provides that, if death should result from the injury, the association shall pay the beneficiaries a weekly payment equal to 60 per cent. of his average weekly wages, not more than $15, nor less than $5 a week, for a period of 360 weeks, from the date of the injury." Article 5246—82, Id., in defining the term "average weekly wages," says the same shall mean:

"1. If the injured employé shall have worked in the employment in which he was working at the time of the injury, whether for the same employer or not, substantially the whole of the year immediately preceding the injury, his average annual wages shall consist of 300 times the average daily wage or salary which he shall have earned in such employment during the days when so employed. * * * 5. The average weekly wages of an employé shall be one-fifty-second part of the average annual wages."

* While the court has not made the calculation exactly as we think the statute required, and by calculation shown to have been made by the recital in the judgment the court arrived at a sum less than our figures show should have been awarded, appellant's assignment complaining of the amount allowed will be overruled. The testimony is sufficient to support the jury's finding that the deceased was receiving a weekly wage of $16.50 for the year preceding September 1st. The manager of the Haverty Company testified that the deceased had threatened to quit work on September 1st and pick cotton during the fall, and in order to induce him to remain until the end of the calendar year had promised him a bonus of $2.50 per week, which the company intended to pay at the end of the year. This would have entitled the deceased to a weekly wage of $19 beginning September 1st, or approximately for a period of 16 weeks up to the time of the injury. Allowing the deceased $19 for 16 weeks and $16.50 for 36 weeks would have averaged a fraction over $17.20 per week. Sixty per cent. of this for the time allowed, less the deductions made by the court, amounted to more than the total sum decreed to appellee.

[6] The remaining contention to be disposed of is that there is no evidence which authorized the court to render judgment for a lump sum rather than for a weekly allowance. It was shown by undisputed testimony that at the time of George Durham's death he had purchased some lots, upon which he was making periodical payments; that he owed grocery bills, clothing bills, and other amounts; that after his death his wife was in bad health and was forced to support herself, her widowed mother, who was 55 years of age, and her grandmother, 89 years of age, and earn her living by cooking; that in addition to these expenses she was forced to pay out of her wages as a cook her house rent; that she was without means to pay her debts, and after the death of her husband had lost one of her lots by her inability to make the periodical payments of purchase money; that something more than $200 was still due on the two lots left to her. She testified that as soon as she could get the money she intended to build her a house on one of the lots, and thereby save house rent. We think this evidence is sufficient to warrant the court in granting her a recovery in a lump sum. Texas Employers' Insurance Association v. Downing, 218 S. W. 112.

Finding no reversible error in the judgment, it is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Appellant's motion for rehearing presents no new matter and no additional authorities. After reviewing the contentions urged in the brief, we see no reason for otherwise disposing of the issues. The motion is therefore overruled.

Appellant also files a request for additional findings of fact which is granted. We find that the rules of the Haverty Furniture Company prohibited the drinking of intoxicating liquors by its employes while on duty. We further find that George Durham did drink intoxicating liquors while at Ft. Worth.

EDWARDS v. ROBERTS. (No. 1663.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 26, 1920.)

1. Contracts \S 221(3)—Promise to pay if pending arrangement to "buy out" bank was perfected construed.

Where negotiations were pending for the purchase of a majority of the stock of the bank of which plaintiff was cashier, and defendant and another contracted to pay plaintiff an amount equal to his salary for the term of his contract "in case the pending arrangement is perfected by which the gentlemen organizing the F. bank and their associates buy out the

A. bank and you retire from the company," the condition was satisfied by the purchase of a majority of the stock; "buy out" not requiring a transfer of the assets of the bank to another bank and its obliteration as an entity.

2. Contracts \S 102—Personal contract of cashier not invalid because of bank's lack of power.

Where to facilitate the purchase of a majority of the stock of the bank of which plaintiff was cashier the cashier of a competing bank and a person interested in a third bank agreed to pay plaintiff an amount equal to his salary for the period of his existing contract, and plaintiff refused to accept the obligation of the two banks, the lack of power of defendant's bank to make such a promise did not affect defendant's liability on his promise, though plaintiff knew the money probably would ultimately be paid by the bank.

3. Banks and banking \S 102—Bank not cashier's undisclosed principal, where other party refused bank's obligation.

The bank of which defendant was cashier was not the undisclosed principal in a contract signed by him in his own name, where plaintiff, the obligee, refused to accept the bank's obligation, but demanded the personal obligation of the signers as the principals thereon.

4. Principal and agent \S 132(1) — Cashier's contract in his own name, after refusal to accept bank's contract, binding on him.

If the bank of which defendant was cashier was the disclosed principal in a contract signed by him in his own name, the presumption was that the other party elected to look to defendant, and not to the principal, especially where there was positive evidence that the other party refused to accept the bank as the obligor.

5. Monopolies \S 23—Contract in consideration of retirement of bank cashier to prevent organization of new bank enforceable.

Where, to induce certain persons to refrain from organizing a new bank in a city having three banks, they were persuaded to purchase a controlling interest in one, of which plaintiff was cashier, and to facilitate such purpose defendant and another agreed to pay plaintiff an amount equal to his salary under an unexpired contract, the contract with plaintiff was valid and enforceable even though the acts of the banks amounted to an illegal combination to prevent the establishment of a new bank.

6. Monopolies \S 12(1)—Facilitating purchase of interest in bank to discourage organization of new bank not unlawful.

For persons interested in competing banks to advise and induce officers, directors, and stockholders in one of them to sell their stock to men who were seeking to organize a new bank was not an unlawful combination, though they were all interested in keeping out a new bank, where there was no agreement that the old stockholders should not start a new bank or should assist in preventing the organization of another bank.

7. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 202(2) —Though defendant's promise was made in hope that new bank would not be organized, plaintiff not precluded from organizing one.

Though defendant and another, in facilitating the purchase of a majority of the stock of the bank of which plaintiff was cashier by persons contemplating the organization of a new bank, were acting in the hope that there would be no new bank, where, to facilitate such purpose, they promised to pay plaintiff's salary under an unexpired contract, they were not relieved of liability because plaintiff organized a new bank, where there was no agreement that he should not do so.

8. Contracts \Leftrightarrow 349(1)—In action against cashier, evidence of action of directors inadmissible.

In an action against a bank cashier on a contract executed in his own name, which he claimed was the contract of the bank and as such ultra vires, where it appeared that plaintiff refused to accept the bank's obligation instead of defendant's own obligation, evidence that the directors instructed defendant to close the contract, and stated that the bank would pay the money thereunder, was inadmissible, as it could not affect plaintiff's rights.

Appeal from District Court, Grayson County; F. E. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by Barlow Roberts against F. Z. Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wolfe & Freeman, of Sherman, for appellant.

G. P. Webb and Wood, Jones & Hassell, all of Sherman, for appellee.

HUFF, C. J. Appellee, Roberts, sued appellant, Edwards, on a contract, which was in the nature of a proposition submitted to Roberts and accepted by him. The proposition is as follows:

"Sherman, Texas, February 2, 1918.

"Mr. Barlow Roberts, Sherman, Texas—Dear Sir: In case the pending arrangement is perfected by which the gentlemen organizing the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank and their associates buy out the American Bank & Trust Company, and you retire from that company, each of us will see and guarantee that you are paid the sum of thirteen hundred and seventy and no/100 ($1,375.00) dollars, aggregating the sum of twenty-seven and fifty and no/100 ($2,750.00) dollars, each of us guaranteeing one-half of the amount, provided, however, that all the salary you may receive from the American Bank & Trust Company from February 1, until the perfection of the arrangement by which that bank makes sale as aforesaid, shall be credited on said sum of twenty-seven hundred and fifty and no/100 ($2,750.00) dollars, and provided further that if the contemplated Land Bank is organized at Sherman and you are given a position in it, which is satisfactory to you and accepted by you, then you will return to us in a lump sum an amount equal to two hundred and fifty and no/100 ($250.00) dollars per month, from the time your employment begins with the bank to the end of the year 1918. [Signed] F. C. Dillard.

"F. Z. Edwards."

The allegations and proof show that F. C. Dillard paid his $1,375 in a lump sum after the purchase mentioned in the proposition, and that F. Z. Edwards paid only two months $250, and the suit is against him for the balance of that sum, $1,125. The Land Bank mentioned in the proposition was not organized, and Roberts obtained no employment therefrom. A month or so thereafter, however, he organized and started a bank in the city of Sherman, of which he was president, and from which he received a salary. In January and February, 1918, there were three banks in the city of Sherman; the Merchants' & Planters' Bank, the Commercial National Bank, and the American Bank & Trust Company. At that time several gentlemen, Knowles S. Loving, Lee Simmons, Leslie, and others, were endeavoring to organize a bank, and had applied for a charter therefor, named the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank. Their application for a charter had been granted, but no charter in fact had issued. The three banks organized at that time were of the opinion that there was not room in the city of Sherman and tributary territory for a fourth bank, and endeavored to defeat the granting of a charter for the fourth bank, in which they were unsuccessful. Negotiations appear to have been instituted with the gentlemen seeking to organize the new bank, to the effect that they should buy stock in the American Bank & Trust Company. It resulted in about the condition that those gentlemen agreed to do so, provided they could obtain a controlling interest in the bank, and that the men who were named as directors and officers in the proposed new bank should be directors in the American Bank & Trust Company. The appellee, Roberts, was cashier of the American Bank & Trust Company, and had a contract with that bank for the year 1918, at a salary of $3,000 for the year, or $250, payable each month. The purpose of buying the stock in the bank was to make Mr. Leslie president of the American Bank & Trust Company, Loving, cashier, and Simmons, an active vice president, with other parties on the board of directors, and it seems to have effected this purpose. The proposition above set out was made to Roberts. Mr. Dillard and his law partner, Mr. Hilton Head, who were active in the negotiations, owned stock in the American Bank & Trust Company, which they were desirous of selling, and were also the attorneys and directors in the Merchants' & Planters' Bank. The appellant, Mr. Edwards, was the cashier of the Commercial National Bank. There seems to have been a contract drawn in which the two banks, Merchants' & Planters' Bank and the Commercial Bank, were to guarantee the salary of appellee, provided he would retire. Mr. Roberts declined to accept their guarantee, on the ground that it would have to be ratified by the board of directors of the two banks, and that he might be accused of trying to create a trust, but he accepted the individual obligation of Mr. Dillard and of Mr. Edwards. The facts are sufficient to raise the issue that Roberts knew that the money to be paid him would likely be advanced by the two banks named to Dillard, and Edwards, and the facts are sufficient to show that Edwards did obtain the money paid by him, and expected to be paid by him, from the Commercial National Bank. The matter of Roberts starting another bank was discussed, but there was no agreement that he should not do so. The evidence would indicate that he represented that he expected to leave Sherman and possibly go to Oklahoma. Further than the circumstances above detailed, we find no agreement between the banks that the retiring officers should not start a fourth bank. The old officers of the American Bank & Trust Company sold their stock and retired from that bank, except Mr. Thompson, who was the active vice president. The gentlemen who were seeking to organize the new bank purchased about 1,400 shares of the stock of the American Bank & Trust Company, and its entire stock consisted of 2,000 shares. We believe this will be a sufficient statement of the facts and issues to discuss the propositions presented by appellant.

The trial court instructed a verdict for the appellee for the amount sued for, upon which judgment was rendered, and this action is assailed on several grounds as fundamental error, and by other special assignments.

[1] The first proposition presented is that, the promise to pay being upon condition that Loving, and his associates, engaged in organizing the Merchants' State Bank, would buy out the American Bank & Trust Company, and the facts showing that they did not buy out said bank, such promise was unenforceable. The contract reads:

"In case the pending arrangement is perfected, by which the gentlemen organizing the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank, and their associates, buy out the American Bank & Trust Company, and you retire from that company."

The contract was in the form of a proposition by F. C. Dillard and F. Z. Edwards to appellee, Roberts, which he accepted "The pending arrangement" was that, of the 2,000 shares of the American Bank & Trust Company, the gentlemen organizing the proposed bank should purchase a majority of the shares. Leslie was to be president, Loving, cashier, Simmons, active vice president, and others of their associates, directors.

Roberts, who was cashier, should sell his stock and "retire from that company" (American Bank & Trust Company). "Buy out" we think referred to the thing which there was yet then pending, arrangements to be perfected; that is, the controlling stock of the American Bank & Trust Company. This arrangement was perfected. The gentlemen who were organizing the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank became the officers of the American Bank & Trust Company, and appellee retired from that company. If, as contended by appellant, "buy out" is to be construed as buying the entire assets, change the name of the bank, move into other quarters, or, in other words, obliterate the American Bank & Trust Company, as an entity, then the clause that Roberts retire "from that company" was a useless provision. There would have been nothing to retire from. The significance of this clause clearly implies, after perfecting the then pending arrangements; the old bank would still be in existence, and the appellee as a stockholder, officer, and cashier should retire, and upon doing so he should not lose his salary contract, but the two gentlemen making the proposition would guarantee to him that they would pay it. This contract, read in the light of the circumstances then surrounding the parties, leaves no ground, as we conceive it, to doubt what was to be bought and what the proposers were guaranteeing. Roberts was not to lose the value of his contract as a cashier for the year, and they were guaranteeing him against loss in case the controlling interest placed Loving in his place by the arrangement which was then pending. By acquiring a majority of the stock such proportion of the title to the assets, franchises, name, and business were transferred to the men who were proposing the new organization. In that sense they purchased or bought out a controlling interest in the company. The company, as a company, without the consent of the stockholders, could not sell their stock or their interest in the bank. It is therefore manifest "buy out" as used in connection with the pending negotiations did not mean a transfer of the entire corpus of the concern, but only the interest therein then pending on negotiations. It is evident the contract did not contemplate a transfer to a new organization which might continue a similar business without incurring the liability of the old; that was not the arrangement then pending. The words "buy out" are qualified, both by the clauses preceding and following them, which are entitled to consideration in arriving at the meaning of the parties, as expressed in the contract. Without incorporating in the contract the pending arrangement, it referred to it in such way as it may certainly be known and ascertained, and when it is ascertained there remains no doubt as to the meaning of the term as used in the contract.

[2] A proposition is presented "that an agreement by a national bank to pay money to induce a cashier of another bank to give up his position is illegal, and the promise of appellant, growing out of such illegal contract, is void." The contract on its face to pay to appellant for his services shows to be by individuals and not by banks. The evidence shows that Dillard and his partner, Head, were stockholders in the American Bank & Trust Company, and were desirous of selling their stock therein. They were also attorneys and directors in the Merchants' & Planters' Bank. Edwards was the cashier of the Commercial National Bank, and, as we take it, had no interest in the American Bank & Trust Company. There is some evidence that would authorize the finding that his part of the obligation would be, and it was contemplated that it should be, paid out of the funds of the Commercial National Bank, and that Roberts knew that fact. Mr. Dillard paid his half of the amount agreed upon at once and upon the completion of the transfer. There is no evidence where he obtained the money—whether he advanced it from his individual funds or from the funds of the Merchants' & Planters' Bank. There is evidence which would lead to the inference that Roberts had reason to believe that the money would ultimately be paid by the two banks. He, however, refused an obligation from the two banks because he says the directors would have to pass on it to make it legal, and because he was afraid of being accused of trying to form a trust, that he expected to get his money from Mr. Dillard and Mr. Edwards, and that he did not know where they would get the money to pay. The evidence will also warrant the finding that the bank sought to defeat the proposed organizers in obtaining a charter for a new bank. The instrument in question does not purport to obligate either bank or to be the act of either bank. If the banks had no power to execute such an obligation, the contract in question would not be affected, for it was not the obligation of the banks, but the personal obligation of the persons signing it. We fail to see any reason why the rule of ultra vires the power of the banks should have application in his case. The obligation does not purport to be signed by the agents for the banks; they did not purport to bind any one but themselves. The mere fact that Roberts may have believed or have known that the individuals would get the money from the banks we do not think should affect the matter. It was no concern of his where they obtained the money so long as their obligation was with him to pay him the sum named.

[3, 4] Appellant also in this connection presents a proposition to the effect that his signature was for and on behalf of the bank. We do not think the jury would have been authorized to find that the Commercial National Bank was the undisclosed principal in the contract. The appellee refused to accept the bank's obligation, but demanded the personal obligation of the signers as the principals thereon. If, however, the evidence in this case is sufficient to have disclosed the bank as the principal in the contract, then the rule established in this state by the Supreme Court, in Heffron v. Pollard, 73 Tex. 96, 11 S. W. 165, 15 Am. St. Rep. 764, would apply, which is:

"If * * * the principal be disclosed, and the face of the writing shows that the agent is bound, it is presumed that the other party has elected in the contract * * * to look to the agent, and the principal is not liable upon it."

In this case we have not only the presumption, but the positive evidence, that the appellee would not accept the banks as the obligors. The cases cited by appellant of Fidelity, etc., v. Bank, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 301, 106 S. W. 782, Hanauer v. Woodruff, 15 Wall. 439, 21 L. Ed. 224, and Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. Ed. 468, we do not think applicable to the propositions here urged, and now under consideration. If it should be determined that the contract by which Roberts agreed to retire as cashier was part of a scheme or combination to form a trust in violation of the statutes, the two cases last cited would bear upon the question in ascertaining the validity of the contract in question.

[5] A proposition is presented:

"A contract having for its purpose the prevention of the establishment of another bank in a city is illegal and void, as being in restraint of instrumentalities of trade and as tending to destroy competition."

The proposition is not regarded as a correct proposition of law. If the contract fell under the class denominated as a combination of capital, skill, or acts, by two or more persons, etc., for the purposes of lessening competition in the aides to commerce, it might be a trust. If the acts of the three banks, the Merchants' & Planters' Bank, the Commercial National Bank, and the American Bank & Trust Company, were sufficient to establish a combination to enter into an agreement to keep out a fourth bank in the city of Sherman, it would not necessarily follow that the contract in question was void. Appellee had a valid contract with the American Bank & Trust Company for a year's salary as a cashier. This contract was legal, which he could enforce. To further the purpose of the parties buying out the stock of certain stockholders, and to place another man in as cashier, the proposition was to have appellee retire therefrom. If he should do so, his contract being an enforceable one, they doubtless recognized that he should be compensated. They agreed, therefore, to pay him a consideration for his contract. The consideration for the contract was not illegal, and the appellee shows he was not in any way combining with either or all of the said parties; he simply sold out, and they bought. They, it occurs to us, set up their illegal combination to defeat a valid contract based on a legal consideration. Appellant, by his contract, procured from appellee the surrender of a valid contract, in consideration of the execution and obligation which appellant now says he executed for an illegal purpose.

The case of Armstrong v. Toler, 11 Wheat. 258, 6 L. Ed. 469, cited by the appellant, was a case where goods had been consigned to Toler, belonging to Armstrong and others. The goods were shipped during the war with Great Britain in violation of the law. The goods were delivered to Toler as agent of Armstrong on a stipulation to abide the event of the suit, Toler becoming liable for the appraised value. Armstrong's goods were afterwards delivered to him on his promise to pay Toler his proportion for which Toler might be liable should the goods be condemned, and, the goods having been condemned, Toler paid their appraised value, and brought suit to recover from Armstrong. Armstrong resisted the demand on the ground that the contract was made upon an illegal consideration. The headnotes of that case give the rule as follows:

"But, if the promise be entirely disconnected with the illegal act, and is founded on a new consideration, it is not affected by the act, although it was known to the party to whom the promise was made, and although he was the contriver and conductor of the illegal act."

Chief Justice Marshall said in the course of the opinion, after discussing several cases:

"So Toler's knowledge of the illegal transactions of Armstrong, and that his money was advanced to procure the delivery of goods which had been illegally imported, could not vitiate a contract to repay that money." Floyd v. Patterson, 72 Tex. 202, 10 S. W. 526, 13 Am. St. Rep. 787; Russell v. Kidd, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 411, 84 S. W. 273; Smith v. Booty, 49 Tex. Civ. App. 628, 109 S. W. 979; also note, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) at page 482, where several Texas cases are cited.

The facts in this case show, if there was any combination, the appellee was not in it, or expected to be benefited by the fruits of the combine. He sold and they purchased his right, and he surrendered the legal claim as a consideration for the obligation sued upon. Whatever the purpose of the banks was, the appellee was not a participant therein; his money, skill, or acts were not united with the others, but held in severalty by him. Their illegal purpose could not make his rights, lawfully acquired, illegal.

[6] We are not inclined to think there was a combination such as denounced by the statute. It may be conceded that all three of the banks were interested in keeping out a fourth bank. So long as they did no illegal act, the act would not be denounced as a trust. They do not appear to have combined their capital, skill, and acts to prevent the establishment of another bank. At most, they advised and induced the old officers, directors, and stockholders in the American Bank & Trust Company to sell their stock to men who were seeking to organize a fourth bank. When that was accomplished it appears to have satisfied the ambition of those gentlemen, and, in so far as the record shows, they thereafter held their interest and their bank separate from the two other banks and were competitors. There was no agreement that the old stockholders should not start a new bank or assist in preventing the organization of another. Gates v. Hooper, 90 Tex. 563, 39 S. W. 1079; Schlag v. Johnson, 208 S. W. 369.

[7] It is asserted that the appellee having knowledge that the money which was promised on the obligation was to prevent a fourth bank and the organization of a fourth bank by him absolved appellant from the contract to pay the money. There is no such promise in the contract, and neither do we think there is sufficient evidence to find that there was a verbal agreement to that effect. Appellee says they evidently thought he could not start a new bank. It is doubtless true that the arrangement was made in the hope that there would not be another bank. We do not think the evidence sufficient to show there was a breach of an express or implied contract by the appellee, such as would defeat him in his action.

[8] The remaining assignments present substantially the proposition above discussed, and for the reasons heretofore given are overruled. We think there was no error in excluding the evidence of Judge Hare as to the action of the board of directors of the Commercial National Bank, directing Edwards to close a contract with Roberts, and that the bank would pay the money. We do not think such action could have affected the appellant's rights under his contract.

The judgment will be affirmed.

LEE et al. v. EMERSON-BRANTINGHAM IMPLEMENT CO. (No. 8366.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
April 24, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 22, 1920.)

1. Exemptions — 48(2)—Compensation agreed on after service "current wages," within exemption provision.

Under Const. art. 16, § 28 (Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 306), providing that current wages for personal service shall not be subject to garnishment, wage of $75 a month, totaling $300, agreed upon by widow and decedent's manager and brother as fair compensation to defendant for taking charge of decedent's business during his illness, was exempt as "current wages for personal service," though at time agreement for services was made no particular compensation was agreed on; purpose of the provision being to exempt wage until due and in possession of earner, provided, if he is unable to collect, exemption continues until he can collect, in exercise of ordinary diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Current Wages.]

2. Fraudulent conveyances — 51(1)—Creditors without interest in exempt property.

Creditors have no interest in exempt property of debtors, and cannot claim conveyance thereof is void, as fraudulent as to them.

3. Fraudulent conveyances — 87(2)—Delivery by insolvent of value in excess of debt fraudulent and void.

When insolvent debtor, in payment of pre-existing debt, delivers value in excess of debt, thus placing surplus beyond reach of creditors, conveyance is fraudulent in law, and void as to excess.

4. Fraudulent conveyances — 181(1) — Seller to insolvent debtor not liable to creditors for purchase money.

Where debtor with equivalent of money purchased oil lease from one who acted in good faith, though knowing debtor was insolvent, seller is not liable to debtor's creditors for money received on any theory of fraudulent conveyance.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County;
M. B. Muse, Judge.

Action by the Emerson-Brantingham Implement Company against R. H. Lee, wherein, after judgment for plaintiff, writ of garnishment was issued and served on the American National Insurance Company; defendant Lee and another intervening. From a judgment for plaintiff for the fund garnished, defendant and the other intervenor appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Scott & Fagan, of Dallas, for appellants.
Spence, Haven & Smithdeal, of Dallas, for appellee.

RASBURY, J. Appellee, having judgment against appellant R. H. Lee, by its agent made the statutory affidavit and procured the issuance and service of the writ of garnishment upon the American National Insurance Company, which in answer thereto admitted it was indebted to Lee $440.65. Lee intervened, and asserted, in substance, that the debt due him was exempt from garnishment because it represented wages for personal services rendered by him to W. T. and Leona Hicks, which they were unable to pay at the time, and in payment of which, after the death of W. T. Hicks, his wife, Leona, assigned that much of insurance on the life of her husband owing by the American National Insurance Company. Lee also asserted that before the service of the writ he had transferred his interest in said fund to Will Sayers. Sayers also intervened, and asserted that the fund assigned by Mrs. Hicks to Lee had been in turn assigned to him for value. Trial was by the court, resulting in judgment for appellee for the fund. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

The facts deducible from the evidence, which is not in conflict on essential matters, are in substance these: The American National Insurance Company was indebted to Leona C. Hicks in the amount of $5,000.67 on account of insurance policies on the life of her husband, W. T. Hicks. Before the debt was paid she assigned $440.65 thereof to Lee, and directed the insurance company to pay him that amount. Hicks, prior to his death, was in business in Dallas, and became seriously ill with a malady that required a surgical operation. He requested Lee to assume charge of his business, and agreed to compensate him for his labor. No stipulated period of employment or compensation was agreed on. Lee rendered service for a period of four months. Hicks died. After his death Lee reached an agreement with Mrs. Hicks, Hicks' manager and brother, that $75 per month, or a total of $300, was satisfactory compensation for the services he had rendered. That amount was covered by the assignment to the insurance company. The balance, $140.65, represented an indebtedness due Lee by Hicks—in fact, a part of the premium due on the policies of insurance Hicks had with the insurance company, and which Lee had induced him to take. One day before the service of the writ of garnishment upon the insurance company, Lee transferred his portion of the insurance fund to Sayers in payment of an oil lease in Wichita county, assigned by Sayers to him. The bona fides of the transfer was not assailed, though Sayers testified that when he transferred the lease he thought Lee's interest in the fund was $1,000, which Lee in his assignment to Sayers asserted it was. At the time of the transfer to Sayers by Lee, the latter was insolvent, and known to be so by Sayers.

[1] Section 28 of article 16 of the Constitution, which is also article 306 of Vernon's Sayles' Texas Civil Statutes, enacts that "current wages for personal service" shall not be subject to garnishment. It is the contention of appellant that the facts we have recited bring the money due Lee by the insurance company within the constitutional provision, while it is the contention of appellee that they do not. Appellee relies on the ruling in First National Bank, etc., v. Graham, 22 S. W. 1101, as support for its contention. The substance of the holding in that case was that "current wages" contemplated a sum to be paid for personal services as they were rendered, as by the hour, day, week, month, or year, and that the fee due an attorney for professional services in a single case was not such current wages for personal services. In the case at bar Lee was employed to and did perform personal services in conducting Hicks' business during his illness. That the services were rendered by him personally is not denied. There was, however, no agreement fixing the amount of the compensation or the period of employment, whether for an hour, day, week, or month. The agreement merely was that Hicks would compensate Lee, if he would render the service. Do such facts make the amount any the less exempt by the Constitution? We conclude not, in view of the holding in Dempsey v. McKennell, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 284, 23 S. W. 525. Dempsey, while ill, employed McKennell to nurse him. There was no agreement between the parties fixing either the period of employment or the compensation. On that issue the court declared:

"The mere circumstance that the rate of compensation is not agreed on in advance ought not * * * to take the case out of the exemption. In nursing [appellant], appellee was actually occupied by the day, and his right to compensation accrued as he served, being measured by customary or reasonable rates, rather than by express contract."

The facts in the case cited and the one at bar are practically identical, and comment as a consequence is unnecessary. Then, was the amount due Lee "current" at the time of service of garnishment? In First National Bank v. Graham, supra, "current" was said to mean "running; now passing, or present in its progress." In Bell v. Indian Live Stock Co., 11 S. W. 344, 3 L. R. A. 642, it was held that, when wages included in the provision are voluntarily left with the one owing them, they thereby lose their exemption; in short, cease to be current. It was said:

"The wages are payable monthly, and were exempt for the month current at the time of the service of the writ; but the exemption ceased to apply when the wages became past due."

The court further said in that case:

"Cases may arise, however, in which a party would not be entitled to the benefit of the writ of garnishment sued out after the wages became due."

The court did not, however, instance such a case. Subsequently, in the case of Davidson v. Logeman Chair Co., 41 S. W. 824, it was decided that, where the wages were involuntarily left with the employer because of inability to collect them, the exemption continued until the sum was collected, or remained current. Such was Lee's situation. He was unable to collect before the writ impounded the fund. The tendency of the decisions, it thus appears, and in our opinion the purpose of the constitutional provision, is to exempt the wage until it is due and is in possession of the wage-earner, provided that, if he is unable to collect same when due, the exemption then continues to such time when he can collect same in the exercise of ordinary diligence. We therefore conclude that $300 of the fund was exempt, and the court as a consequence erred in subjecting that amount to the writ of garnishment either against Lee or Sayers; for, if exempt, Lee's creditors had no right to the money because of Lee's insolvency and Sayers' knowledge of that fact.

[2, 3] The foregoing conclusion presents in natural order appellant's attack upon the finding of the court that Lee was notoriously insolvent, of which Sayers was cognizant at the time he accepted the transfer of the fund in payment of the oil lease and the court's conclusion of law in that connection that such transfer was a fraud on creditors. Such issue can, of course, only affect the fund to the amount of $140.65, for as we have indicated, and as is well settled, creditors have no interest in the exempt property of debtors. As we have shown in our statement of the facts, the bona fides of the sale of the lease by Sayers and the transfer of the fund by Lee in payment thereof is not denied. But because Lee was insolvent, and Sayers aware of it, the court was of opinion that the transfer was in law a fraud upon creditors. It has, of course, been repeatedly held, and is settled law, that when an insolvent debtor, in payment of a pre-existing debt, delivers property in value in excess of the debt, thereby placing the surplus beyond the reach of creditors, the conveyance is fraudulent in law and void as to the excess.

[4] The transaction between Lee and Sayers, however, is not, in our opinion, such a one. The most that can be said of it is that Lee, with the equivalent of money in hand, purchased an oil lease, as he might have purchased any other commodity he desired. We know no rule that denies another the right, in good faith, to sell his property to a known insolvent person, or of any rule that makes the seller liable to the purchaser's creditors for the money received in payment thereof, save in the class of cases first mentioned. Even in those cases when the pre-existing debt is genuine, and the debtor receives no more than sufficient to pay the debt, the transaction is not fraudulent. Bruce v. Koch, 94 Tex. 192, 59 S. W. 540. In the case at bar there is no showing that the oil lease was of any less value than the money Sayers received; in fact, the value set on the lease was $1,000, while the money paid was $440.65.

Holding the views above stated on the law of the case, and the facts being without conflict, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and judgment here rendered for appellant Sayers for the fund in dispute and all costs in this court and the court below.

Reversed and rendered.

GINNERS' MUT. UNDERWRITERS' ASS'N v. FISHER et al. (No. 1658.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 28, 1920. On Motion for Re-
hearing, June 2, 1920.)

1. Insurance ⇨131(1)—Entire contract may be oral, though application written.

An insurance contract may be entirely oral and is not objectionable as varying the terms of the written application for insurance.

2. Insurance ⇨130(3)—Distribution among items of property at insured's request held not a counter offer.

Where an applicant for fire insurance covering a cotton gin agreed with a soliciting agent that the company should distribute the insurance in the policy among various items of property particularly described therein, and the company did so and sent the policy to the applicant, such apportionment, if fairly made, could not, especially upon insurer's insistence, prevent the policy from being an acceptance instead of a counter offer to insure.

3. Insurance ⇨130(3)—That policy provides for payment to lienors held not to make it counter offer instead of acceptance.

Where an application for fire insurance covering a cotton gin did not directly specify that loss was to be payable to lienors as their interests might appear and the policy as written provided for payment of loss to such lienors, such fact did not make the policy a counter offer not binding until acceptance by insured; there being no variance in fact between the application and the policy, and the application not being presumed to contain all the details of the policy.

4. Insurance ⇨130(7)—Retention of fire policy without opposition beyond reasonable time held acceptance.

Where a fire insurance policy was delivered to insured for his acceptance, as insurer claimed, and was retained by insured without objection beyond a reasonable time, such retention constituted an acceptance of the policy, even if the policy be construed to constitute a counter offer and not an acceptance of an offer contained in the application for insurance.

5. Insurance ⇨668(15)—Waiver of payment of premium by insurer held for jury.

In an action on a fire insurance policy covering a cotton gin, where it appeared that the policy had been delivered together with a bill for the first premium which had not been paid prior to the fire, evidence held to make the issue of waiver of payment by insurer a question for the jury.

6. Insurance ⇨141(2)—Payment of first premium waived by unconditional delivery of policy.

Unconditional delivery of a policy, by its terms requiring payment of the premium as a condition precedent to its taking effect, is sufficient to constitute a waiver of such term; it being presumed from such delivery that the insurer intended to extend at least a temporary credit to insured.

7. Insurance ⇨136(3) — Delivery of policy held not made conditional by agreement to return policy if not satisfactory.

Where a fire insurance policy was delivered to insured on condition that it should be promptly returned if not satisfactory, with bill for premium inclosed with request for remittance if the policy was satisfactory, the condition was not one of payment and did not have the effect of making the delivery of the policy conditional.

Error from District Court, Collin County; T. E. Wilcox, Judge.

Action by R. C. Fisher against the Ginnings' Mutual Underwriters' Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Locke & Locke, of Dallas, for plaintiff in error.

White, Cartledge & Wilcox, of Austin, and E. W. Merritt, of McKinney, for defendant in error.

BOYCE, J. Defendant in error, R. C. Fisher, brought this suit, on a fire insurance policy, issued by the plaintiff in error, the Ginnings' Mutual Underwriters' Association, insuring a gin owned by the said R. C. Fisher against loss by fire. The defendant pleaded that it was not liable because there was no completed contract of insurance, in that the policy of insurance referred to as being issued by it had not been accepted by the plaintiff, and further because it was provided by the terms of the application for insurance, the by-laws of the association, and the policy itself, that the insurance "should not become effective until the premium is paid," and the said premium had not been paid on the policy issued, as required. The plaintiff, in a supplemental petition, alleged that the said policy was delivered and accepted by him so as to become a completed and binding contract, and that the defendant waived the provision of the contract requiring prepayment of the premium. The policy contained a provision that loss should be payable to the Walter Tipps Company and the Gillett Gin Company, as their interests might appear. Such parties held liens on parts of the property and were brought into the suit for the purpose of having their interests determined. Judgment was rendered for the amount of the face of the policy and part of the judgment made payable to one of the said lienholders, the other one disclaiming.

On August 23, 1916, the insurance association's agent approached the said R. C. Fisher, and solicited insurance on his gin, situated at Frisco, Tex. The said agent was only a soliciting agent and could not himself write the insurance, his duties being to secure applications for insurance and transmit them to the company for issuance of the policy thereon in the event the application should be approved. The said R. C. Fisher signed and delivered to the said agent a written application for insurance. This application did not state the rate of the premium, the amount of insurance desired, nor how it was to be distributed as to the buildings and the machinery therein, which were to be covered in separate items by the policy. There were no blanks in the form of the insurance application for such statements. The application did contain questions, answers to which were filled in by the said Fisher and the agent, which called for a description of the various items of property to be covered by insurance, the value thereof, etc. The application also called for information as to liens on the property and the names of the holders thereof. The soliciting agent informed plaintiff that the company would not insure the property for more than $5,000, and it was understood in effect that the policy was to be for this amount if the company was willing to insure it for said sum. It was also understood that the company would distribute the insurance in the policy that would be issued. The agent informed the plaintiff that the rate would be about 3 per cent. A form of the policy which was subsequently issued was written on the same paper with the application and preceded it. This form of policy purported to be a "standard fire insurance policy form." The application was forwarded to the secretary of the company at Tyler, Tex., by the soliciting agent, in a letter written by him, which contained the statement that the applicant wanted $5,000 insurance, and which gave a description of the property and the value of the items thereof. The secretary of the company thereupon issued a policy on the property for $5,000, distributing the amount on various items of the property, particularly described in the policy. The rate named in the policy was 3 per cent. It was dated August 24, 1916, and was for the term of one year from date. A description of the items of property with the statement of the amount of insurance thereon was contained in a sheet termed "Cotton Gin Form," attached to this policy. This form contained an agreement that the loss should be payable to the Walter Tipps Company and Gillett Gin Company, as their interests might appear, and also contained other warranties in respect to providing means for the protection against and control of fire on the premises. This form was not attached to the form of policy on the application at the time it was signed by Fisher. The secretary of the company sent this policy, duly signed and attested, to the plaintiff, by mail, on August 28th, and inclosed therewith a letter addressed to the plaintiff of said date, reading as follows:

"We have your application of the 23rd instant to our Mr. Allison, and in reply we are handing you herewith policy No. 41649, for $5,000.00, for the year ending August 24, 1917, and bill for the premium, $150.00, which amount you will please remit to us if the policy is satisfactory; if it is not satisfactory kindly return it promptly and oblige."

The bill referred to was in part as follows:

Statement.

Tyler, Tex., August 24, 1916.

Mr. R. C. Fisher, Frisco, in account with the Ginnery's Mutual of Texas, for fire insurance policy No. 41649, for $5,000.00.

To premium due on above policy, $150.00.

The policy was duly received by the plaintiff. He was very busy at the time and merely glanced over a part of it, but considered it satisfactory, and placed it on his desk as a reminder that he should remit the premium when he should have the time to attend to it. Remittance was not made, and no further communication passed between the parties until the gin was destroyed by fire September 17th. The jury found in answer to special issues submitted that the policy was accepted by plaintiff as satisfactory; that he received and inspected the policy and intended to keep it and pay the premium thereon; and that the defendant waived the provision of the policy to the effect that it should not become a binding contract upon either party until the first premium was paid, and intended to extend credit to plaintiff for the premium due if said policy was satisfactory and accepted by plaintiff, upon its receipt.

The assignments presented are to the effect that there was no evidence sufficient to authorize the submission of any issue to the jury, and that the plaintiff in error was entitled to a peremptory instruction for the reasons already referred to in the statement of the pleading: (1) That there was no completed contract; and (2) that the policy was not effective because the premium had not been paid. The argument made in support of the first contention is that the offer made by the plaintiff in the application for insurance was not sufficiently definite to create a contract by the mere acceptance thereof, because such offer did not contain the essentials of a definite contract, in that the amount of insurance, the rate, the distribution thereof on the specific items and the beneficiaries, were not stated; that the policy therefore constituted an offer because it first contained definite provisions as to elements on which it was essential that the minds of the parties should meet before a contract could be made, and also because the policy varied from the terms of the offer; that since the policy was not the acceptance of an offer, but the offer itself, it was necessary that it be accepted and such acceptance communicated to the insurance company before the contract could be completed. If we are to be confined to the written application to ascertain the terms of the offer, it is true that the application does not contain all of the essential terms of the contract, so that its mere acceptance might complete the contract; but we think that the oral understanding had between the plaintiff and the soliciting agent may be considered as a part of the application. There is no requirement of law that the application for insurance be in writing. Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, p. 409, and Supplement, § 409a.

[1, 2] It is well settled in this state that the entire insurance contract may be oral. Such oral understandings are not objectionable because they vary the terms of the written application, in this case, since they were in reference to matters with which the application did not attempt to deal; and the very fact that the application contains no reference to essential elements of the contract shows that it was not intended to be the sole expository of the negotiations for insurance up to the point of communication of the application, or offer for insurance, to the company. The understanding that the applicant wanted insurance in the sum of $5,000, that the company was to distribute the amount of insurance on the various items of property, the description of which with its value was given in the application, and that the rate of insurance would be about 3 per cent., are therefore to be taken as a part of the application. But plaintiff in error insists that the agreement that the company should distribute the insurance would prevent the policy which did so apportion the insurance from being an acceptance. We do not think so if the apportionment were fairly made, and it certainly would not be permissible for the company to insist that it was not.

[3] The plaintiff in error also contends that the provision for payment of loss to the Walter Tipps Company and the Gillett Gin Company, as their interests might appear, is at variance from the terms of the offer and constitutes the policy a counter offer. The policy was delivered as being in compliance with the offer, and it might again be answered that the plaintiff in error cannot with good grace claim that its terms constitute a variance from the terms of the offer. But we do not think it is necessarily a variance. The application is not presumed to contain the details of the provisions of the policy.

"The application is for such insurance on such terms and conditions as, in view of the particulars submitted, the company sells. It is to be presumed that, as in other cases, the purchaser has made himself acquainted with what he is purchasing. On the delivery of the policy, therefore, the contract becomes complete without any further assent on the part of the insured. Possibly, if the policy contains any extraordinary provisions such as are not generally or often found in policies, the insured on receiving it might have a right to rescind." Commonwealth Mutual Fire Insurance Co. v. Knabe, 171 Mass. 265, 50 N. E. 516.

[4] The provision for loss payable to lienholders is not unusual, and, when the application disclosed the existence of such lienholders, the applicant might be held to have impliedly assented to the insertion in the policy of such provision as the company usually inserted in the policy in such cases. Our statutes provide that the insurance commission shall establish, and the insurance company shall use, uniform policies, applicable to the various risks. Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4901. This provision of the statute would, we take it, apply to mutual companies, article 4907k. If this be true, it is to be presumed that the form used, including this provision of the policy, was that prescribed by the insurance commission, and that all the parties contracted in reference to it. But, even if the terms of the offer were incomplete, because the matter of the apportionment of the insurance was left to the company, or if it be true that the policy did not conform strictly to the terms of the offer, yet we think that the retention of the policy without objection and beyond a reasonable time would constitute an acceptance thereof. Joyce on Insurance, §§ 55b, 66g, 66i; Cooley's Briefs on Insurance pp. 457 and 459; same sections in Supplement; Ribble v. Roberts, 180 S. W. 620; Sheldon v. Atlantic Fire Insurance Co., 26 N. Y. 460, 84 Am. Dec. 213; Swing v. Marion Pulp Co., 47 Ind. App. 199, 93 N. E. 1004; Rommel v. Griffin, 81 Ark. 269, 99 S. W. 70. The policy was sent to plaintiff on his order and as in fulfillment of its terms. Under such circumstances, the applicant for the policy is not in the same position as one to whom goods have been sent without solicitation on his part, as suggested by plaintiff in error in argument; but his position is analogous to that of the purchaser to whom goods have been sent on order, in which case the recipient of the goods is bound to object within a reasonable time to the goods as not meeting the requirements of his order, otherwise the silent retention of them will be considered as an acceptance. Mechem on Sales, §§ 1374 and 1380.

[5-7] As to the other proposition relied on by appellant, that the policy was not effective because the premium was not paid, we think the evidence sufficient to make an issue of waiver. The application and policy contained the provision as pleaded, but it is not questioned that this provision of the application and the policy might be waived, and the authorities all agree that the unconditional delivery of the policy, which by its terms required payment of the premium as a condition to its taking effect, is sufficient to constitute a waiver of such term; it being presumed from such delivery that the insurer intended to extend at least a temporary credit to the insured. United Benefit Association v. Lawson, 133 S. W. 907; 25 Cyc. pp. 726, 727; Joyce on Insurance, §§ 76 and 79; Cooley's Briefs on Insurance, pp. 482 and 507, and Supplement, §§ 482 and 507. But the plaintiff in error contends that the delivery was conditional. We must look to the terms of the letter accompanying the delivery to determine whether this is true, for, if the provision in the policy itself made the delivery conditional, then there could never be an unconditional delivery of such policy, and the rule stated would be a futile announcement. We have already quoted the letter referred to. The only condition attached to the finality of the delivery is that the policy should be promptly returned if not satisfactory. This condition is not one of payment. As we have seen, a retention of the policy beyond a reasonable time completes the delivery and acceptance. The inclosing of the bill for the premium, with the request that remittance be made if the policy is satisfactory, is not a statement of condition of delivery itself. It is merely a request for payment of the premium that would become due upon the complete acceptance of the policy. We think this issue was properly one for submission to the jury. Sheldon v. Atlantic Fire Insurance Co., supra.

These holdings, as announced, dispose of all the assignments of error, and result in the affirmance of the judgment.

On Motion for Rehearing.

We may possibly have been mistaken in the conclusion that the provisions of article 4891, R. S., are applicable to mutual companies. See Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, arts. 4907k and 4902. The conclusion is not essential to a decision of the case, and we withdraw it.

We are of the opinion that we correctly disposed of the assignments in our former consideration of the case, and the motion for rehearing will be overruled.

SCHAFF et al. v. MASON et al. (No. 2275.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 26, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 3, 1920.)

1. Railroads \S 400(10)—Contributory negligence of pedestrian on footpath held for jury.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by locomotive while walking along pathway running parallel with track, contributory negligence held a question for the jury.

2. Railroads \S 265 — Railway company not proper or necessary party in negligence action against receiver.

In a negligence action against railroad in hands of receiver, the railway company is neither a proper nor necessary party to such action.

3. Costs \S 237—On dismissal on defendant's appeal from judgment for plaintiff, costs taxed against plaintiff.

In negligence action against railroad and receiver thereof, where Court of Civil Appeals, on appeal by receiver and railroad from judgment for plaintiff, dismisses action as to railroad on ground that it was not a necessary or proper party, the costs incurred by the railroad will be taxed against plaintiff, though judgment is affirmed as to receiver.

Appeal from District Court, Cass County;
J. A. Ward, Special Judge.

Action by Mrs. Fannie Mason and others against C. E. Schaff, receiver, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as reformed.

J. H. Mason was killed by a passenger locomotive while walking to the depot in a pathway running parallel with the railway track. The wife and minor children of Mr. Mason bring the suit to recover damages for his alleged wrongful death. The negligence alleged is failure to give warning of the approach of the train. The defendants answered by general denial and contributory negligence of the deceased.

The jury made answers to special issues that appellants were guilty of negligence as alleged, and that the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence, and that damages were suffered in the sum specified in the verdict.

At the time the deceased was killed, he was going east to the depot at Hughes Springs to meet the east-bound train. He was struck in the back by the pilot of the engine and instantly killed. At the time he was struck he was not far from the depot, walking in a pathway between the main line and the house track which had been for a long time habitually used by the public in going to and returning from the depot. At some places the pathway approached near the ties of the main line track, and deceased was near the ties. He was not walking between the rails. The track is straight for something like a half mile from the depot east. Approaching the depot the track is slightly downgrade. The house track was filled up with cars. A freight train headed west was standing near by on the passing track, and was making considerable noise. There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the whistle was blown and the bell rung before the deceased was struck. The jury finding is that the bell was not rung and the whistle was not blown. There is evidence to show that the engineer and fireman were in a position to readily see, and that they did in fact see, the deceased before he was struck, and that they knew that he did not either see or know of the approaching train behind him. The train could have been stopped in time to avoid injuring deceased after his peril was discovered. There is evidence to support the findings of the jury on the special issues submitted to them, and such findings are here adopted as the findings of fact.

Schluter & Singleton, of Jefferson, for appellants.

S. P. Jones, of Marshall, for appellees.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is insisted by appellants that the deceased met his death as a proximate result of his own negligence. Considering all the facts and circumstances in evidence, it is thought that there was an issue of fact to be decided by the jury as to whether or not the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. And the evidence was such, we think, as to authorize a finding by the jury in favor of the appellees on that point. Therefore assignments of error Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6 are overruled.

Reversible error is not warranted under the seventh assignment of error if the other findings, as they do, authorize the judgment rendered by the court. Hill v. Hoeldtke, 104 Tex. 594, 142 S. W. 871, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 672.

The deceased was a comparatively young man and had a long expectancy of life. The money he earned and the value of the farm products raised by him authorized the amount of the verdict. The verdict is not excessive, and therefore assignment of error No. 8 should be overruled.

[2] We concluded that the railway company as such was not a proper or necessary party to this suit, and that the judgment against the railway company as such should be reformed so as to dismiss them from the suit.

The question raised in the second assignment of error has been heretofore determined against the contention made by the appellants. Lancaster v. Keebler, 217 S. W. 1117. The judgment in this case expressly protects the receiver in the payment of the claim.

[3] The judgment as reformed eliminating the railway company is affirmed. The costs incurred by the railway company as such are taxed against the appellees.

FT. WORTH & D. C. RY. CO. et al. v.
THOMPSON. (No. 1667.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
May 19, 1920.)

1. Railroads \S 484(6) — Contributory negligence in stacking fodder near track held question for jury.

Evidence that plaintiff stacked kaffir corn about 125 feet from a railroad track, that it was of a dry and inflammable character, and not protected from sparks, requires the submission of the issue of contributory negligence in an action for the burning of the corn.

2. Railroads \S 459(2)—Practice of stacking fodder near track does not lessen contributory negligence.

The fact that plaintiff had for several years previously stacked inflammable fodder on his own premises so near a railroad track as to show contributory negligence gives no prescriptive right as against the railroad company to stack it there, since the railroad company could not object, nor does it lessen plaintiff's negligence in similarly stacking the fodder which burned.

3. Railroads \S 466 — Doctrine of discovered peril held inapplicable to fire.

Knowledge by a railroad company that fodder is stacked near its tracks without protection from sparks does not render it liable under the doctrine of discovered peril for failure to use care to prevent the escape of sparks.

4. Railroads \S 481(2)—Evidence that fodder had been stacked in same place previously is incompetent.

In an action for burning fodder where the railroad pleaded contributory negligence in stacking the fodder near the track without protection, the admission of evidence that plaintiff had similarly stacked fodder on the same premises for years before time of the fire was inadmissible.

5. Trial \S 350(2) — Issue as to evidentiary facts need not be submitted.

Special issues requested which called for answer as to evidentiary facts were properly refused.

6. Trial \S 351(5) — Issues already covered need not be submitted.

Special issues requested which were sufficiently covered by a special issue already submitted need not be given.

7. Trial ¶214—Refusal to give correct request on care to prevent fire is erroneous.

Where the judge did not define the rights and duties of the railroad company in the operation of its engine in respect to preventing the escape of fire, the refusal of a correct requested instruction covering that issue would be error.

8. Appeal and error ¶216(4)—A correct request calls for correct charge on issue not covered, but not for more specific charge.

A requested instruction, though defective, is sufficient to require the submission of a correct charge on an issue made by the pleadings and evidence which has not been submitted at all; but, if the issue has been submitted generally, the party wishing a more specific charge must submit a correct instruction in order to be entitled to complain on appeal.

9. Trial ¶260(7) — Court should correctly charge railroad's duty to prevent fire in addition to general negligence.

Since certain facts establish prima facie negligence by a railroad in causing a fire, the court should submit the defense of proper equipment and operation of the engine setting out the fire, notwithstanding it had already submitted generally the issues of negligence and contributory negligence.

Appeal from Donley County Court: W. T. Link, Judge.

Action by J. A. Thompson against the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Thompson, Barwise, Wharton & Hiner, of Ft. Worth, E. A. Simpson, of Amarillo, and R. H. Beville, of Clarendon, for appellants.

A. T. Cole, of Clarendon, for appellee.

BOYCE, J. Appellee brought suit against the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company and Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, to recover damages for the burning of 73 tons of kaffir corn, pummies, cornshucks, etc., alleged to have been set on fire by sparks thrown from an engine operated on the line of road of the defendant railway company, while said property was under the control and operation of said Walker D. Hines, under authority of the Congress of the United States and proclamation of the President. It is alleged that said kaffir corn was stacked on property owned or controlled by the plaintiff, about 200 feet from the right of way of the railway company, and that the defendants, through the negligent operation of an engine near said stacks of feed, permitted sparks to be ejected from said engine, starting a fire which consumed said feed. The defendants answered, denying that they set out said fire, and specially answered that the engine in question was equipped with the best approved spark arresters and devices for preventing the escape of fire, and that such appliances were in proper condition, and the engine was being properly handled at the time. The defendants further pleaded that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in placing said kaffir corn and other feed which was of a dry and inflammable character, in such close proximity to the tracks of the railway company without covering same or otherwise protecting it from the danger of ignition from sparks from passing engines. A trial resulted in a joint judgment for the plaintiff against the railway company and the said Walker D. Hines, Director General.

[1-4] The first assignment is to the action of the court in permitting the plaintiff to show that the premises on which this feed was stacked at the time had been used for such purposes for a period of four years before the time of the fire. We are not informed on what theory this testimony was admitted. The evidence showed that the stacks in question were about 125 feet from the nearest track of the railway company; that such feed was of a dry, inflammable character, and was not protected in any way from sparks that might be thrown out by passing engines. Such facts were shown as would require the submission of an issue of contributory negligence under the law as now settled by the decision of the Supreme Court, in the case of Railway Co. v. Arey, 107 Tex. 366, 179 S. W. 860, L. R. A. 1916B, 1065. The feed stacks were not on the property of the railway company, and it could have taken no action to prevent such use of the premises. The plaintiff had the right during all such time to use said premises for such purpose and could acquire no rights against the railway company on any theory of consent or acquiescence by it in such use. If the plaintiff were guilty of negligence in the first place, in placing property of this character in such proximity to the tracks of the railway company, the long continuance of such negligence did not change the character of the act. Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. Snell, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 413, 106 S. W. 173; Thompson on Law of Negligence, § 7882. Nor could the knowledge of the fact on the part of the railway company that the stacks were in close proximity to its tracks, and in danger of being set on fire, impose on it an added liability on application of the doctrine of discovered peril, for it has been expressly held that the law of discovered peril has no application in such case. Morgan Bros. v. M., K. & T. Ry. Co., 108 Tex. 331, 193 S. W. 134. We think the testimony was inadmissible and calculated to have a harmful effect in the consideration of the case by the jury.

[5] There was no error in refusing to give the first and second special issues requested by the defendant. These call for answers as to evidentiary facts.

[6] The issues requested and referred to in the fourth and fifth assignments were sufficiently covered by the third special issue submitted.

[7, 8] The defendants introduced evidence to the effect that the engine which it was claimed set out the fire was equipped with the most approved appliances for preventing the escape of fire; that these were in good order; and that the engine was being properly handled at the time—and thus established, if the jury should have believed the evidence offered, a complete defense to the cause of action. The defendants requested the submission of an issue and charge in connection therewith, which was sufficient to call the court's attention to their desire to have this defense submitted, but which was incorrect in some particulars, which we need not name. The sixth assignment is to the refusal of the court to submit this issue and charge in connection therewith. The court in his charge gave the ordinary definition of negligence and submitted an issue as to whether the defendant, by the operation of its locomotive, set fire to plaintiff's feed, and as to whether such action on the part of the defendant railway company was "negligence" as that term had been defined. There was nothing in the charge defining the rights and duties of the railway company in the operation of its engine in respect to preventing the escape of fire therefrom. We do not doubt that, if the instruction and issue requested in connection therewith had been correct, then this assignment would present reversible error, for unquestionably the defendants had the right to have this defense presented to the jury. It is the rule, as we understand it, that, if an issue made by the pleadings and evidence has not been submitted at all, a requested instruction, though defective, is sufficient to call the court's attention to the matter and require the submission of a correct charge on the issue. But if the issue has been submitted generally, the party wishing a more specific charge must submit a correct instruction in order to be entitled to complain on appeal.

[9] Of course, it may be said that in this case the ultimate issue of liability, aside from the special defense of contributory negligence, was one of negligence on the part of the railway company, and that the submission of the issue of negligence generally covered this defense of the proper equipment and operation of the engine, setting out the fire. However, the law of these cases is different from that of the ordinary case of negligence, in that the court in charging the law may tell the jury that certain facts make a prima facie case of negligence and that certain other facts rebut this case so made, so that the real issues to be determined by a jury in such cases are as to whether the fire was set by the railway company and whether the railway company had met the requirements of the law as to the equipment and handling of its engines. By the submission of a general issue of negligence without any instructions in connection therewith, as to the law applicable to this character of case, the jury was without any practical information to guide them in their decision of the facts. While only ultimate issues are to be submitted, the court ought to so frame them, or the charges given in connection therewith, as to apply to the concrete facts of the particular case. In view of our reversal of the case on other grounds, we need not decide whether we would be required to reverse the case on this assignment, but have indicated our views as to the matter for guidance of the court upon another trial.

It is contended by appellant that the court erred in entering judgment against the railway company. It has been held in a number of cases that no judgment can be rendered against a railway company for damages inflicted in the operation of the railway property by the Director General. Baker v. Bell, 219 S. W. 245; G. H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Wurzbach, 219 S. W. 252; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. K. L. Wallace, 224 S. W. —, not yet reported; Mardis v. Hines, Director General (D. C.) 258 Fed. 945; Haubert v. B. & O. Ry. Co. (D. C.) 259 Fed. 361; Hatcher & Snyder v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co. (D. C.) 258 Fed. 952; Shumacker v. Pennsylvania Railway Co., 106 Misc. Rep. 564, 175 N. Y. Supp. 84. We have not ourselves undertaken an exhaustive consideration of the question, but would be disposed to follow the decisions of the other Courts of Civil Appeals and general trend of the decisions of other courts.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

MARTIN et al. v. MARTIN. (No. 2235.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 27, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 3, 1920.)

1. Evidence §419(2)—Recital of deed as to consideration contractual and subject to parol evidence rule.

Recital, in deed of father and stepmother to their son, that it was in consideration of his relinquishment of all the claim which he might have at any time in the future to any estate which they might have, held contractual in the sense that it was subject to the parol evidence rule.

2. Estoppel §22(2)—Recital as to consideration held relinquishment of claims by grantee's son.

Recital, in deed of father and stepmother to son, that it was in consideration of his relinquishment of all the claim which he might have at any time in the future to any estate they might have, held to mean that the acceptance of the deed by the son was to operate as a relinquishment by him of all claims which he then had or might have in the future to property then owned by his father.

3. Estoppel \Rightarrow 22(2)—Recital constituting relinquishment by grantee's son estopped him to claim father's other land.

Where a son accepted from his father and stepmother deed reciting that it was in consideration of his relinquishment of all claim which he might have at any time in the future to their estate, such son was estopped by the recital to assert title in himself to any part of the land of the father not conveyed to him.

Appeal from District Court, Cass County; H. F. O'Neal, Judge.

Suit by W. A. Martin and others against Rufe Martin. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiffs.

Gus Martin and Rufe Martin were the only children of J. L. Martin and his wife, Mary, who died about 1880. J. L. Martin and his said wife owned as a part of the community estate between them (it is inferred from the testimony in the record) a tract of land, which he sold after her death for about $600. Afterward, while he was a widower, said J. L. Martin purchased a tract of 160 acres. By a deed dated April 5, 1889, he, joined by his then wife, he having married again, conveyed 80 acres of this tract to his son Rufe, "in consideration," it was recited in the deed, "of his relinquishment of all the claim which he may have at any time in the future to any estate which we may have." Gus Martin died in 1886, leaving appellants W. A. Martin, Minnie Martin, and Dollie Puckett, his only children, surviving him. Afterwards said J. L. Martin died, leaving surviving him his widow, his son Rufe, and the children named above of his son Gus. The widow died in 1918. This suit was by said children of Gus Martin, appellants here, against Rufe Martin, appellee, to try the title to the 80 acres remaining of said 160 acres tract after 80 acres thereof was conveyed to Rufe Martin as stated, which said J. L. Martin owned when he died. The theory on which appellants claimed the entire 80 acres, instead of an undivided one-half thereof, was that it conclusively appeared from the deed and recital therein set out above that the conveyance of the 80 acres to appellee was an advancement to him by J. L. Martin out of his estate which was intended by said J. L. Martin to be and was accepted by appellee as being in full satisfaction of every claim appellee then had and of every claim he might thereafter have against said J. L. Martin or his estate, and that appellee therefore was estopped to assert title in himself to any part of the estate owned by J. L. Martin at his death. Appellee denied that his acceptance of the deed had such effect; and alleged, and over appellants' objection was permitted to adduce testimony which tended to prove, that, while J. L. Martin had conveyed the 80 acres to him, said Martin had before that time conveyed or had one Kizer to convey a tract to Gus Martin, which with the improvements thereon was of greater value than the 80 acres; and further that both the conveyance to him and the conveyance to Gus Martin were intended only to be in satisfaction of claims they respectively had against said J. L. Martin on account of the interest of their mother in the community estate between her and said J. L. Martin which he had appropriated to his own use. The trial was to the court without a jury. The appeal is from a judgment determining that appellants owned an undivided one-half and appellee the other undivided one-half of the land, and directing a partition thereof between them.

Hugh Carney, of Atlanta, for appellants.
O'Neal & Allday, of Atlanta, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above.) [1-3] We agree with appellants that the recital in the deed to Rufe Martin set out in the statement above was contractual in the sense that it was subject to the parol evidence rule (17 Cyc. 567 et seq.; Kahn v. Kahn, 94 Tex. 114, 58 S. W. 825); and further that the plain meaning of the recital was that the acceptance by Rufe Martin of the deed containing it was to operate as a relinquishment by him of every claim he then had and of every claim he thereafter might have to property then owned by J. L. Martin and to property which said J. L. Martin thereafter might acquire. And, while there are plausible reasons and respectable authorities which support a contrary view of the question, we also agree with appellants that Rufe Martin having accepted said deed was estopped by said recital from asserting title in himself to a part of the land in controversy. 1 R. C. L. 673; In re Simon, 158 Mich. 256, 122 N. W. 544, 17 Ann. Cas. 723, and note page 725 et seq.; Daggett v. Barre, 135 S. W. 1099; Barre v. Daggett, 105 Tex. 572, 153 S. W. 120. The doctrine approved by the greater weight of the authorities, and which we think is supported by the better reasons, is stated in 1 R. C. L. 673, cited above, as follows:

"It is common for a child, on receiving an advancement, to release his right to any further distributive share in the donor's estate. It is now generally recognized therefore that when a child accepts and uses an advancement given and received as his full distributive share of the estate he is estopped from denying the express conditions contained in the instrument by virtue of which he received it. If he does not want to be bound thereby, he should not receive it. Whether the arrangement is called a contract not to take, or release to take effect in the future, the principle is the same. When the estate is cast by the death of the ancestor, it operates to estop the heir to take what he has agreed he will not claim. The justice of the rule is apparent. Sometimes the present use of a certain sum is worth more to a child than the uncertain prospect of sharing in a parent's estate, although the future share may, in the end, amount to many times its present value. Therefore the law kindly permits child and parent, taking into consideration the estate of the parent, the uncertainty of life, the precarious nature of property and wealth and the ages, necessities, and surroundings of both, to fix on a certain amount which, received by the child, shall be deemed equivalent at the time of the receipt thereof to a full distributive portion of the parent's estate at the time of his death. Another reason given is that it must be presumed that the parent relied upon the agreement and release, and but for it would have made a will; and that the child should be compelled to abide by his promise and thus prevent the just expectations of the parent from being disappointed. To the suggestion that a considerable inequality of interest may be, in fact, the result of accepting an advancement as in full for the statute share, it has been replied that in most cases it is uncertain whether any advancement will not result in inequality. The ancestor, after advancing a child or children, may accumulate or may lose property, or other children may be born, and thereby the whole theory of equality of distribution will be upset. * * * The release need not be executed with any greater formality than a simple contract, and there is no necessity for its being executed under seal. It is not even essential that a child shall sign a deed from his father which contains an agreement relinquishing any further right to share in the father's estate. By accepting the deed and entering into the enjoyment of the property thereby transferred he estops himself from thereafter claiming a further share of his father's estate."

The judgment will be reversed, and judgment will be here rendered for appellants for all the land they sued for.

THEUBER v. MAREK et al. (No. 2272.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. May 6, 1920.)

1. Evidence \S 222(10)—Ex parte statement of defendant in cross-action inadmissible on plaintiff's behalf.

An ex parte statement under oath by a defendant, brought in by the original defendant under an order obtained by the original defendant, is inadmissible in behalf of plaintiff against the original defendant.

2. Bills and notes \S 104—Money wrongfully obtained from another is good consideration for notes in payment thereof.

Money fraudulently or wrongfully obtained from another by the maker of a note is good consideration for promissory notes, chattel mortgages, and the delivery of property in payment thereof.

3. Appeal and error \S 1050(1) — Bills and notes \S 104—Admission of incompetent evidence held prejudicial; father and son liable on note procured by threat of prosecution for money wrongfully obtained by son.

Where a son fraudulently or wrongfully obtained property from another, both the father and the son are liable on notes and chattel mortgages executed by them in payment of the sums so obtained, though they were executed under threat of criminal prosecution, so that the admission of an incompetent ex parte statement that the son did not obtain the money wrongfully was error prejudicial to defendant in an action to cancel note.

Appeal from District Court, Burleson County; R. J. Alexander, Judge.

Action by F. F. Marek and another against Ed Theuber, in which the defendant made one Philp a party defendant. Judgment for plaintiffs and for the original defendant against the defendant Philp on the cross-action, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The action is by F. F. Marek and his son, Ed Marek, against the appellant Ed Theuber, to cancel two notes aggregating $2,200 and the two chattel mortgages executed to secure the same, and to recover $170 in money paid and the value of certain live stock delivered to the appellant. It is alleged in the petition that the notes, mortgages, money, and cattle were obtained from the appellees by wrongful representations and duress by means of threats of a criminal prosecution. The appellant answered by general denial, and by cross-action pleaded that the money, notes, mortgages, and personal property were voluntarily paid, executed and delivered to him for money belonging to him which was illegally used and converted by Ed Marek and one Philp, acting together to defraud him, and prayed for judgment for the debt and foreclosure of the mortgages. The defendant made Philp a party defendant to the suit, and asked for personal judgment against him for $5,000, alleged to be money of the defendant's in the possession of Philp and to have been converted by him. The case was submitted on special issues, and the jury made the following answers: (1) That Ed Marek was not indebted to the defendant Theuber; (2) that the notes, mortgages, and personal property were wrongfully obtained from Ed Marek and F. F. Marek under duress of threats of criminal prosecution of Ed Marek for a felony; and (3) that the defendant Philp was indebted to the defendant Theuber in the sum of $4,868.39. In accordance with the verdict the court entered judgment in favor of the Mareks for the money paid and for the value of the cattle delivered, and canceling the notes and mortgages in evidence. Judgment was also entered in favor of Ed Theuber against the defendant Philp.

W. M. Hilliard, of Caldwell, and Searcy & Botts, of Brenham, for appellant.

T. J. Carter, of Caldwell, and Mathis, Teague & Mathis, of Brenham, for appellees.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Appellant made James Philp a party defendant in this cause, and at the same time asked for an order requiring Philp to file a statement under oath, showing his dealings in the alleged cattle transactions. The court made a vacation order, requiring Philp to file a sworn statement as asked for by appellant. In obedience to the order of the judge said Philp filed a sworn statement, setting forth an agreement with appellant to purchase cattle, and specifying the cattle bought and the amount paid for them. The statement further recited that—

"Ed Marek never received any of Ed Theuber's money from the bank or from me, except in payment of cattle which he sold and delivered to me, and Ed Theuber got every dollar the cattle brought when sold.

"Every dollar I received for the sale of cattle I turned over to Ed Theuber. He kept books. He kept the money and I never could get a settlement out of him. I do not owe Ed Theuber one cent, and Ed Marek does not owe him a dollar in this cattle business while I was handling it. I bought a lot of cattle from Ed Marek and paid him for them. He bought quite a number from me and paid me for them, and Ed Theuber got the money."

The plaintiff offered the above statement in evidence, and the appellant excepted to the ruling of the court in admitting it. The defendant Philp did not appear in the trial, and a judgment by default was entered against him in favor of appellant on his cross-action. It is believed there was error in admitting the ex parte statement in evidence, requiring a reversal of the judgment as to both F. F. Marek and Ed Marek. For the said ex parte statement of Philp went to show that Ed Marek did not fraudulently take money belonging to Theuber and had not committed any criminal offense. And the evidence in the record is a disputed question as to whether or not Ed Marek fraudulently or wrongfully obtained the money of the appellant, and whether or not Ed Marek and Jim Philp acted together, as alleged, to defraud the appellant. The jury could easily have been influenced to decide the disputed issue by looking to and accepting the ex parte statement before them.

[2, 3] If it be true that Ed Marek fraudulently or wrongfully obtained the money of the appellant, then there is a good consideration for the notes, mortgages, and property in evidence. For money fraudulently or wrongfully obtained from another is a good consideration for a promissory note taken in payment of it. Thorn v. Pinkham, 84 Me. 101, 24 Atl. 718, 20 Am. St. Rep. 335. And if it be true, as alleged in the cross-action, that F. F. Marek voluntarily gave the notes and mortgages to repay the money fraudulently or wrongfully gotten by his son, then F. F. Marek is liable on his contract. So if Ed Marek was guilty in fact of having fraudulently obtained the money of Theuber, he would be liable on his note and bill of sale in suit, even though he executed them under threat of a criminal prosecution. And if F. F. Marek did not execute the notes and mortgages under duress, but to secure the payment of the money wrongfully or fraudulently gotten by his son from the appellant, F. F. Marek would be liable on his undertakings. The evidence complained of bore directly upon the pivotal issues in the case, and was, we think, illegal evidence in the form offered.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

GILMORE V. GRAND TEMPLE & TABERNACLE IN STATE OF TEXAS OF KNIGHTS AND DAUGHTERS OF TABOR OF INTERNATIONAL ORDER OF TWELVE. (No. 2265.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. May 27, 1920.)

1. Insurance \S 747—Beneficiary in certificate of suspended member not entitled in view of by-laws.

Where mutual benefit certificate stipulated society should not be liable unless insured when he died was in good standing with his tabernacle, endowment department, and grand temple and tabernacle, certificate accordingly was not binding on society when member died, not in good standing, but suspended for failure to pay endowment tax on certificate for a quarter.

2. Insurance \S 761—Requirement of by-laws as to good health prevented reinstatement on payment of delinquent endowment tax.

Where by-laws of benefit society expressly provided that, if insured was not in good health when payment of a delinquent quarterly endowment tax on his certificate was made, payment should not operate to reinstate him, provision must be given effect, such facts existing, as barring the beneficiary.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Henry J. Dannenbaum, Judge.

Suit by Hattie Gilmore against the Grand Temple and Tabernacle in the State of Texas of the Knights and Daughters of Tabor of the International Order of Twelve. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

December 12, 1911, appellee a fraternal benefit society issued a certificate whereby it bound itself to pay $1,000 to appellant, the beneficiary named therein, when her husband, James I. Gilmore the insured, died, if he was then "in good standing with his tabernacle, the endowment department, and the grand temple and tabernacle." At the time he died, to wit, June 26, 1916, Gilmore was appellee's grand auditor. This suit was by appellant as the beneficiary named in the certificate to recover the amount thereof, and by her as the sole heir of said Gilmore to recover the value of services she claimed he had performed for appellees as its grand auditor. After the parties had presented the testimony they respectively relied on, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in appellee's favor. The appeal is from a judgment in conformity to such a verdict.

M. H. Broyles, of Houston, for appellant.
Fred R. Switzer, of Houston, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant insists there was testimony which warranted a finding that appellee was liable to her on the certificate she sued on, and that the trial court therefore erred when he instructed the jury to find in appellee's favor.

From the testimony it appeared that the certificate and the laws of the society as they were when it was issued, and as they might be in the future as the result of amendments and additions thereto, constituted the contract between the parties, and it was provided in said laws that—

"No subordinate temple or tabernacle, nor any subordinate officer or member, shall have the power or authority to waive any provisions of the laws or constitution of this order or of the Taborian endowment benefit."

By the terms of the certificate appellee was not to be liable to appellant as the beneficiary named therein unless the insured when he died was "in good standing with his tabernacle, the endowment department, and the grand temple and tabernacle."

By its laws as they existed prior to July, 1910, the society could issue certificates for only $300 each. The insured as a member of the society then held a certificate for that amount. The "endowment tax" on such a certificate was $1 per quarter.

At the time stated the laws of the society were so changed as to authorize the issuance of certificates for $1,000 also, and as to authorize then existing members who wished to do so to exchange the $300 certificates they held for $1,000 certificates. The endowment tax on certificates for $300 continued to be $1 per quarter. The endowment tax on certificates $1,000 was fixed at $3 per quarter, and a member who wished his $300 certificate changed to one for $1,000 was required to "pay," quoting, "twelve calendar months $3 a quarter from the date that his policy is changed before the $1,000 policy becomes effective or in full force."

It appeared without dispute in the testimony that the insured did not comply with the requirement that he pay $3 per quarter during said 12 months, but that he instead paid only $1 per quarter during that time. By amendments of the laws of the society made in 1914 the endowment tax on certificates for $300 was increased to $1.35 per quarter and on $1,000 certificates to $4.50 per quarter. Thereafter the insured, who therefore had paid an endowment tax of only $1, began to pay $1.35, and never afterward paid more than that sum as such a tax.

The insured never having paid the endowment tax he should have paid on a certificate for $1,000, but having always instead paid the tax he should have paid on a certificate for $300, the society at his death treated the certificate issued to him as one for $300, and paid to appellant that sum, less a tax of $10, chargeable against it by a law of the society.

In the amendments referred to it was provided that the endowment quarters should begin with the 1st days in December, March, June, and September, and that the failure of a member to pay the endowment tax "on or before the first day of the first month of the endowment quarter * * * ipso facto suspends such member and his or her beneficiary from the right to participate in the endowment fund, until the said endowment tax and other dues and assessments and taxes have been paid and the said endowment tax has reached the office of the chief grand scribe." And further that—

"Any member suspended for nonpayment of endowment tax may be reinstated upon the payment within 60 days from the date of the suspension of all arrearages of every kind, including the current endowment tax; provided, however, that he be in good health at the time of the reinstatement. Whenever any endowment tax is tendered by a member or any one else for him for the purpose of reinstatement such tender shall be in effect a warranty by such member that he is in good health, and when paid by the member or any one on the member's behalf after such member's suspension the same shall be received and retained without waiving any of the provisions of this section; provided further, that the receipt and retention of such payments in case the suspended member is not in good health shall not have the effect of reinstating said member or entitling such member or his beneficiaries to any right under his endowment certificate."

It appeared without dispute in the testimony that the endowment tax due from the insured for the quarter beginning June 1, 1916, was not paid to the lodge of which he was a member until the 22d day of that month, that he was then suffering from paralysis, and that he died three or four days thereafter. When the tax reached the office of the chief grand scribe does not appear from anything we have found in the record.

[1] Conceding, but not deciding, that the certificate was effective notwithstanding the provision in the by-laws which declared it should not be if the insured failed, as he did, to pay an endowment tax of $3 a quarter during the twelve months following its date, it is plain it nevertheless was not valid and binding on appellee at the time the insured died, because he was not then in good standing in the society, as it was stipulated in the certificate he must be, but instead stood suspended because of his failure to pay the endowment tax on or before the first day of the quarter beginning June 1, 1916. The provision of the by-laws applicable was that such failure should ipso facto suspend a member and the right of his beneficiary to participate in the endowment fund until the tax and all other dues and assessments had been paid and the "endowment tax had reached the office of the chief grand scribe."

[2] Even if it appeared, and it does not, that the endowment tax paid to the local lodge June 22, 1916, reached the chief grand scribe's office before the death of the insured, it could not be held that the insured was thereby reinstated, for it appeared that he was then fatally sick, and it was expressly provided in the by-laws that if the insured was not in good health at the time payment was made it should not operate to reinstate him. 3 Vernon's Statutes, arts. 4830, 4834, 4847; Grayson v. Grand Temple, etc., 171 S. W. 489; 3 Joyce on Insurance, §§ 1261, 1261a; Fletcher v. Knights and Ladies of Honor, 135 S. W. 201; Day v. Woodmen Circle, 174 Mo. App. 260, 156 S. W. 721.

Appellant urges as another reason why the trial court should not have instructed the jury as he did that there was testimony which would have warranted a finding that appellee was liable to her for the value of the services the insured rendered it as its auditor during his lifetime. She does not set out such testimony in her brief, nor cite us to it in the record. In reading the testimony sent to this court, we did not find any which we think would have supported such a finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEILL v. PRYOR et ux. (No. 6401.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 12, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1062(1) — Erroneous special issue as to location of division line held harmless.

In a suit to determine the boundary line marked by a former picket fence, a special issue as to where the present fence was located with reference to the center line of the former fence including the posts, if erroneous because of the latter clause, was harmless, where the jury found the existing fence was on appellee's side of the line, even if the posts were not included in determining the center line of the former fence.

2. Boundaries \S 35(5)—Evidence of division line according to deeds admissible to show location of admitted boundary.

In a suit to determine a boundary line, where it was agreed that a former fence had been on the true line, evidence establishing the division line according to the deeds was admissible to show the location of the picket fence, and a requested instruction withdrawing such evidence from the jury was properly refused.

3. Appeal and error \S 731(1) — Assignment that verdict was contrary to evidence too general.

An assignment that the verdict is contrary to the preponderance of the evidence, and against the evidence, and shows that the jury either misunderstood the case or disregarded the evidence, is so general that the trial court could not have been thereby apprised of the theory on which plaintiff requested that the verdict should be set aside.

4. Boundaries \S 37(3) — Evidence held to sustain verdict finding boundary as claimed by defendant.

In a suit to locate a boundary which the parties agreed had been marked by a former picket fence, evidence of two witnesses, that they built the present fence with care not to encroach on plaintiff's lot as marked by the former fence, held sufficient to warrant a verdict for defendants, notwithstanding testimony of witnesses who had no particular reason to observe carefully that the new fence was on plaintiff's side of the former fence.

5. Appeal and error \S 930(1) — Testimony most favorable to party securing verdict presumed true.

The appellate court, in deference to the verdict, must accept as true the testimony most favorable to the party for whom the verdict was rendered.

6. Appeal and error \S 1001(1)—Verdict supported by evidence must be upheld unless contrary to physical facts.

The appellate court must uphold the verdict, unless the direct testimony supporting it cannot be correct because of physical facts or other evidence admitted to be correct.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; R. B. Minor, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Dora M. Neill against Ike T. Pryor and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Guinn & McNeill, of San Antonio, for appellant.

Deuman, Franklin & McGown, of San Antonio, for appellees.

MOURSUND, J. This is a suit by Mrs. Dora M. Neill against Ike T. Pryor and wife, Myra S. Pryor, which, in view of averments in the defendants' answer and cross-action and admissions in reply thereto by plaintiff, resolved itself into a suit to determine the location of a certain picket fence, admitted to have marked the line between the lot owned by plaintiff and that owned by Mrs. Pryor, both of which were out of block 10 in the city of San Antonio. This fence had been removed by defendants and a new fence erected which plaintiff contended had been so constructed as to deprive her of a 12-inch strip of land and place same in possession of defendants. There was also a controversy concerning another strip of land 5 inches in width, but on the trial the plaintiff abandoned her claim to such strip.

The court submitted the following question:

"Is the present fence located east or west of the old picket (or paling) fence, and how far? Answer by reference to the east side of the present fence and the center line of the old picket fence (meaning the center line of the average thickness of the old picket fence, including pickets and posts)."

The jury answered:

"We, the jury, find that the east side of the present fence is located three inches west of the center line of the old picket fence."

Judgment was rendered that plaintiff take nothing by her suit to recover any property sued for situated west of the east line of the present division fence; also, that she take nothing by her suit in so far as it involved the five inch strip. That part of the judgment relating to the line, the location of which was left to the jury, does not follow the verdict, for the reason that defendants in open court stated that they did not care to recover the three inches between the east line of the new fence built by them and the center of the old picket fence as located by the jury.

[1] By the first assignment complaint is made of the wording of the issue submitted to the jury, the contention being that the court erred in assuming or holding as a matter of law that the division line between the properties would be the center line of the average thickness of the old picket fence including pickets and posts, instead of requiring that the line should be established by ascertaining the distance from the new fence of a line marking where the west line of the pickets of the old fence were located or at least the east line of the pickets. In other words, that the thickness of the posts should not have been taken into consideration. It having been agreed that the old picket fence was $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick, and the jury having found that the east side of the new Pryor fence is 3 inches west of the center line of the old paling fence, it appears that, even if either of the appellant's theories is adopted as the proper method to determine the boundary line as made by the old fence, nevertheless the appellant would not be entitled to recover, for the true line even under the theory most favorable to appellant, would be one-half inch on appellant's side of the new fence. We are unable to see how the appellant could have been prejudiced by the form of the question, and the appellant under the judgment of the court got all the land on which the picket fence had been situated and a half inch in addition. It follows that no error is pointed out by assignments 1 and 2 such as would require or justify a reversal of the judgment.

[2] The court did not err in refusing to give special charge No. 1 requested by plaintiff. The effect of such charge would have been to withdraw from the jury evidence showing where the division line between the parties was located according to their deeds, which evidence was admissible to be considered with the other facts and circumstances, several of which indicated that the old picket fence had been constructed on that very line. The purpose of plaintiff in asking the charge seems to have been to impress upon the jury the fact that under the admitted facts each party owned the land in her inclosure up to the old picket fence, but its effect would have been to prevent the jury from considering, in deciding where the picket fence was situated, the inference that it would naturally be placed on the true line.

[3] By the fourth assignment complaint is made that the verdict is contrary to the preponderance of the evidence and against the evidence and shows that the jury either misunderstood the case or disregarded the evidence. This assignment is so general that the trial court could not have been thereby apprised of the theory upon which the plaintiff relied to show that the verdict should be set aside.

[4] We have, however, carefully read the statement of facts and examined the exhibits sent up with the record, and conclude that it cannot be held that the verdict is so contrary to the great preponderance of the evidence as to warrant an appellate court in setting it aside. In fact, we do not believe that it can be said to preponderate in favor of plaintiff's contention. The testimony of Dietz and Campbell, who built the Pryor fence, is unequivocally to the effect that the present fence was placed a half inch or an inch west of the old picket fence line. They were instructed not to encroach on Mrs. Neill's lot, and they testified they did not do so. Their claim is not contradicted by any one who is shown to recollect definitely where the old fence line was situated. It is attempted to be fixed by reference to two objects, a tree and the brick post at the corner of the Pryor front fence. There is no uniformity in the theories as to location of the old fence line with reference to the brick post. Appellant testified that the brick post, not counting the cap, which protruded 3 inches, came over on her line 4 to 6 inches. The brick pillar, or post, as it is sometimes called by the witnesses, is 18 inches wide. Afterwards she testified:

"The old picket fence butted up against this pillar near the center, more towards Mrs. Pryor's side than my own. * * * This old picket fence struck the pillar from the side next to me about 12 inches or more."

The witness Norris, who built the Pryor fence in 1907 against the old picket fence, first testified that the red line on Exhibit 3, which would be approximately two-thirds of the distance across the pillar, represented practically the place where the fence built by Pryor struck the pillar. This fence line was admittedly 7 or 8 inches from the old picket fence line. Later he testified the fence line built by him came to the left of the pillar. The jury was warranted in concluding that the recollection of appellant and Morris furnished no more certain basis for a conclusion as to the location of the old fence than the statements of Dietz and Campbell who claimed to have given particular attention to the location of the line.

The appellant relies with much confidence upon the theory that a certain tree was in the fence line of Pryor's fence constructed in 1907, but here again there is much doubt. Norris first testified that he remembered "that there were one or two trees along the fence line somewhere on Pryor's side"; then that he believed the fence he built struck the second tree as it went by. He then testified that the edge of the tree was in the line of property. Dietz testified that the trees were on Pryor's side of the fence; he had no recollection of either being in the line. Campbell testified that he remembered there were trees in the line of fence he and Dietz pulled down. He was not accurate in his conception of when a tree may be said to be in the line, for he said it was in the old line and also that it was in the fence line they built. Appellant's recollection was that the tree was partially on her side of the Pryor fence and thus created a break in the fence. Pryor's recollection was that the fence built by him did not touch the tree, but came close to it. He estimated that the tree was about 2 inches on his side of the fence built in 1907. He also testified, and this was not contradicted, that the tree bore no mark indicating that it had ever come in contact with a fence. Certain photographs were introduced in evidence, and the testimony of a photographer concerning what was disclosed by the same with reference to the tree; but his eyesight was tested and discovered to be less keen than that of jurors. We have closely examined the original photograph relied on by appellant, and are unable to find anything which convinces us that at the time it was taken the tree was partially upon appellant's side of the fence. The sidewalk in front of appellant's lot terminates at a point 3 inches on her side of the present fence; the curb also terminates short of the fence line. The sidewalk and the old picket fence were constructed before appellant purchased. It is a natural inference that the owner would construct the sidewalk as far as the partition fence, or that, if the sidewalk was first constructed, the partition fence would be made to coincide with the location of the sidewalk. There is a stub of an old cedar post about 3 inches on appellant's side of the present fence, and in line with the point of termination of the sidewalk, and this is relied on by appellees on the theory that it was a part of the old picket fence; but this is denied by appellant, who testified to seeing the stub in 1907 at the time the Pryor house was built.

The recollection of persons with regard to the exact location of trees, fences, and especially of relative distances, there being at the time they were viewed no controversy which would lead to a close inspection, is necessarily unreliable, and the jury probably concluded that there was no more certain guide than to accept as correct the testimony of Dietz and Campbell, who claimed that it was their specific purpose to ascertain the old line and stay within it.

[5, 6] The province of the jury is to pass upon the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony. The appellate court, in deference to their verdict, must accept as true the testimony most favorable to appellees, and uphold the verdict, unless it is shown that the direct testimony supporting it cannot be correct by reason of physical facts or other evidence admitted to be correct.

When these well-settled rules are applied in this case, we conclude there can be no doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

TWYMAN v. CLARK. (No. 2012.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
Oct. 30, 1919.)Bills and notes §539—Finding in suit on note and to foreclose vendor's lien held properly construed.

In suit to recover the amount of a promissory note for $1,125 and for foreclosure of lien on the east half of a survey conveyed by plaintiff trustee to defendant maker, which lien secured payment of the note, finding that plaintiff and defendant agreed, when the note was signed, that money derived from the sale of timber on land constituting the west half of the survey should be credited on the note, held properly construed as a finding the agreement was that the credit against the purchase money due defendant on the land on account of the timber was to be entered as of the dates the payments for the timber were made by plaintiff.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; P. O. Beard, Judge.

Suit by W. T. Twyman against Isom Clark. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Appellant, Twyman, was the plaintiff in the court below. By his suit he sought (1) a recovery of the amount of a promissory note for $1,125, interest, and attorney's fees, payable to his order on or before January 1, 1917, which he alleged appellee, Clark, made January 1, 1916; and (2) a foreclosure of a lien on the east half of the James Mitchum survey of 320 acres in Harrison county, which, he alleged, he conveyed to said Clark by a deed dated said January 1, 1916, and on which, he further alleged, a vendor's lien existed in his favor to secure the payment of said note.

In his answer Clark alleged that the note sued on was without consideration, and further alleged, and at the trial proved, in substance, that in January, 1909, he owned the west half of the James Mitchum survey, and that Mrs. M. J. Burress owned the east half thereof; that, having arranged to sell the timber on the entire survey, he, on January 30, 1909, purchased the east half thereof of Mrs. Burress, agreeing to pay her $1,120 therefor out of the proceeds of the sale of said timber; that the purchasers of the timber were to pay for same from time to time as they cut same; that Twyman agreed to act as trustee for him and Mrs. Burress in collecting the money to be paid for the timber, and in paying over to Mrs. Burress out of same the $1,120 and interest thereon which he (Clark) had agreed to pay for the land; and that Mrs. Burress was then to execute and deliver a deed conveying said east half to him (Clark). In his said answer Clark further alleged that Twyman, as such trustee, collected on account of said timber approximately $1,500, out of which he paid Mrs. Burress the amount he (Clark) had agreed to pay her for the land; that, having so paid for the land, Twyman had Mrs. Burress to convey same to him, instead of to Clark; that thereafter, to wit, on January 27, 1916, Twyman represented to him that the proceeds collected by him of the sale of said timber were not sufficient to pay the sum he (Clark) had agreed to pay Mrs. Burress therefor, and requested him (Clark) to execute the note sued on, assuring him that same, when executed, would be credited with the amount of said proceeds; that he (Clark) did not then, nor until the institution of this suit, know how much said Twyman had collected on account of said timber, and, having implicit confidence in Twyman, and relying on his said statement and assurance, he (Clark) executed said note.

In a supplemental petition Twyman alleged that, shortly after Mrs. Burress conveyed the land to him, he had a settlement with Clark, in which it was agreed that Clark owed him $750 on account of the land; and that Clark then executed and delivered to him his promissory notes for sums aggregating that amount. In said petition Twyman further alleged that about January 1, 1916, he "had another and further settlement" with Clark, in which it was agreed that Clark owed him on account of said land the sum of $1,125, to cover which Clark then executed the note sued on. Twyman was a merchant; Clark, a negro about 60 years of age, who could neither read nor write—was a farmer. He had been one of Twyman's customers during many years. It appeared from testimony heard at the trial that in January, 1916, Twyman held four notes in his favor, for $187.50, each, purporting to have been made by Clark on January 1, 1911, and to be secured by a vendor's lien on the east half of the Mitchum survey, mentioned above; and that in January, 1916, and at the date of the trial, he held a note for $1,125, purporting to have been made by Clark January 1, 1916, and to be secured by a vendor's lien on said land. Twyman testified that the amount including interest, due January 1, 1916, on the four notes for $187.50 each, was $1,125, and that the note for that amount was made by Clark to take the place of the four notes. It further appeared from said testimony that, at the time the four notes for $187.50 purported to have been made, Twyman, acting for Clark, had collected $720.28 on account of timber cut on said east half of the Mitchum survey, and had paid same over to Mrs. Burress, and that he had collected sums aggregating $493.72 on account of timber on the west half of said survey, which he credited on an open account he had against Clark. Twyman testified that, in addition to the $720.28 he had paid Mrs. Burress, as stated out of the proceeds of the sales of timber, in January, 1911, he paid her $634.93 as the balance then due her for the land, out of his own funds, and had her convey the land to him. He further testified that the $634.93 was less than the balance Mrs. Burress claimed to be due her, and that in a settlement he had with Clark, January 27, 1911, he claimed, and Clark agreed, that the latter was due him on account of the land, not only the $634.93 he had paid Mrs. Burress, but the difference between that sum and the sum Mrs. Burress claimed to be due her. That difference, he said, added to the $634.93, made $750, which Clark then agreed he owed on account of the land. The four notes for $187.50, purporting to have been made by Clark January 1, 1911, but really made said January 27, 1911, Twyman said, were for the $750. Clark, testifying as a witness, denied that he had such a settlement with Twyman, and denied that he executed said four notes.

On special issues submitted to them the jury found with Twyman on his contention that he had such a settlement with Clark in January, 1911, but they further found (and the finding is not attacked, as without the support of testimony or otherwise) that in the settlement Twyman agreed that the amount (afterwards ascertained to be $493.72, as stated above) he had received for Clark on account of timber on the west half of the Mitchum survey, and credited on the open account between them, should be credited instead against the $750 represented by the four notes. It is obvious that, had the credit been accordingly given, it would have appeared that in January, 1916, there was a balance remaining unpaid by Clark on the purchase money of the land of only $256.28 and interest, or $384.42 instead of $750 and interest, or $1,125, the amount of the note sued on. Referring to that note, Clark testified that he—"didn't know what it was; didn't know what was in it, nor what it was for." "I signed this paper [note]," he said, "without having read or knowing what it was. I signed it with his [Twyman's] word. He told me, if I signed this note, he would give me a deed and credit the timber. I thought it was a deed. Yes, sir; I said just now, if I would sign this note, that he would give me credit for my timber."

"Q. Then you did know it was a note? A. He said note and deeds, too. I didn't know it. No, sir; I did not know as a matter of fact it was a note. I didn't know, because they hadn't read it."

The witness Brown testified that he was employed by Clark to represent him in adjusting a controversy between him and Twyman in regard to the open account between them.

"I made arrangements with Mr. Twyman," the witness said, "to come to my office and fix up this personal account. He brought this land note along with him, this note for $1,125, and after we got the personal account all straightened out I told Mr. Twyman I wanted all the notes and everything he had in his possession relating to Isom's personal account; wanted him to turn them over to Isom when he made the $250.00 note. He said he would, and did bring a lot of notes and papers relative to Isom's personal account, and at the same time he brought this note along. After Isom signed the note for $250, Mr. Twyman took it and looked it over, and then I says: 'Mr. Twyman, where were the notes and other obligations you hold against Isom?' He said: 'They are there in an envelope.' I said: 'Give those to Isom, and that will square the thing up.' He says: 'No; I have a note here on some land Isom must sign, if I give him these receipts; a note, he will have to sign, if I give him these receipts.' Then he pushed this note here out, and told Isom to sign that. Isom turned to me and says: 'Mr. Brown, must I sign it?' I said: 'Isom, I don't know anything about that transaction at all.' Isom says to Mr. Twyman: 'What land is that?' Mr. Twyman says: 'A part of that land you are living on.' Isom says: 'What part of it, Mr. Twyman?' He said: 'The east part.' Isom says: 'Mr. Twyman, what are you going to do about the timber?' Mr. Twyman said: 'You and me can straighten that all up together, and Mr. Brown don't know anything about it; you just sign it; Mr. Brown don't know anything about it.' Isom said: 'What are you going to do about the timber? Those men have taken it off.' He said: 'You go ahead and sign there, and you come with me to the store, and we will straighten it out.' Isom said: 'Are you going to give me credit for my timber?' Twyman said: 'Certainly I will; you know I give you credit for everything due you.' Isom turned and put his mark on there, and Mr. Twyman asked me to witness it, and I did."

Twyman as a witness denied that he agreed, when Clark signed the note, to credit same as Clark and Brown testified he did. On the issue thus made the jury found that Twyman and Clark did agree, at the time the latter signed the $1,125 note, "that the money derived from the sale of timber on the west half of the Mitchum survey should be credited on said note." Twyman insisted that the finding made it the duty of the court to render judgment in his favor for the amount of the $1,125 note, after crediting same as of the date of the trial with the $493.72 he had collected on account of the timber on the west half of the Mitchum survey. The trial court, however, construed the finding to the agreement was that the credit against the purchase money due Clark on the land on account of said timber was to be entered as of the dates the payments for the timber were made to Twyman, and, instead of rendering judgment for Twyman for $631.28, rendered judgment in his favor for $476.85 as the balance due on the $1,125 note. We think the court correctly construed the finding and did not err when he refused to render judgment in Twyman's favor for a greater sum than he adjudged in his favor.

S. P. Jones and J. T. Casey, both of Marshall, for appellant.

Bibb & Bibb and Brown & Hall, all of Marshall, for appellee.

WILLSON, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). We have carefully considered the assignments in appellant's brief, and are of the opinion neither of them shows error which requires a reversal of the judgment. Therefore it is affirmed.

BARLOW v. GREER. (No. 532.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 19, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1043(7)—Refusal to continue for illness of witness no error, where testimony of witness was taken at his home before end of trial.

Refusal of continuance because of illness of witness was not error, where before the trial was closed the court, with the jury and counsel, proceeded to the home of the witness, where his testimony was given in full.

2. Continuance \S 6—Refusal to continue to permit defendant to have land surveyed in boundary dispute action held not abuse of discretion.

In action involving a boundary dispute, refusal of continuance to permit defendant to have a survey made of the land was not an abuse of discretion, in absence of showing that such survey could not have been previously made.

3. Evidence \S 274(11)—Statements of deceased remote grantor in possession of land, against his interest, admissible in boundary dispute action.

In action involving boundary dispute, declarations by defendant's remote grantor, since deceased, made at the time he was in possession of the land, that the boundary line was as claimed by plaintiff, held admissible, being statements against his interest.

4. New trial \S 102(5)—Properly denied for lack of diligence in procuring newly discovered evidence.

In boundary dispute action, motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence held properly overruled for lack of diligence, where the newly discovered witness resided within 2 miles of the land in controversy for approximately 63 years, was well acquainted with the land and the history of that locality, and where there was no reason why such witness had not been approached prior to the trial, with a view of ascertaining what he knew in regard to the matter.

Appeal from District Court, Shelby County;
Chas. L. Brachfield, Judge.

Suit by T. G. Greer against J. B. Barlow. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. M. Short & Sons, of Center, for appellant.

Sanders & Sanders, of Center, for appellee.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. Appellee, Greer, sued appellant, Barlow, in the district court of Shelby county for the title and possession of 129 acres of land alleged to be a part of the Z. K. Walker head-right survey; the form of the action being trespass to try title, but appellee also specially pleaded title by limitation under the statutes of 5 and 10 years. Appellant's answer consisted of the usual plea of not guilty, and also interposed title by limitation under the 5 and 10 year statutes. The case was tried with a jury, upon special issues submitted, and the verdict was in favor of appellee for the land claimed by him, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

The real issue between the parties was one of boundary; it being the contention of the appellee that the land sued for by him was a part of the Z. K. Walker survey, as originally made, and the appellant claiming that the land appellee was claiming was a part of the John D. Merchant survey, as originally made, and owned by appellant. At the time these two surveys were originally made, Huana bayou was the boundary line between them at the point in controversy; the Merchant survey lying south of the bayou, and the Walker lying north of the bayou. It was the contention of appellee that the channel of Huana bayou had changed its bed since said surveys were originally made, and that in consequence of the change the 129 acres of land sued for by him was now on the south side of the present channel of the bayou. This contention was denied by appellant, who claimed that the bed of the bayou had not changed, as claimed by appellee, and that the land described and sued for by appellee was a portion of the Merchant survey as originally made, and was owned by appellant. Upon this issue the whole controversy between the parties hinged. Motion for new trial was timely made and overruled, and appellant appealed to this court.

The first assignment of error complains of the action of the trial court in overruling appellant's motion for a continuance, based upon three grounds. The first ground was that of surprise. The suit was originally filed July 17, 1918, and appellee's first amended petition, which appellant claims occasioned the surprise, was filed March 13, 1919, the day on which the case went to trial. It is the contention of appellant in this connection, substantially, that there was a material difference as to the description of the 129 acres of land sued for by appellee. Upon consideration of this matter, we have concluded that appellant's contention cannot be sustained. We think that the original petition is substantially the same as the amended petition with reference to the description, except that the amended petition more definitely describes the land sued for, by specific metes and bounds, than were contained in the original; but it is manifest that appellant could not have been surprised by reason of the practically immaterial change or difference in description as contained in the two petitions.

[1] It is next contended, under this assignment, that the motion should have been granted because of the absence of a witness for appellant, whose testimony he claimed was material in refuting the contention of appellee that there had been a change in the bed of Huana bayou, as claimed by appellee. Before the trial was closed, however, the court, with the jury and counsel, proceeded to the home of this witness, and his testimony was given in full, and appellant had the benefit thereof, and no showing whatever is made of any injury.

[2] It is next contended that the case should have been continued to permit appellant to have a topographical survey made of the land in controversy. He claimed that the issue of boundary between the parties could not be directly and correctly determined without such survey. It is manifest from the record that appellant was notified from the time the original petition was on file that the question of boundary would be the sole controversy between the parties, and he had from that time at least until some time in the fall of that year in which to have a survey made if he so desired. He claims in this connection that the weather became bad in the fall of the year 1918, and creeks became swollen, and for that reason a survey touching the land in controversy could not be made. There is no showing, however, that such survey, if desired, could not have been made some time in the summer before, and after the suit was filed, or at some time prior to the bad weather in the fall. We think the court did not abuse its discretion in overruling the motion for a continuance as to any of the grounds contained in the motion.

[3] The second assignment of error complains of the action of the trial court in permitting appellee to testify to certain statements and declarations made by one W. J. Lister, who at the time of the trial had been dead for many years, but who, at the time of such statements, was the owner of the land on the Merchant survey now claimed by appellant. These statements by Lister were in the nature of declarations against his own interests, and tended strongly to show that the true boundary between the Merchant and the Walker surveys was as the same is claimed to be by appellee. Lister being a remote vendor in appellant's chain of title to the Merchant, and being the owner of the land at the time of such statements against his interests, and being in possession, the evidence was admissible upon the issue here in dispute, and the court did not err, as contended under this assignment. Snow v. Starr, 75 Tex. 411, 12 S. W. 673; Rose v. Hays Inv. Co., 205 S. W. 140. The assignment is overruled.

Appellant's third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error are grouped, though we seriously doubt that they were properly so, under the rules. These assignments challenge the verdict and judgment: First, on the ground that there was no evidence in support thereof; second, that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict; and, third, that motion for new trial should have been granted because of newly discovered evidence. We shall not discuss the evidence touching the first two assignments; but, after consideration of same, we hold that there was evidence, and sufficient evidence, to warrant the verdict and judgment.

[4] As to the ground of newly discovered evidence, it will suffice to say that the witness by whom it is alleged such evidence as was desired would be given is shown to have resided within 2 miles of the land in controversy for approximately 63 years, and was well acquainted with the land and the history of that locality, and appellant's main desire in having his evidence was to show that Huana bayou had not changed its bed, as claimed by appellee. There is no reason in the world shown why this old citizen had not been approached by appellant prior to the trial, with a view of ascertaining what he knew about the matter, and it is clear that appellant was lacking in diligence in not ascertaining what the witness knew. The court did not, of course, abuse its discretion in overruling the motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

The whole issue between the parties, as stated before, was one of boundary, and it was purely a question of fact, and the evidence is abundantly sufficient to support the verdict and judgment in appellee's favor on the issue. All assignments are therefore overruled, and the judgment will be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

WELLS v. SCALES. (No. 8370.)(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Dallas.
May 8, 1920.)1. Evidence \S 253(1)—Declarations of conspirators in furtherance of the common design are admissible against others.

Acts and declarations of conspirators pending the conspiracy and in furtherance of the common design are admissible against a co-conspirator, though done and said in his absence; consequently, where a mother and daughter conspired to extort money from defendant, and, when the mother was unable to make good her assertion that she was defendant's common-law wife, the daughter sued for breach of marriage promise, etc., evidence of acts and declarations by the mother in absence of the daughter was admissible.

2. Appeal and error \S 926(3)—Preliminary evidence of conspiracy to justify admission of declarations presumed.

Where the question whether a conspiracy between a mother and daughter to extort money from defendant was not submitted to the jury, there being no request for submission, and the court admitted as against the daughter, plaintiff in a suit for breach of marriage promise, etc., evidence of declarations of the mother that she was defendant's common-law wife, etc., made in the daughter's absence, which would not have been admissible but for the conspiracy, it will be presumed that it was established.

3. Evidence \S 253(1)—Letter by coconspirator admissible.

In a daughter's action for breach of marriage promise, etc., where there was evidence that mother, daughter, and another had conspired to extort money from defendant, a letter written by the mother, stating she was defendant's common-law wife, held admissible.

4. Appeal and error \S 1002—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

The jury's findings on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Appeal from District Court, Kaufman County; Joel R. Bond, Judge.

Action by Thelma Wells, by next friend, against H. L. Scales. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Spann and Allen & Allen, all of Dallas, for appellant.

Wynne & Wynne and Woods & Morrow, all of Kaufman, for appellee.

TALBOT, J. This is a suit for damages for breach of promise of marriage and for assault to rape, brought by the appellant against the appellee. Appellant alleged that she was 17 years of age when she was engaged to the defendant, and that defendant, on the 15th day of June, 1918, repudiated his contract of marriage with her, and that by reason thereof she has suffered actual damages of $50,000 and vindictive damages in the sum of $50,000. Appellee answered by certain special exceptions, general denial, and a special answer in which he charged that the suit was not founded in good faith, but was the result of a conspiracy on the part of plaintiff and her mother and father to blackmail him. Appellee alleged that he was about 60 years of age; that he had accumulated property of considerable value; that appellant's mother, Mrs. Della Wells, in pursuance of a conspiracy between herself, husband, and daughter, to put him in a position to extort money from him, came to appellee and engaged herself to him as his housekeeper on his farm near Scurry in Kaufman County, Tex.; and that she and her daughter became members of his household, both representing that the mother was a widow and that the appellant was her daughter and the husband dead. Appellee further alleged that appellant's mother, in furtherance of the conspiracy formed, began a course of lascivious conduct with him, he believing she was a widow; that such course of conduct on the part of the mother continued with appellee until the spring of 1918, when the real purpose of appellant and her mother became known to appellee; that at this time appellant's said mother, Mrs. Della Wells, asserted that she was the common-law wife of appellee, and as such demanded large sums of money of appellee to have her abandon her claim upon him and his property; that appellee refused to pay money to the said Mrs. Wells, or to the appellant, and that they then threatened to sue appellee for damages because he had been living with Mrs. Wells and because he had engaged himself to marry the appellant, and had refused to do so; that, appellee continuing to refuse to pay appellant's mother money and refusing to marry appellant, they moved away from the home of appellee, resurrected Darius Wells, father of appellant, and this suit was filed. Appellee further charges that he does not believe that the appellant ever had any feelings toward him other than that of a friend, and as a father; that she frequently expressed herself to the effect that she looked upon appellee and felt towards him as a father. Appellee set out the conspiracy in detail, and denied as absolutely false the charge that he attempted to take advantage of the appellant or ever intended or thought of causing her hurt or injury, or lead her to believe that he entertained for her any other feeling than that of the kindest friendship and regard. Appellant, by supplemental petition, denied the conspiracy alleged by appellee and charged that the same was interposed by appellee, knowing that it was false and done for the purpose of prejudicing her case.

The case was tried before a jury, and, from a judgment in favor of appellee, appellant appealed.

[1, 2] The first three assignments of error presented complain of the admission of certain testimony over the objection of the appellant upon the ground that such testimony was inadmissible because the conspiracy charged had not been proved. This testimony consisted of acts and declarations of Mrs. Delia Wells, mother of the appellant, and the proposition advanced is that—

"Before any evidence could be given of any act on the part of the plaintiff's mother not in the presence or within the knowledge of the plaintiff, a conspiracy must be established by proof between the plaintiff and her mother, and, there being no proof of any such conspiracy, it was error in the trial court to admit evidence of such acts on the part of the mother of the plaintiff."

The bills of exception show that the court permitted the witness Mrs. G. A. Smith to testify by deposition that Mrs. Delia Wells, mother of the appellant, had a conversation with the daughter of the witness, in which Mrs. Wells had stated that she was the common-law wife of H. L. Scales and had lived with him for three years, and permitted Miss Elsie Smith to testify that she had a conversation with Mrs. Delia Wells, the mother of the plaintiff, in the absence of the plaintiff, in which Mrs. Wells stated to her that she was a common-law wife of H. L. Scales and lived with him for three years and was going to bring suit against him as such common-law wife or would bring suit for breach of promise of marriage against defendant, and requested said witness to consult a lawyer for her in Corsicana as to bringing such suit. The conversations referred to were not had in the presence of or hearing of the appellant, and their admissibility turns on the question of whether or not the testimony adduced established prima facie the conspiracy alleged. The testimony bearing upon the question is voluminous, and appellant does not point out wherein or why it is insufficient to show that the conspiracy charged existed. We have, however, examined the testimony and without detailing it hold that it is sufficient to establish prima facie at least the conspiracy alleged by appellee. If this is correct, there was no error, in our opinion, in admitting the testimony of which complaint is made. The rule is well established that acts and declarations of conspirators pending the conspiracy and in furtherance of the common design are admissible against a coconspirator, though said and done in his absence. Appellant's able counsel does not deny this rule of evidence, but simply asserts that the evidence in this case was insufficient to establish the conspiracy charged. The issue of whether or not the conspiracy charged had been established by the evidence was not submitted to the jury for its determination, and no requests for its submission appear to have been made. In such case, the evidence being sufficient to authorize it, the presumption will obtain that the court found that the conspiracy had been established.

For the reasons given above, there was no error in admitting the testimony complained of in assignment 3A. Besides, as we understand the record, the conversations detailed by some of the witnesses referred to in this assignment were had in the presence of the appellant.

[3] The third assignment of error is to the effect that the court erred in admitting in evidence a letter written by appellant's mother, Mrs. Delia Wells, to Miss Elsie Smith, which is as follows:

"May 19th, 1918.

"Miss Elsie Smith, Jewett, Texas: I am going to trust to your honor in writing you this letter. I am going to tell you something I think you should know. Please do not tell Mr. Scales what I am going to tell you. He is my man. I have been living in his home as his wife for three years and I am his wife in the eyes of God. You are a woman; I guess you know the ways of mankind. Please do not let him visit you anywhere. I have been honest with you and I hope you will be the same with me, for I think you are a good true woman. If you answer this letter, address it in a plain envelope.
Delia Wells."

Practically the same objections were urged to the introduction of this letter as were urged to the introduction of the testimony complained of in the assignments above discussed, and, for the reasons given in holding that testimony admissible, we conclude there was no error in admitting the letter in question.

[4] The fourth assignment of error asserts that the answer of the jury to special issue No. 1 is not supported by the evidence and is contrary to the preponderance of the evidence; and the fifth assignment of error is that the answer of the jury to special issue No. 3 is likewise not supported by the evidence, and contrary to the preponderance thereof. Special issue No. 1 is as follows: "Was there a mutual promise or agreement on the part of the plaintiff, Thelma Wells, and the defendant, H. L. Scales, to marry?" And special issue No. 3 is as follows: "Did the defendant, H. L. Scales, commit an assault to rape upon plaintiff, Thelma Wells?" Both of these issues were answered in the negative by the jury, and, the evidence being conflicting upon both, they became issues of fact and not issues of law, and the jury's findings are binding upon this court.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF DALLAS et al. v. CRAWFORD
et al. (No. 1641.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 21, 1920. On Motion for Re-
hearing, June 2, 1920.)

1. Eminent domain \S 266—Petition to cancel judgment of condemnation held to set up cause of action as distinguished from motion.

Petition of landowner and husband to cancel and annul, for want of service and citation or other notice, judgment in a condemnation suit by defendant city, held to set up a cause of action as distinguished from a mere motion to correct an error of entry.

2. Eminent domain \S 266—County court with jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings proper court in which to file petition attacking judgment.

County court empowered by its judgment to vest title to realty in city in condemnation proceedings held the proper court for the landowner to file petition attacking the judgment of condemnation on the ground that recitals essential to jurisdiction in the record were false, and to establish aliunde the record that the court in truth was without jurisdiction.

3. Eminent domain \S 190—Condemnation proceeding could be instituted by city only by petition.

A condemnation proceeding could be instituted by a city only by petition presented to the judge of the county court describing the land, giving the names of the owners, etc., the petition being that which would give jurisdiction.

4. Eminent domain \S 226—Appointment of commission in condemnation proceedings not invalid for lack of agreement between parties.

Despite Charter of the City of Dallas, art. 11, \S 5, appointment of commission in the city's condemnation proceeding, under Rev. St. 1911, art. 6508, was not invalid for lack of agreement between the parties as to the commissioners, though the application should state a failure to agree or an excuse therefor, as by showing that the landowner is a minor.

5. Infants \S 79—Court cannot appoint guardian ad litem without service on minor.

Until service on a minor is had, the court has no power to appoint a guardian ad litem.

6. Infants \S 81—Appointment of mother with adverse interest as guardian ad litem for minor illegal.

Appointment as guardian ad litem for a minor of her mother holding an adverse interest to her would be illegal.

7. Eminent domain \S 180—Notice of condemnation proceedings to owner essential.

Until the statutes requiring notice to the landowner are complied with, the commissioners in a city's condemnation proceedings have no authority to assess damages or to make a report, and the county court has no jurisdiction to declare condemnation.

8. Eminent domain \S 266—Infant owner not notified of proceedings not required to request new trial before suing to set aside judgment.

In a city's proceedings to condemn land, the infant owner, for lack of notice to her, was not required to request a new trial on the proceedings, petition and report of which were void, before suing to set aside judgment of condemnation.

9. Eminent domain \S 234(1) — County court could not condemn land at city's instance without report of commission.

County court entertaining a city's condemnation proceedings without a report of the commission, after first acquiring jurisdiction under the statutes, could not condemn the land.

10. Pleading \S 228—Exceptions to petition of infant to set aside judgment of condemnation properly overruled.

In suit by an infant, whose land was condemned by a city, to set aside the judgment of condemnation on the ground that she was not notified of the proceedings, etc., exception to the owner's petition on the ground that certain facts alleged were immaterial, some of the matters being proper, and none of them immaterial or irrelevant, held properly overruled.

11. Process \S 149—Evidence held not to show personal notice on infant landowner in condemnation proceedings.

In suit by an infant landowner to set aside judgment condemning her land at the instance of a city, evidence held insufficient to show the personal notice on the landowner required by Rev. St. 1911, art. 6514.

12. Judgment \S 525—Correct judgment reciting wrong reason not affected.

Where it is shown that judgment condemning land at a city's instance was invalid for lack of service of notice on the infant landowner, other matters recited in the judgment vacating such judgment do not affect it, because, if void for one reason, it is void for all; a wrong reason given in part and recited in the judgment not affecting the conclusion warranted by facts and law.

On Motion for Rehearing.

13. Eminent domain \S 266—Landowner suing to set aside judgment of condemnation not required to ask city again to institute proceedings.

An infant landowner had a right to show that judgment of condemnation in favor of a city was obtained without jurisdiction over her person for lack of personal service of notice, but she was not required, in suing to set aside such judgment as a piece of evidence against her title, to ask that the city proceed again to condemn.

Appeal from Dallas County Court; T. A. Works, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford and another against the City of Dallas and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jas. J. Collins, W. S. Bramlett, and Edward P. Dougherty, all of Dallas, for appellants.

W. L. Crawford, Muse & Muse, W. J. J. Smith, and W. A. Kemp, all of Dallas, for appellees.

HUFF, C. J. This is an action brought in the county court of Dallas county at law, on April 23, 1918, by Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford, joined by her husband pro forma, William Lester Crawford, against the city of Dallas, Mrs. S. A. Gibbs, Carl Hoblitzelle, Joe S. Kendall, Texas Land & Mortgage Company, and Real Estate Loan Company of Galveston, for the purpose of canceling and annulling for want of service and citation upon the plaintiff, Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford, or other notice, in a condemnation suit, and for fraud, the reports being made by the special commissioners in said condemnation proceeding, and the judgment of the said county court of Dallas county at law awarding condemnation to the city of Dallas for certain tracts of land described in the petition, and in the reports and judgment, situated in the city and county of Dallas, and claimed by the city of Dallas under the condemnation proceedings. The Texas Land & Mortgage Company and Real Estate Loan Company of Galveston each filed disclaimers, disclaiming any interest whatever. Mrs. S. A. Gibbs filed a general denial. The city of Dallas answered by general exceptions, various special exceptions, general denial, special denial, and pleas of estoppel. Kendall and Hoblitzelle each answered by a general demurrer, and the adoption of the demurrers and exceptions of the city of Dallas, and by general denial. The case was tried before a jury, but upon an instructed verdict judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford, canceling and annulling the reports of the special commissioners, and the judgment in condemnation by said court, and all proceedings under the application for condemnation, so far as the same affected the rights of Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford. It is shown there had been two applications for condemnation filed by the city of Dallas against Mrs. Dorsey Gibbs Crawford and others for different tracts of land, in which said application Dorsey Gibbs Crawford was alleged to have an interest in the land sought to be condemned or to claim an interest therein, and the said applications were carried under the respective docket numbers of 19419 and 19425 of the county court of Dallas county at law. The court consolidated these two cases on the motion of the city, under consolidated number 19425. The application of the city for condemnation in each case was presented to the judge of that court, and each filed with him on the 23d day of April, 1913. They were immediately docketed under the respective docket numbers, and filed with the clerk of the county court on that day. The judgment annulling the order, in so far as pertinent to the issues discussed, provided as follows:

"This judgment shall not be construed as affecting or setting aside any proceeding had or judgment rendered in said cause No. 19419 and 19425, or either of them, except so far as the rights and interests of Dorsey Gibbs Crawford are concerned, but as to Dorsey Gibbs Crawford, and every interest of hers in any of said lands, same and every part of said judgment, reports of special commissioners, and all proceedings thereunder are vacated, annulled, and declared void."

The trial court recited several special findings in his judgment, which are not deemed by us to be necessary to set out. The effect of the judgment was to hold that the court rendering condemnation judgment did not have jurisdiction over the appellee.

[1] The first assignment presents as error the action of the court in overruling the city's general exception to the petition. It is asserted that a petition in an action of this kind must not only allege facts authorizing the vacation of the decree, but should seek a new trial, which should be awarded, and in effect asserts it should show that the complainant has a meritorious cause of action, and that upon a new trial the result would likely be different. It is apparently appellants' contention that appellee is proceeding upon motion to correct an error of entry. We think the petition set up a cause of action as distinguished from a mere motion.

[2] Since the county court of Dallas county at law had power by judgment to vest title to real estate in the city upon condemnation proceedings, it is the proper court in which to file the petition, attacking the judgment therein, on the ground that the recitals in the record were false, and which recitals were necessary as precedent conditions to give jurisdiction and to establish aliunde the record in truth that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment. Ellis v. Railway Co., 203 S. W. 172. The petition alleges that the appellee is and was the owner of the land sought to be condemned; that at the time of the condemnation proceeding she was a minor and had no guardian of her estate; that she had no notice of the proceeding, and was not represented at the hearing before the commissioners, either in person or by attorney; that the award to her of $500 therein was grossly inadequate to pay for her interest in the property taken; that such sum in fact was never paid to her, and she has never received anything therefor; that she owned one-third of the property condemned, and that the commissioners and judgment only awarded to her about one-fiftieth of the damages sustained by the entire property; that her interest taken was at that time of the value of over $30,000; that the city had taken charge of the land and property and was trespassing thereon, etc. We think the petition shows on its face a meritorious case, and, if the judgment and report are set aside, probably a different result would be obtained. Upon setting aside the judgment in an ordinary action a trial would be had on the merits, as set up by the pleadings.

[3] The action instituted by the city, however, was a condemnation proceeding, which it alone could institute. A petition must be presented to the judge, describing the land, giving the name of the owners, etc. It is the petition which gives jurisdiction. The owner of the land and the city could agree on a commission to assess the damage, and the statute provides the judge should give preference to such persons. It is probable, under the condition of this case, the county court could not have proceeded under the old application and the commissioners appointed to condemn the land.

[4] It is also asserted by the appellee that the appellant, before seeking condemnation proceedings, did not offer to settle the damages, or to agree upon the damages with appellee, as required by the statute. We do not think the appointment of the commission invalid because there was no agreement between the parties as to the commissioners. The county judge appears, under article 6508, R. C. S., to have the power to appoint three disinterested freeholders. Johnston v. Galveston, 85 S. W. 515; Railway Co. v. Railway Co., 57 S. W. 312. If he so appointed the commissioners, such act would not be invalid. It is not our understanding of the statutes that it was essential to his power to appoint an agreement between the parties upon the commissioners should first be had.

Section 5, article 11, of the city charter, gives the board of commissioners of that city the power to take private property for public use in order to open, change, or widen any public street. Such property may be taken for such purposes by making just compensation to the owner. If the amount of such compensation shall not be agreed upon it is made the duty of the board of commissioners to state in writing the real estate or property sought to be taken, the name of the owner, his residence, etc., and present the same to the county court of Dallas at law, or to the judge of the court, who can, either in vacation or term time, appoint three disinterested freeholders and qualified voters of the county to assess damages. The special commissioners so appointed are governed by the laws for the condemnation of right of way for railway companies. Article 6506, R. C. S., provides:

"If such company and said owner cannot agree upon the damages, it should be the duty of said company to state in writing," etc.

There is a slight difference in the verbiage used in the city charter and the statute. The city charter stipulates if the amount of the compensation "shall not be agreed upon," while the statute provides if the parties "cannot agree upon the damages." The city charter would seem to authorize the application in writing if no agreement is made, whether there was any effort to agree previous to the application, while the statute seems to indicate that an effort is first required and a failure to reach an agreement established. It has been held that neither the county judge nor the commissioners appointed to assess damages can inquire into the truth of the statements contained in the written application. Such inquiry would be proper only upon a hearing in the county court on appeal from the commissioners. But that case leaves it inferable if there was a chance of agreement this might be shown upon appeal in the county court. Rabb v. La Feria, etc., 62 Tex. Civ. App. 24, 130 S. W. 918. In this case the application appears to have alleged a failure to agree between the owners and the city, and that they could not agree upon the damages. There is a conflict of authority on the question as to whether a failure to agree is a condition precedent to confer the right of eminent domain. "Statutes conferring the power of eminent domain usually require that an attempt shall be made before instituting proceedings to condemn it. In whatever form of words this direction is couched, it is generally held to be imperative as a condition precedent to the exercise of compulsory power." Lewis on Eminent Domain, vol. 2, § 497. "If the record fails to show such inability to agree, the proceedings are generally held to be void." Id. In Massachusetts, however, in a statute apparently worded as that of our own, it is held an attempt to agree is not necessary before application. Id. If, however, the owner is under disability, no attempt to agree need be made. It seems, however, that in the application it is essential that the inability to agree and reason for such inability should be set forth in the petition. Id. arts. 499, 500, 501; R. C. L., Eminent Domain, vol. 10, §§ 172, 173, p. 204. The exact question raised by us has not been passed upon by our courts in so far as we have been able to ascertain, but in general it seems to be recognized by our courts as a condition precedent that the application should state a failure to agree or an excuse therefor. Barnes v. Railway Co., 33 S. W. 601; Railway Co. v. Railway Co., 86 Tex. 537, 26 S. W. 54; McKenzie v. Imperial, etc., 166 S. W. 495; Ellis v. Houston Railway Co., 203 S. W. 172. The Supreme Court has recently given emphasis to the necessity of alleging and showing the necessary jurisdictional facts in condemnation proceedings. Haverbekken v. Hale (Sup.) 204 S. W. 1162. The facts and the petition in this case show that appellee was a minor, and therefore show the futility of an effort to agree as a condition precedent to the right of instituting condemnation proceedings.

The court finds appellee was not served, and that she did not appear and waive her rights, and her petition herein so alleges. Again the petition alleges the mother of appellee was appointed guardian ad litem for her before and without service on the appellee.

[5] It appears until service on the minor is had the court has no power to appoint a guardian ad litem. Sprague v. Haines, 68 Tex. 215, on page 218, 4 S. W. 371.

[6] It is also alleged that her mother was holding an adverse interest to appellee. If this is true, the appointment of the mother as guardian ad litem would be illegal. This court in the case of Knight v. Waggoner, 214 S. W. 692, had occasion to look into this question, and reached the conclusion that the purpose of appointing a guardian ad litem is to secure the disinterested services of a proper person to see that the minor's interests are fully protected and presented to the court. We call attention to the discussion of the question in that case.

[7] Until the statutes requiring notice are complied with, the commissioners have no authority to assess damages or to make a report, and the court has no jurisdiction to declare the condemnation. Parker v. Railway Co., 84 Tex. 333, 19 S. W. 518; Vogt v. Bexar County, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 272, 23 S. W. 1044. It is necessary, in order to give jurisdiction, that notice to the owner first be had. McIntire v. Lucker, 77 Tex. 259, 13 S. W. 1027; Adams v. San Angelo Waterworks, etc., 25 S. W. 165; Haverbekken v. Hale (Sup.) 204 S. W. 1162.

[8] The petition in this case alleges appellee's interest in the land did not vest by the judgment for the reason the court rendering it had no jurisdiction over her. The appellee had no power to bring into operation condemnation proceedings; that power is in the city alone. We do not understand that the appellee was required to request a new trial upon proceedings the petition and report of which were void, according to her allegations.

[9] The county court could only set aside the judgment, and without a report of the commission after first acquiring jurisdiction, the court, as we understand the statutes, could not, without such, condemn the land. Johnston v. Galveston, etc., 85 S. W. 511.

[10] The second assignment presents, in effect, that the court should have sustained exception 3 to the petition of appellee. It seems that the exception was urged on the ground that certain facts alleged were immaterial. Some of the facts go to the failure in the application for condemnation to sufficiently designate appellee's interest in the land, and the failure to prepare a plat by the city engineer of contiguous property to that sought to be condemned, and of the owners of such property, who would be required under the charter to pay their prorated proportion of the damages by reason of opening the street, and the report of the special commissioners to the mayor and city commissioners, and other matters, among which is an alleged agreement by appellee after the condemnation, which is assailed on the ground that it was not binding as to her for the reason that she was then a minor, and that she had since her marriage repudiated such agreement. Some of the matters alleged were proper, and none of them immaterial or irrelevant, as a history of the transaction; at least, we think there was no reversible error in overruling the exception.

The third assignment is based on the action of the court in peremptorily instructing the jury that appellee was not legally served in either of the condemnation proceedings, and instructing the jury to return a verdict for appellee. Appellee testifies she was never served with notice or citation. The deputy sheriff who claims he had the process for her testifies that he never delivered the notice to appellee, but left it with her mother, with the request that she deliver it to the appellee. Her mother, Mrs. Gibbs, testifies she never notified appellee or gave her any such notice, and, in fact, she testifies no such notice was left with her to serve or give appellee, with the instructions claimed by the deputy sheriff. The president of the special commissioners appointed to assess the damage testified that the question of notice and obtaining it was left entirely to the city attorney, and that the commissioners made no investigation in that matter. It is contradicted that neither Mrs. Gibbs nor appellee was present before the commissioners in person or by attorney. It is recited in the report that legal notice was served upon all the parties, among whom is named appellee, and that Mrs. Gibbs, the mother, was served as guardian ad litem of the appellee. This recitation in the report is carried forward in the judgment. We find in the record notice directed to all of the alleged owners set out in the application except the appellee, and returns showing service of notice on all the parties except appellee. There is no notice to Mrs. Gibbs as guardian ad litem for appellee or service on her as such. There is an order appointing Mrs. Gibbs guardian ad litem, dated May 9, 1913. The notice issued to Mrs. Gibbs was addressed to Mrs. S. A. Gibbs, personally, dated April 28th, and served on the 30th of April, 1913.

[11] We fail to find any notice or return showing notice and service on appellee except the recitals in the report and in the order approving the report. There is, we think, no evidence of notice on appellee as required by the statute (article 6514). We do not understand that it is asserted that appellee had a guardian of her estate; the only evidence of such notice being in the report where the president of the board says as to notice, the commissioners intrusted that to the city attorney to look after. The city attorney of that date does not testify in this case. The officer who had the notice to execute testifies positively that he did not serve it on the appellee. We see no fact which would authorize the issue to be submitted to the jury. We understand the minor must be personally served, and no guardian ad litem could be appointed until such service. Sprague v. Haines, 68 Tex. 215, 4 S. W. 871; Evans v. Livestock, etc., 81 Tex. at bottom of page 624, 17 S. W. 232. The Supreme Court has said: "Notice to the owner of the land sought to be condemned is necessary to jurisdiction, and this cannot be presumed from declarations contained in the report of the commissioners, nor from recitals in the decree of condemnation, but must be proved." Parker v. Railway Co., 84 Tex. 333, 19 S. W. 518; Adams v. San Angelo, etc., 25 S. W. 165; Crawford v. Frio, 153 S. W. 390; Cooke County v. Dudenhafer, 196 S. W. 976; Moseley v. Bradford, 190 S. W. 624, and authorities cited under the first assignment. Under the authorities above cited there was no controverted fact to submit to the jury, and there was no error in so instructing the jury. This being true, the court was without jurisdiction to render judgment condemning appellee's interest in the land to public use.

We do not think the second, third, and fourth propositions under this assignment present reversible error. It seems to be the contention of appellant that because, under the will of appellee's father, her mother had a life estate in the land, and because there is a provision with reference to property which may have been charged with a mortgage thereon, for that reason it was unnecessary to give appellee notice. Without trying to determine appellee's interest in the land, we think it sufficient to say, for the purpose of this case, that appellant stated in its application for condemnation proceedings that she had an interest in the land sought to be condemned, and showed the necessity of the proceedings to condemn it and of making her a party thereto. We do not understand it to be true that the county court can try title to the land, but, if proper steps were taken, its judgment may vest an easement or right under condemnation proceedings. We think if the judgment is valid as to other parties, and they in fact had the title thereto, such as would, under the proceedings, pass all the interest in the land, then the city could not be ousted, but that issue could not be determined in the county court, nor by us on this appeal. That question must be adjudicated in another tribunal.

The fourth assignment presents what is termed fundamental error. This seems to be based upon objections urged to the judgment of the court, on the ground that in part the court based its judgment vacating the former decree on other facts than that of notice, of which there was no evidence, for such supposed findings. This, as we conceive the question, cannot be fundamental error.

[12] Where it is shown the judgment was invalid because there was no valid judgment, other matters recited therein would not affect the judgment rendered; if void for one reason, it is void for all purposes. A wrong reason, given in part and recited in the judgment, will not affect the conclusion warranted by the facts and the law rendering the judgment void.

We believe there is no reversible error, and the judgment will be affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

We set out the judgment, which declares the former judgment shall not affect the interest of Mrs. Crawford in the land. It is declared only that the judgment, "and every part of said judgment, report of special commissioners and all proceedings thereunder, are vacated, annulled, and declared void." It is only the judgment and the report of the commissioners and the proceedings thereunder which are vacated. It says nothing as to the institution of the proceedings upon the application by the city to condemn the land. We held that, as Mrs. Crawford was at that time a minor, it was not necessary, as a condition precedent, to allege or show a failure to agree with her; that such failure would not be sufficient to set aside the judgment. Mrs. Crawford's disabilities as a minor are now removed. The reason that then applied would not now apply. The authorities, as we pointed out, on this question are not in harmony; that is, as to showing the necessity of the failure to agree before instituting the proceedings. It was not then, and is not now, as we conceive it, necessary to decide that question in order to dispose of this case. We cited several decisions from this state which were called to our attention, bearing, as we thought, upon the question. As suggested, the city must institute condemnation proceedings, and, as we understand, it was for it to determine what course it should pursue—whether it would first seek an agreement with Mrs. Crawford, or would file a new application, or proceed under the old petition. We did not believe that it was necessary for Mrs. Crawford to allege and show or to request that a hearing be had upon the old petition. We did not feel, and do not now think, it our duty to direct the course which should be pursued. Certainly the city cannot take Mrs. Crawford's land without condemning it by a proper judgment. If it does not see proper to institute proceedings for that purpose, she can sue for her interest. Should the city be able to show that it has all her title, by condemning the property as that of others, and paying therefor, it doubtless can defeat

Mrs. Crawford in a recovery of the land or damages.

[13] A suit for the land or for damages may force the city to take the statutory method of condemnation, or proceed under article 6531, Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes. Railway Co. v. Benitos, 59 Tex. 326; Railway Co. v. Ortiz, 75 Tex. 602, 12 S. W. 1129. But these statutes and decisions are a long way from holding that the owner of land can institute condemnation proceedings. The city, having a void judgment, did not acquire thereunder the appellee's land. She had a right to show this judgment was obtained without jurisdiction over her person; but, as we believe, she was not required in setting aside that judgment, as a piece of evidence against her title, to ask that the city proceed to condemn. This, as we believe, was not necessary to her rights, under the statutes and decisions of our courts. However, if the city desires so to proceed, that is for its determination, and the question presented by appellant in its motion may then properly be determined; but we think it was not necessary on this appeal that we should attempt to forestall any course of action the city may take or any decision that might be made on such action.

We believe the case was properly disposed of by the trial court, and the motion for rehearing is overruled.

KRAUSE et al. v. HARDIN et al. (No. 6391.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied May 26, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §68 — Possession of land not described in deed as intended gives title.

Actual adverse possession of the land in controversy for more than 20 years gives title to the land, though the deed under which possession was originally intended to be taken described a different tract of land.

2. Quieting title §44(2)—Quitclaim to another irrelevant where plaintiffs have title by adverse possession.

In suit to quiet title, where plaintiffs established title by adverse possession, a quitclaim deed given by one of the defendants to another conveying her interest as heir of the common source of title is irrelevant.

3. Quieting title §44(2)—Agreement affecting land not claimed is immaterial.

In a suit to quiet title to land which plaintiff had acquired by adverse possession, though his deed described a different tract, an agreement between defendants relating to the tract described is irrelevant and immaterial.

4. Adverse possession §110(1)—Defense to trespass to try title without confession and avoidance.

Under the statute making possession of land under certain circumstances a perfect defense to trespass to try title if pleaded and proved, such possession is a defense, though not pleaded by way of confession and avoidance.

5. Adverse possession §31—Possession sufficient notice to start statute running.

Actual possession and cultivation of the land in controversy is all the notice required to start the running of the 10-year statute of limitations, whether the possessors had any deed to the land or not, and whether the record owners knew of their own interest.

6. Limitation of actions §187—Privilege of infancy or coverture is waived by failure to plead.

Infancy and coverture as an avoidance of the bar of limitations are personal privileges which are waived by a failure to plead them.

7. Reformation of instruments §2—Mistake in giving grantee possession of land not described does not warrant correction of field notes.

Where deeds correctly described a tract of land in accordance with the field notes, but by mistake the grantor put the grantees in possession of a different tract, and such possession was retained long enough to give title to the tract, there was no basis for a correction of the field notes.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. T. Sluder, Judge.

Suit by Louis Krause and others against Martha Hardin and others to remove a cloud on title and to correct a mistake in deeds. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and judgment rendered for plaintiffs.

Gulnn & McNeill, of San Antonio, for appellants.

S. D. Hopkins, of San Antonio, for appellees.

FLY, C. J. This is a suit instituted by Matilda Krause, joined by her husband, Louis Krause, and L. W. Wilson, against Martha Hardin, her husband, T. H. Hardin, and Carrie Hardin Cornelison and her husband, Richard Cornelison, the name of the last-mentioned woman having been changed, on some ground not disclosed, from that given to "Carrie Hardin Cornelison Vinson, Jr.," seeking to remove cloud from the title to a certain 100 acres of land in Bexar county and to correct a mistake and misdescription in certain deeds, and in the alternative for the value of improvements made in good faith. After a lengthy pleading of facts, appellees prayed for "judgment for the title and restitution of the above-described property," for damages, costs, and general and special relief, and filed a cross-action in trespass to try title. A verdict was instructed and the jury in response returned the following verdict:

"We, the jury, find against plaintiffs and in favor of defendants for title to the property herein in controversy, and we further find against defendants on their cross-action."

On that verdict the court rendered judgment in favor of Martha R. Hardin and her husband, T. H. Hardin, and Carrie Hardin Cornelson Vinson, Jr., and her husband, W. M. Vinson, Jr., for the land in controversy; that they take nothing on their cross-action and recover all costs.

The first assignment of error assails the action of the court in overruling certain exceptions, which were probably intended as special exceptions, to the answer of appellees, but which were so general as to be nothing more than a general demurrer. The first is that the answer states that appellants claim the property through appellees because the allegation is irrelevant and states no defense. The second is that the answer states no legal defense to appellants' special claim of title. The answers are not subject to the objections, which are vague and indefinite, and the assignment of error is overruled.

The common source of title was James H. Coker, who executed a will in which he bequeathed to his son James M. Coker 40 acres of land lying between the land of said James M. Coker and the land of A. Maltzberger; to his daughter Martha R. Hardin 100 acres of land in survey 80, and known as lot No. 1, adjoining Z. F. Autrey tract on west side; to his daughter Ruthasun Maltzberger 100 acres of land in survey 80, known as lot No. 4, adjoining the tract of Julia E. Kelley; and to his son John H. Coker about 187 acres and other real and personal property possessed by him, "provided he shall take care of and provide a comfortable home and other necessities that may be required by my wife, Josey Ann Coker, during her natural life, or so long as she remains unmarried, provided also that my son, John H. Coker, shall pay all just debts that I may be owing at my death." The testator's brother, N. B. Coker, and his son John H. Coker were appointed independent executors of his estate. The will was dated October 3, 1888, the testator died on October 2, 1892, and his will was probated on January 21, 1893. John H. Coker took charge of the estate as executor. On March 18, 1896, John H. Coker, independent executor of the estate of James H. Coker, deceased, in consideration of $900, sold to Leopold Fincke 100 acres of land out of the estate; it being recited in the deed and testified to by John H. Coker that the sale was made to obtain money with which to pay off a certain sum secured by a mortgage on the land conveyed, executed by the deceased, James H. Coker, in June, 1892, a few months before his death. The executor intended to sell to Fincke the lot known as 1A, described in the will as lot No. 1, and given to Mrs. Hardin, and he placed Fincke in possession of that tract, but the description by field notes was of lot No. 4, belonging to Mrs. Maltzberger. This mistake was carried by Fincke into the deed made by him to R. F. Pipes, who took possession thereunder of lot No. 1, and in the same way it passed from Pipes to the Krauses, who also took possession of lot No. 1. Since 1896 parties claiming under the deed to Fincke by the executor in 1896 have held undisturbed possession of lot No. 1. Appellants sought to correct the description so as to conform it to the actual land sold. While living, James H. Coker made, executed, and delivered to John H. Coker a deed to 163 acres which some three years before he had named in his will as a bequest to John H. Coker. In September, 1896, all of the heirs of James H. Coker, deceased, among the number Mrs. Hardin, ratified the sale by John H. Coker to Fincke, and one of the notes secured by vendor's lien was given to Mrs. Hardin and accepted by her as her portion of the estate of her father. The misdescription of the land was never discovered until Krause sought to sell to L. W. Wilson, probably in 1915.

Appellees introduced in evidence a document, dated January 2, 1889, executed by James H. Coker, deceased, to Martha R. Hardin in which he conveyed to her 100 acres of land to be held by her during her life and then to go to her heirs born or to be born. Appellees also introduced in evidence a quitclaim deed by the Hardins, which was executed to John H. Coker on January 10, 1893, to all interests held by them in the estate of James H. Coker, deceased. Mrs. Vinson is the only offspring of Mrs. Hardin. The latter swore that the deed in trust to the 100 acres of land was delivered to her by her father, but was returned to him by her, in order that he might convey the title to her unincumbered with a trust. He did not make such a deed and did not return the other deed. Mrs. Hardin got the original deed after her father's death. Mrs. Carrie Hardin Cornelson Vinson, Jr., only child of Mrs. Hardin, was born on September 11, 1896, several months after Leopold Fincke had gone into possession of the land in controversy.

Appellants pleaded three, five, and ten years' limitation in replication to a cross-action in trespass to try title filed by appellees. Disability of marriage or infancy was not pleaded by appellees in answer to pleas of the statute of limitations by appellants. It was admitted by appellees that one of the appellants, Matilda Krause, who held title from her husband, "is now, and with those under whom she claims for the last 20 years has been, in actual peaceable possession of the tract of land sued for herein by metes and bounds." The evidence showed without attempt at contradiction that the possession was not only peaceable, but was adverse to the whole world.

Pipes bought the land in 1897, took possession of it, and put the tillable land in cultivation. The land was fenced. Pipes raised crops on the land for five years, and then sold it to Krause. He says: I claimed the land as my own against all persons." No one ever disturbed his possession. The whole of the 100 acres was under fence, and all the tillable parts of it were put into cultivation by Pipes. Krause bought the land in 1902 and went into immediate possession of it. All the taxes were paid by Pipes and Krause, and the latter held possession adverse to every one all the time until this suit was instituted in 1919.

[1] The evidence fails to disclose that Mrs. Hardin was ever in possession of the land in controversy, although it is stated in the brief of appellees that Mrs. Hardin was in possession of it in 1893, 1894, and 1895. If that had been proved, the fact remains that Fincke took possession of the land in the first part of 1898, and that adverse possession has been held of it from 1897 to the present. How the evidence as to limitations was avoided does not appear from the record, nor does the brief of appellees reasonably account for it. The trial judge filed no conclusions of fact and law, and we cannot determine upon what theory he instructed a verdict for appellees. If he did so on the ground that appellants went into possession of a tract of land not described in their deed, the answer is they went into possession of the tract of land in controversy and held it adversely, using and cultivating it as their own for over 20 years, and the fact that they had no deed to the land could not affect their title by limitations. They went into possession of land which was pointed out to them by their vendor, and which he, as well as they, honestly believed had been faithfully described in the deed. We may ignore the deeds altogether and still the land belongs to appellants, even if it be admitted, as claimed by appellees, that the adverse possession of the land began after the birth of Mrs. Vinson; that is, when it was sold by Fincke to Pipes.

[2] Mrs. Hardin and her husband made a quitclaim deed to John H. Coker on January 10, 1893, releasing all claims they might have to 187 acres of land "as well as in other interests to and included in, by, and under written will or wills made by James H. Coker, late of Bexar county, Texas, dec'd." This was introduced by appellees over the protest of appellants. It tended to show, if anything, that Mrs. Hardin had parted with all the interest she had in her father's estate as evidenced by a will made by him. We fail to understand why appellants should have objected to it. It had no possible effect on the issues in the case, and should not therefore have been admitted in evidence.

[3] Some time in September, 1896, all of the heirs of James H. Coker, deceased, among the number T. H. Hardin and Mattie R. Hardin, entered into a written agreement wherein it was recited that James H. Coker had given a note for $500 to one S. S. Thomas, and secured its payment by a deed of trust on 100 acres of land out of his estate; that the maker of note and mortgage had died without providing in his will for the payment of the debt; that John H. Coker, executor, on March 18, 1896, sold the land to Fincke for $736 cash and a vendor's lien note for $164.64, due seven months after date, and it was agreed that the note for $164.64 be transferred and delivered to Mattie R. Hardin, as her part out of the estate of her father, and each and all of them released John H. Coker from all liability for his acts in connection with the estate. The evidence shows that the agreement was not acknowledged for ten years after its execution, and the only evidence of its record is the statement of John H. Coker that he did not know where the document was, but that it was "in the abstract and records," whatever that may mean. However, not being acknowledged until 1906, if recorded, it could not have been before September, 1906. It could have had no effect except to show that Mrs. Hardin had released all her claim to any part of her father's estate and could in no wise have affected the interest of Fincke, Pipes, or Krause to the land in controversy. They were not parties to the agreement, had no interest in it, and it could not affect their adverse possession of 1A, because it was in regard to lot 4A, which they have never claimed. The parties to the agreement were referring to a mortgage on lot 4A, which appellees admit was the lot on which the mortgage was given by James H. Coker, and not to lot 1A, which was in the possession of Krause and vendors. If any effect is given to the agreement in this case, it would be that it had conveyed the life interest of Mrs. Hardin in lot 1A to her brother, and would preclude her from any recovery in this suit.

[4] Appellees contend that, if appellants pleaded limitations as "defensive matter" to an action of trespass to try title, such pleading would "have no force or effect in confession and avoidance"; but limitation is a defense to an action of trespass to try title without reference to any plea in confession and avoidance. The statute makes possession of land for three, five, or ten years under certain circumstances a perfect defense, with no conditions except that either be pleaded as prescribed by statute and then proved.

[5] Possession of the land in controversy was all the notice required to start the running of the statute of ten years, whether the possessors had any deed of conveyance to the land or not. If Mrs. Vinson knew nothing about having any interest in the land until this suit was instituted, that could have no effect on the running of the statute.

[6] Infancy and coverture are personal privileges, and can and will be waived by a failure to plead them, and any pleading seeking to avoid a plea setting up the statutes of limitation should state such facts as show that the statute could not have run. Infancy and coverture were not pleaded in bar of the statute nor are they or either of them urged in the brief of appellees. Campbell v. Wilson, 23 Tex. 252, 76 Am. Dec. 67; Foster v. Eoff, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 47 S. W. 399.

[7] The evidence showed that there was no mistake made as to the description of the land placed in the deed executed by John H. Coker to Fincke, but that the field notes were taken from the mortgage given by James H. Coker to Thomas. The only mistake made was that by which John H. Coker placed Fincke in possession of the tract of land not described in the deed. It follows that there was no basis in the evidence upon which to correct the field notes.

Because the evidence showed without controversy that appellants had title to the 100 acres of land known as lot 1A by limitation of ten years, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and judgment here rendered that appellants recover of appellees the said land and be quieted in their title thereto, and that appellants recover of appellees all costs in this behalf expended.

TALERICO et al. v. GARVIN. (No. 6405.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 5, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Witnesses \S 345(1) — Not impeached by showing indiotment.

A witness cannot be impeached by showing that he had been indicted.

2. Witnesses \S 345(2)—Not impeachable by conviction of other than infamous crime.

A witness is not incompetent and so cannot be impeached, in a civil case, by reason of having been convicted of a crime, not an infamous crime under the common law, as defrauding a railway company, in violation of the Interstate Commerce Act.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. T. Sluder, Judge.

Action by W. H. Garvin against Frank Talerico and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

P. H. Shook, and Carl, Swearingen & Clifton, all of San Antonio, for appellants.

Victor Keller, of San Antonio, for appellee.

FLY, C. J. Appellee sued Blas Catalini, Frank Talerico, and Willie Talerico, doing business under the firm name of Frank Talerico, to recover the sum of $1,197.02, alleged to be due on a car of fancy Bartlett pears shipped to them by appellee from the state of Colorado, and for which they refused to pay. The appellants defended on the ground that the pears arrived in a damaged condition, and appellants refused to accept the same and so notified appellee, and they impleaded the Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Railway Company, and prayed for judgment over against it in case of a recovery by appellee. The cause was presented to a jury on one special issue:

"Did defendant Talerico accept the car of fruit on the team track of the defendant railway company?"

The jury answered in the affirmative, and the court rendered judgment in favor of appellee against appellants for $1,400.66, principal and interest, and that appellants take nothing on their cross-action against the railway company. This appeal is prosecuted as between appellants and appellee, the railway company being omitted from the appeal bond.

[1, 2] The principal witness for appellants was Willie Talerico, and, with his testimony discredited, the defense presented to the claim of appellee was greatly weakened, if not destroyed. Under this state of facts, appellee, over the objections of appellants, introduced in evidence the copy of an indictment returned to the United States District Court for the Western District of Texas charging Willie Talerico with offenses against the Interstate Commerce Act (24 Stat. 379) in defrauding certain railway companies. Appellee was also allowed to prove that the witness was convicted on the charge and fined $1,000. All of the testimony in connection with the charge in the federal court was objected to by appellants, on the grounds that the witness was not convicted of a felony, nor could the witness be impeached by such testimony. The sole object of the testimony was the impeachment of the witness, and not to disqualify him as a witness. No objection was interposed to Willie Talerico being introduced as a witness on the ground that he was disqualified by his conviction, but he was allowed to testify, and then the testimony objected to was introduced on cross-examination for purposes of impeachment alone. In the case of Railway v. Creason, 101 Tex. 335, 107 S. W. 527, the Supreme Court, in answer to a certified question from the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second District, held:

"That it was not competent on cross-examination to impeach the witness Apple by proving by him that he had been indicted for a felony or other crime."

So in the case of Western Assurance Co. v. Hillyer, 167 S. W. 816, this court held:

"That it is not competent to impeach a witness by proving that he has been indicted for a felony or other crime, and the inquiry should be confined to proof of general reputation for truth."

That rule is well established in Texas Railway v. Dumas, 93 S. W. 493; Railway v. Burleson, 157 S. W. 1177; Cooper Grocery Co. v. Neblett, 203 S. W. 365.

In the last-cited case, it was held that a conviction for unlawfully engaging in the business of a retail liquor dealer and imprisonment in the penitentiary was not a conviction for such infamous crime as would render a witness incompetent to testify, and not being incompetent his former conviction was not admissible to impeach his testimony. It must be kept in view that there is no law in civil cases, as in criminal cases, disqualifying a witness if convicted of a felony, and the common-law rule in civil cases must prevail. Under the common law, a person who had been convicted of treason, felony, and what was denominated crimen falsi, rendered a witness incompetent to testify. As stated by Mr. Greenleaf in his work on Evidence, § 373, the extent and meaning of the term crimen falsi is not laid down with precision, however, the common law does not make the term so extensive as does the civil law, and does not as in the civil law include deceits in the quality of provisions, deceits by false weights and measures, conspiracy to defraud by spreading false news and several others. The author gives as examples of crimes, conviction of which render a witness incompetent, forgery, perjury, subornation of perjury, suppression of testimony by bribery, or conspiracy to procure the absence of a witness, or other conspiracy, to accuse of a crime, and barratry. To generalize, it is a conviction of a crime which may injuriously affect the administration of justice, by the introduction of falsehood and fraud.

The crime, for which Willie Talerico was convicted in the federal court, was that of perpetrating a fraud on a railway company and obtaining money from it, and was not, under the common law, a conviction for an infamous crime. The conviction did not render the witness incompetent, and consequently he could not be impeached by showing the conviction. Railway v. Burleson and Grocery Co. v. Neblett, herein cited.

It is held in this state that, where a party has pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor under an indictment charging both felony and misdemeanor, the conviction is not admissible to impeach him as a witness. Railway v. Dumas, hereinbefore cited, in which a writ of error was denied by Supreme Court. In the cases of Railway v. De Bord, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 691, 53 S. W. 587, and Winn v. Winn, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 617, 57 S. W. 80, it was held that convictions for theft cannot be shown to impeach a witness in a civil case.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

D. SULLIVAN & CO. v. SCHREINER et ux.
(No. 6396.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied May 26, 1920.)

1. Evidence §419(2)—Consideration for deed may be shown by parol.

The real consideration for the execution of a deed may be shown to be different from that expressed therein by parol testimony, and the admission of such testimony does not depend upon the existence of fraud or mistake.

2. Evidence §441(1)—Parol evidence to contradict, change, or add to written contract, inadmissible.

The execution of a contract in writing is deemed to set aside all oral agreements theretofore made, and any representation made prior to or contemporaneously with the execution of the contract is inadmissible in the absence of accident, fraud, or mistake of fact to contradict, change, or add to the plain terms.

3. Evidence §442(1)—Parol evidence admissible when contract incomplete.

If it is apparent from a written contract that it contains only a part of the agreement, oral testimony will be permitted to supply the omission.

4. Evidence §419(1)—Consideration may not be varied by parol if contractual in nature.

The rule permitting the true consideration of written instruments to be shown by parol does not apply, where the statement in the contract as to the consideration is more than a mere receipt or acknowledgment of payment and is of a contractual nature.

5. Evidence §441(3)—Provision of deed that debts were not released could not be contradicted by parol.

Where a deed recited that the consideration was a credit on a note and the payment of other debts to a specified amount which were a lien on the property, and further provided that the grantee did not release or change any security it had on other property to secure the balance due on the note or any of the debts of the grantor due it, but that all such other security was specially retained, such provision could not, in the absence of accident, fraud, or mistake, be contradicted by evidence that the grantee agreed to cancel all the grantor's indebtedness, though the evidence was offered under the guise of showing the true consideration.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. T. Sluder, Judge.

Action by D. Sullivan & Co. against Charles F. Schreiner and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Denman, Franklin & McGown, of San Antonio, for appellant.

Ryan & Matlock, of San Antonio, for appellees.

FLY, C. J. Appellants sued Charles F. Schreiner and his wife, M. L. Schreiner, to recover on four promissory notes: Two for $1,000 each, dated December 1, 1909, due December 1, 1914; one for $12,500, dated June 4, 1915, payable one year after date; and one for $5,500, dated September 27, 1915, due on September 27, 1916. The first two notes were executed to Gus J. Groos, as well as a trust deed on 182 acres of land to secure same, and the Cowans sold the land to Schreiner, and a vendor's lien was reserved thereon, and they passed into the hands of appellants. The third note named was given to appellants by Charles F. Schreiner and his mother, Louise B. Schreiner, and a deed of trust given on lots in San Antonio and lands in Wilson and Guadalupe counties, to secure it. On that note was a credit of date November 2, 1915, for $3,447.38, and another of date November 21, 1916, for $7,500. It was also alleged that since the filing of the suit appellants had acquired from Emma Camerer a note for $1,000 signed by appellees, secured by trust deed on certain city lots. The answer of appellees sought to defeat the claim of appellants and recover a judgment for themselves in the sum of $1,500 on the allegation in brief that appellants had secured a deed to certain land from appellees in San Antonio at the corner of North Flores and Salinas streets in consideration of the cancellation of all the indebtedness due and to become due by appellees to appellants and the sum of $1,500 in addition which was to be paid to the appellees, although it was recited in the deed from appellees to appellants that the consideration was that $7,500 be credited on the $12,500 note and the additional sum of $3,000 on certain indebtedness due by appellees. The cause was submitted to the jury on six special issues with the injunction that, if the first was answered in the affirmative, no other questions need be answered, to which first question they responded in the affirmative that the consideration for the execution of the deed by appellees to appellants of the North Flores street property was the complete cancellation of all indebtedness by Schreiner to appellants and in addition the payment to Schreiner of $1,500. Upon that answer judgment was rendered in favor of appellees to the effect that the deed be corrected to show the true consideration, that the whole of the indebtedness be canceled and all liens set aside, and that appellees recover of appellants the sum of $1,500 with 6 per cent. interest from November 17, 1916, and all costs.

The petition alleged, and Schreiner swore, that El J. Altgelt approached him to buy his homestead at the corner of North Flores and Salinas streets in the city of San Antonio, offering on the part of appellants, whom he claimed to represent, that they would, in consideration of a deed to the property, cancel all of his indebtedness to appellants and that they would in addition pay him $1,500 in cash on the trade. It was the claim of Schreiner that appellants employed Altgelt to purchase the property for them and make the offer he made to Schreiner. The latter also testified that Altgelt told him not to say anything about the offer and he would get the money for Schreiner. All of this was denied by Altgelt, and he and D. Sullivan swore positively that Altgelt had no authority from appellants to make such an offer and that Altgelt was not the agent of appellants. Appellants were not informed by appellees of the statements made by Altgelt, and appellants never made any statement to appellees about cancellation of the indebtedness and payment of $1,500 cash, and there was no testimony tending to show that they ever made any such offer to appellees or any one else. If Altgelt made any such offer to appellees, it was made before the deed was executed, and the terms of such agreement were not carried into and made a part of the deed from appellee to appellants. The deed to the North Flores street property is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: That we, Charles F. Schreiner and M. L. Schreiner, his wife, for and in consideration of the sum of seven thousand, five hundred dollars this day paid by Charles F. Schreiner to D. Sullivan & Company, a partnership composed of Daniel Sullivan and W. C. Sullivan, and by said D. Sullivan & Company credited on a certain promissory note for the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars, dated June 4th, 1915, executed by the said Charles F. Schreiner and payable to the order of D. Sullivan & Company, and secured by deed of trust upon the hereinafter described property; and for the further consideration that the said D. Sullivan & Company have paid existing indebtedness of the said Charles F. Schreiner, constituting claims or liens upon said property and aggregating the sum of three thousand dollars, have granted, bargained, sold and conveyed, and do hereby grant, bargain, sell and convey unto the said D. Sullivan & Company, said partnership so composed of the said D. Sullivan and the said W. C. Sullivan, all and singular the following described property and premises situated in the city of San Antonio, Bexar county, Texas, viz.:

"Lots numbers two (2) and three (3) in block 149, described by metes and bounds as follows: * * *

"It is specially understood and agreed, however, that the said D. Sullivan & Company in making said credit upon said note and accepting this conveyance of said premises do not release or change in any way whatsoever any security they may have in and to any other property than the property herein conveyed to secure the balance remaining due upon said note or to secure any of the debt or debts due or to become due by the said Charles F. Schreiner to the said D. Sullivan & Company; but all such other security in whatsoever shape the same may be is specially retained by the said D. Sullivan & Company to secure the balance due upon said notes hereinbefore described, and any and all other indebtedness of the said Charles F. Schreiner to the said D. Sullivan & Company however said indebtedness may be evidenced.

"Witness our signature this the 17th day of November, 1916. Charles F. Schreiner.

"M. L. Schreiner."

The only testimony tending in the least to show that Altgelt was the agent of appellants was his statement to appellees that he was authorized by appellants to make the statement that he did to appellees. It is true that appellants suggested that the property be placed in the hands of Altgelt for sale by appellees; but there was no allegation that there was a fraudulent agreement between appellants and Altgelt to obtain a deed by the representations which the appellees swore he made, and the evidence does not tend to show such an agreement.

[1] There was no allegation of fraud or mistake in connection with the execution of the deed, but appellees admitted understanding the recitals of the deed. Appellees admit that there is no proof of fraud or mistake, when they state in their brief:

"The controlling major question in the case was: 'What was the real true consideration for the deed from Schreiner and wife to Sullivan & Co. to the North Flores street property?'"

Again appellees say:

"In other words, the only real important question is, could we by oral testimony, or otherwise, explain and show the true consideration for the deed and the actual agreement of the parties fixing such consideration?"

It is undoubtedly well settled that the real consideration for the execution of a deed may be shown to be different from that expressed therein, by parol testimony, and the admission of such testimony does not depend upon the existence of fraud or mistake. The rule enunciated is based on the ground that proof of the true consideration does not vary, but is consistent with, the terms of the contract, and does not change the rule that a parol agreement cannot be ingrafted upon a written contract, clear in its terms, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, but merely explains a consideration which was not fully expressed in the written contract. So in the case of an instrument which on its face appears to be a deed it may be shown to be a mortgage or a trust. It is also well settled that, while the consideration may be shown by parol, the terms of the written contract cannot be varied.

[2, 3] The execution of a contract in writing is deemed to set aside all oral agreements theretofore made, and any representation made prior to or contemporaneously with the execution of the written contract is inadmissible, in the absence of accident, fraud, or mistake of fact, to contradict, change, or add to the plain terms of the written contract. This rule is founded upon the recognition of the danger and inextricable confusion and untold injury that would result if inferior testimony could be used to alter or destroy a solemn contract in writing entered into by the parties thereto. It follows that when a written instrument on its face purports to be a complete expression of the whole agreement, and contains all the essentials of a complete contract, the presumption arises that every important and material matter connected with the agreement has been incorporated into the writing, and parol evidence is not admissible to vary its terms or add others to it. If, however, it is apparent from the writing that it contains only a part of the agreement, oral testimony will be permitted to supply the omission. 10 Ruling Case Law, p. 1030, § 208 et seq.

[4] The rule permitting the true consideration of written instruments to be the subject of inquiry, through parol testimony, does not apply where the statement in the contract as to the consideration is more than a mere receipt or acknowledgment of payment, and is of a contractual nature. In explanation of this rule it has been held that oral evidence cannot be introduced where it is stated in the conveyance that it is made for the settlement and release of specified claims. Baum v. Lynn, 72 Miss. 932, 18 South. 428, 30 L. R. A. 441; Railway v. Houlihan, 157 Ind. 494, 60 N. E. 943, 54 L. R. A. 787; McNinch v. Thresher Co., 23 Okl. 386, 100 Pac. 524, 138 Am. St. Rep. 803; Diven v. Johnson, 117 Ind. 512, 20 N. E. 428, 3 L. R. A. 308.

In the Mississippi case cited, Mary Irving executed a deed to Mary Grace Lynn, in consideration of the discharge and release of a certain debt due by the vendor to the vendee and $10 in cash, to certain land. Evidence was offered to show that not only was the debt mentioned in the deed to be paid by its execution, but also other debts due the vendee, and it was rejected by the trial court. The Supreme Court of Mississippi said:

"The deed now under examination contains, as is clearly to be seen, no mere recital of a consideration paid or to be paid. Its recital is only of the facts necessary to be stated to intelligently apply the contract of the parties to the subject-matter. Having set out the relationship of debtor and creditor, and the history of the transaction from which it arose, the deed then proceeds to state what the parties agreed, contracted, and did in reference to the dissolution of the relationship. Mrs. Irving did something. She conveyed the land to Mrs. Lynn. Mrs. Lynn did something. She released the debt to Mrs. Irving. One transferred a right; the other released a right. If it be said that the release was a mere recited consideration for the conveyance, it may with equal accuracy be replied that the conveyance was a mere recited consideration for the release; and therefore, if one of the terms of the contract may be varied by parol, because it is a consideration, so also may the other for the same reason, and by this process a solemn and executed written contract would be totally eaten away. The true rule is that a consideration recited to have been paid or contracted for may be varied by parol, while the terms of a contract may not be, though the contract they disclose may be the consideration on which the act or obligation of the other party rests. When the stipulation as to consideration becomes contractual, it, like any other written contract, is the exclusive evidence, and cannot be varied by parol."

[5] In the case under consideration, not only did the deed recite the crediting of $7,500 on a note due by appellees and the payment of other debts amounting to $3,000 which were a lien on the property, but it went further and stated that the execution of the deed was not to affect any lien or other debts held by appellants. It is provided, after reciting payment of $10,500 on the debt:

"It is specially understood and agreed, however, that the said D. Sullivan & Company, in making said credit upon said note and accepting this conveyance of said premises do not release or change in any way whatsoever any security they may have in and to any other property than the property herein conveyed to secure the balance due upon said note or to secure any of the debt or debts due or to become due by the said Charles F. Schreiner to the said D. Sullivan & Company; but all such other security in whatsoever shape the same may be is specially retained by the said D. Sullivan & Company to secure the balance due upon said notes hereinbefore described, and any and all other indebtedness of the said Charles F. Schreiner to the said D. Sullivan & Company however said indebtedness may be evidenced."

In the face of this firm written contract under the guise of showing another consideration for the execution of the deed, parol evidence was introduced that there were no other liens, no other debts, but all had been paid by the deed. The evidence had the effect of destroying the contract evidenced by the deed and creating another based on the oral testimony of appellees. To sustain such action would destroy the force and effect of written contracts made with the full knowledge and assent of the parties, and free from accident, mistake, or fraud, and consequently cannot be permitted. Railway v. Garrett, 52 Tex. 133; Railway v. Pfeuffer, 56 Tex. 66; Coverdill v. Seymour, 94 Tex. 1, 57 S. W. 37; Kahn v. Kahn, 94 Tex. 114, 58 S. W. 825; Paris Grocer Co. v. Burks, 101 Tex. 106, 105 S. W. 174. As said in the last case cited:

"Whatever may be the nature sought to be ascribed to the claim asserted under the parol evidence, it is in truth an attempt to ingraft upon the deed a parol condition. That this cannot be done we understand the authorities to hold uniformly. In connection with allegations of fraud, accident or mistake such a stipulation and its nonperformance may be employed in equity as the basis for a cancellation; but the bare effort to use it as in itself furnishing a ground for defeating or qualifying the deed is opposed to the well-settled rule that such instruments cannot be added to by parol. This cannot be evaded by calling the promise the consideration of the deed and invoking the rule often laid down that a consideration different from or in addition to that expressed may be shown."

The contract evidenced by the deed is on its face complete, not indicating that something not embraced therein had been agreed to by the parties. In no instance have we seen any case under such circumstances permitting such instrument to be varied by parol, even though proposed under the guise of showing the true consideration. In the case of Railway v. Jones, 82 Tex. 156, 17 S. W. 534, which we are told by appellees "is almost on all fours with this," it is stated in no uncertain terms that—

"It is clearly to be inferred from the instrument of writing executed at the same time the deed was executed that these instruments did not evidence the entire contract or all the contracts entered into between the parties"—and on that ground parol proof was admitted.

So in the later case of Warehouse Co. v. Davis, 108 Tex. 422, 195 S. W. 184, the rule is thus stated by a majority of the court:

"The general rule is that parol testimony cannot be received to contradict, vary, add to or subtract from the terms of a valid written contract. But one of the exceptions to the general rule is, that if the written instrument itself shows to be either ambiguous or incomplete parol testimony is admissible to show what the real contract was to the extent necessary to remove the ambiguity, and to make the contract complete in its terms which show to be incomplete."

To the same effect are all the cases cited by appellees, notably the case of Chapman v. Witherspoon, 192 S. W. 281, in which is copied and approved the declaration by Chamberlayne in his work on evidence that—

"Evidence of a prior or contemporaneous parol agreement or understanding is frequently received, where it is consistent with the writing in question, and it is apparent that the instrument was not intended as a complete embodiment of the undertaking."

In the present case, not only was the parol evidence inconsistent and irreconcilable with the terms of the written contract, but that contract was complete and bore on its face evidence that it was intended to embody and contain the whole contract.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and judgment here rendered that appellants recover of appellees the sums of money prayed for by appellant, with interest and attorney's fees, with foreclosure of the liens described and all costs in this behalf expended.

(May 6, 1920.)

The evidence showing that the 182 acres of land described in the pleadings as the "Schreiner ranch" was the homestead of Schreiner and wife at the time it was sought to place a lien on it, to secure the notes, one for $12,500 and the other for $5,500, it was not the intention of this court, although not clearly expressed in its decision heretofore rendered, to foreclose a lien on said homestead as security for such notes, but the vendor's lien alone was intended to be foreclosed on said property to secure the notes originally given to Gus J. Groos and described as the Chandler notes. The judgment has been rendered and recorded as herein indicated.

DALLAS RY. CO. v. EATON et al.
(No. 1627.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 2, 1920.)

1. Negligence \S 82—Contributory negligence not bar, unless proximate cause of injury.

Negligence on the part of the plaintiff will not bar recovery for injuries resulting from the negligent act of the defendant, unless plaintiff's negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

2. Negligence \S 136(25) — Proximate cause question for jury.

The question of proximate cause is one of fact for the jury, unless the facts are such that reasonable minds might not differ as to the conclusion to be drawn therefrom.

3. Street railroads \S 117(34) — Proximate cause of jitney passenger's injuries held for jury.

In an action for injuries to a jitney passenger, riding on the running board struck by a street car when jitney driver turned onto track in front of car, so that passenger was crushed between the jitney and the car, whether passenger's negligence in riding on running board in violation of a city ordinance was the proximate cause of injuries held under the evidence a question for the jury.

4. Street railroads \S 118(1)—Charge submitting jitney driver's negligence held justified by pleadings.

In action against street railroad for injuries to jitney passenger riding on running board, when jitney collided with street car, the pleading of jitney driver's negligence in driving at a reckless rate of speed and in driving on track in front of street car, and the pleading, in connection with plea of contributory negligence, that passenger violated an ordinance in riding on running board, without pleading that driver was negligent in permitting passenger to so ride, held to have justified charge submitting issue of driver's negligence, where court directed finding that passenger was negligent in riding on running board, since jury could not have understood such charge to have reference to violation of ordinance by driver.

5. Appeal and error \S 1062(1)—Submission of negligence of jitney driver in jitney passenger's action against street railroad held not prejudicial to street railroad.

In action against street railroad for injuries to jitney passenger in collision with street car, the action of the court in submitting the question of jitney driver's negligence in operation of car, if error, was not prejudicial to street railroad, where the evidence showed car employed to have been negligent, since concurring negligence on part of jitney driver would not have defeated recovery.

6. Street railroads \S 112(1)—Street railroad has burden of sustaining its plea that jitney driver's negligence caused passenger's injury.

In an action for injuries to jitney passenger in collision with street car, where street railroad pleaded as an affirmative defense that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the driver, the street railroad had the burden of sustaining such plea.

7. Appeal and error \S 1068(1) — Error in charging on burden of proof on issue cured by peremptory charge thereon.

In negligence action, any error in charging the jury as to the burden of proof on the issue of negligence of the plaintiff was obviated by the peremptory charge on the issue and the finding of the jury in response thereto.

8. Negligence \S 122(1) — Defendant must prove that contributory negligence was proximate cause of injury.

To establish the defense of contributory negligence, defendant must prove, not only that plaintiff was negligent, but also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

9. Damages \S 216(8) — Instruction as to mother's damages in action for services of injured minor son held not misleading.

In mother's action for injury to minor son, instruction submitting as a measure of mother's recovery such sum of money "as, paid now will be reasonable compensation to the plaintiff for the loss of the services, if any," of the son "until he becomes 21 years of age," held not misleading as against contention that it authorized damages for loss of services until he became 21 years of age, though evidence did not warrant conclusion that disability might continue until such time.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Kenneth Foree, Judge.

Suit by Mrs. Nevada M. Eaton and another against the Dallas Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Templeton, Beall, Williams & Calloway, of Dallas, for appellant.

S. C. Lewis, of Dallas, for appellees.

BOYCE, J. Mrs. Nevada M. Eaton sued the appellant railway company, in her own behalf and as next friend for her minor son, A. Y. Eaton, for damages on account of injuries inflicted upon the person of the said A. Y. Eaton in a collision between a street car, operated by the appellant, and a jitney, on which the said Eaton was riding. The defendant, denied negligence in the operation of its said car, and alleged that the negligence of the jitney driver was the sole proximate cause of the injury, and further that the said A. Y. Eaton was guilty of such contributory negligence as would bar a recovery. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff on the findings of the jury, and defendant prosecutes this appeal.

A. Y. Eaton was at the time of the accident about 18 years old, living with his mother, and contributing to her support. A street car operated by the appellant, ran into a jitney on which Eaton was riding, and he was injured thereby. The jitney, at the time it was struck, had all seats occupied, and the said A. Y. Eaton was standing on the running board on the left side. The jitney and the street car were going in the same direction. The testimony is conflicting as to whether the collision occurred as the jitney was attempting to pass the street car, or whether the street car came up behind the jitney and struck it. In view of the verdict of the jury, we find that the jitney was running along the street in front of the street car; that another vehicle turned out into the street in front of the jitney, and the jitney driver, in order to avoid this vehicle, turned out to the left, so that the left wheels of the automobile were across the right rail of the street car track. The street car struck the jitney while in this position, and pushed it along in front of the car. As it did so the jitney was moving around in front of the street car, and plaintiff Eaton was crushed between the side of the jitney and the front of the street car. The street car pushed the jitney, after it struck it, from 25 to 100 feet; the distance being variously estimated by the different witnesses. After the street car was stopped, there was some little delay in backing it off, so as to relieve plaintiff Eaton from his predicament. The jitney was not overturned, and none of the other occupants were injured. The evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the driver of the jitney was not negligent in his operation of the car, and that the collision was the result of negligence on the part of appellant's employees, operating the street car. There was at the time a city ordinance in force in Dallas, where the accident occurred, by which it was made unlawful to drive a motor bus while any person was standing or sitting on the running board, and by which it was also made unlawful for any person to stand on the running board of such motor bus while it was in operation.

The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff A. Y. Eaton was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in riding on the running board of the automobile at the time of the accident, but submitted to the jury the question as to whether this negligence "caused or contributed to cause the injury." The jury answered this question in the negative. Appellant, under various assignments, contends that there was no evidence to support the submission of such issue, or the finding of the jury in answer thereto; that it results, from the very manner of the infliction of the injury upon plaintiff Eaton, that his position on the automobile contributed to the injury, and that but for his position he would not have been injured, so that it ought to be held as a matter of law that A. Y. Eaton's violation of the city ordinance constituted such contributory negligence as would preclude recovery in this case.

[1, 2] Negligence on the part of the plaintiff will not bar recovery for injuries resulting from the negligent act of the defendant, unless plaintiff's negligence was a proximate cause of the injury. The question of proximate cause is one of fact for the jury, unless the facts are such that reasonable minds might not differ as to the conclusion to be drawn therefrom. The same principles of law governing the application of the law of proximate cause in the ordinary negligence case are applicable in cases of contributory negligence; these general principles have been so often stated by our courts that it is not necessary to restate them here. The leading case in this state is that of T. & P. Railway Co. v. Bigham, 90 Tex. 223, 38 S. W. 163. It can be certainly said that it conclusively appears from the facts of this case that plaintiff would not have been injured in the manner and way he was injured, but for his position on the running board of the jitney. But can it be said with certainty that he would not have been injured at all, but for such position? It can never be known whether, if the occupants of the automobile had all been on the inside, it might not have been overturned, with even more serious results to the occupants than was sustained. It is certain that plaintiff Eaton's weight on the outside of the center of gravity of the jitney, and on the side from which the impact was delivered, had a tendency to prevent its overturning. But, laying aside speculations of this character, and assuming that the evidence sufficiently shows that plaintiff would not have been injured at all, if he had not been on the running board of the car, we are nevertheless of the opinion that the question of proximate cause remained one of fact. The act of the defendant in running into the jitney was the immediate cause of the injury. Plaintiff Eaton's position had nothing to do with this act. His negligence merely placed him in a position to be injured by the negligent act of the defendant. The following statement has been frequently approved by the decisions as announcing the law in such cases:

"A prior and remote cause cannot be made the basis of an action, if such remote cause did nothing more than furnish the condition or give rise to the occasion by which the injury was made possible, if there intervened between such prior or remote cause and the injury a distinct, successive, unrelated, and efficient cause of the injury. If no danger existed in the condition, except because of the independent cause, such condition was not the proximate cause. * * * But, where the condition was such that the injury might have been anticipated, it will be the proximate cause, notwithstanding the intervening agency, or where such condition rendered it impossible to avoid injury from another contributing cause." 29 Cyc. p. 496.

To the same effect see the following authorities: Wells-Fargo v. Benjamin, 107 Tex. 331, 179 S. W. 513; Railway Co. v. Kelley, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 34 S. W. 813, 46 S. W. 863; Railway v. Votaw, 81 S. W. 133; Railway v. Ford, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 121 S. W. 713; G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Pendleton, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 421, 70 S. W. 906; Keevil v. Ponsford, 173 S. W. 518; Smith v. T. & P. Ry., 24 Tex. Civ. App. 92, 58 S. W. 151; Steele v. Burkhardt, 104 Mass. 59, 6 Am. Rep. 191; The Santa Rita (D. C.) 173 Fed. 413; 20 R. C. L. pp. 136, 137; Thompson on Law of Negligence, § 216.

In the case of Wells-Fargo Express Co. v. Benjamin, 107 Tex. 331, 179 S. W. 513, decided by our Supreme Court, plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the express company in so loading its truck that an article fell off of it and struck the plaintiff, who was standing nearby. The defendant claimed that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in putting himself in danger by going near the truck. It is certain that in that case the plaintiff would not have been injured, if he had not been in such position, yet the Supreme Court held that it would have been error to have submitted a charge which would bar recovery upon a finding of negligence by the plaintiff in going near the truck, without permitting the jury to pass on the question of proximate cause in that connection. This conclusion is based on the theory that reasonable minds might differ as to whether injury might be anticipated from the plaintiff's alleged negligent act in going near the truck. In the case of Railway Co. v. Ford, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 121 S. W. 713, the plaintiff took a position in front of an approaching engine, for the purpose of mounting the pilot. His foot caught between the ties and he was injured. It was held that, even if plaintiff was negligent in going in front of the engine, yet such act was not necessarily the proximate cause of the injury, since that resulted from the unforeseen circumstance of his foot becoming fastened between the ties; the condition of the ties being unknown to the plaintiff. In the case of Steele v. Burkhardt, 104 Mass. 59, 6 Am. Rep. 191, plaintiff left his team standing on the streets of a city, in violation of the city ordinance, and it was held that this act was not the proximate cause of an injury to the team, caused by the defendant's servant negligently driving against them.

[3] The plaintiff Eaton might be held to be bound to anticipate the danger of falling off the running board, or, if his body projected beyond the automobile, of being struck by some vehicle passing in the crowded streets of the city; but ordinarily one is not bound to anticipate the negligence of another. But, even if plaintiff were bound to anticipate the possibility of a violent collision, it does not necessarily follow that he was in the most dangerous position in such event. As it turned out, he was in the most dangerous position in the particular way in which this collision occurred, but in many imaginable cases of collision a position on the outside of the car might be the safest. Under the facts we have concluded that the court properly submitted to the jury as a question of fact the issue of proximate cause.

The court submitted issues as to whether the jitney driver was negligent, and whether such negligence, if found to exist, was the sole proximate cause of the injury. Under the fifth and sixth assignment, appellant insists that it was error for the court to submit any issue as to negligence on the part of the jitney driver, because it was undisputed that he was violating a city ordinance in driving the jitney with plaintiff Eaton on the running board. The defendant did not plead negligence on the part of the jitney driver in operating the jitney with passengers on the running board, but did plead that the said driver was driving said jitney at a dangerous and reckless speed, and that just as he passed in front of defendant's car the rear wheel of the jitney caught on the front of defendant's car, thereby swinging said jitney diagonally across in front of the street car, and that the driver of said jitney was guilty of negligence in these acts, which negligence was the direct, sole, and proximate cause of the injury.

The defendant did plead that the plaintiff was violating the city ordinance in riding on the running board of the jitney; this allegation being made in connection with the plea of contributory negligence. The court charged the jury that it was the duty of the jitney driver to exercise ordinary care with respect to the time and manner of the operation of his jitney, for the safety of the plaintiff and other passengers, and a failure to exercise such care would be negligence. The court further charged the jury that it was the duty of the plaintiff Eaton to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, and that a violation of the ordinance in reference to riding upon the running board of a motor bus was negligence. Following these instructions the court submitted an issue as to whether "the jitney driver was negligent, as the term 'negligence' has been defined in paragraph 4 of this charge." The jury answered "No" to this issue. Following this issue the court required the jury to answer, in the event such preceding issue was answered in the affirmative, the further issue as to whether the negligence of the jitney driver was the sole proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff Eaton. As we have already seen, the court directed the jury to find the plaintiff guilty of negligence by reason of his riding on the running board, but submitted to the jury the issue as to whether such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

[4, 5] It will be thus seen that the court's charge corresponded exactly to the pleading of the defendant. The issue of negligence on the part of the jitney driver submitted was evidently in reference to the manner of driving the jitney at the time, independent of the defense based on the plaintiff's riding on the running board. The pleading made such issue, and the court was justified in submitting it. There was no issue made by the pleading as to the negligence of the jitney driver in allowing the plaintiff to ride on the running board, and the jury evidently did not misunderstand the issues as submitted. Even if the defendant had pleaded negligence of the jitney driver in permitting the plaintiff Eaton to ride on the running board, there would be no reversible error in the charge of the court. The negligence of the jitney driver in such matter would be only a concurring cause with the act of the defendant in striking the jitney and thus producing the injury, and since the jury found that the defendant was guilty of negligence in striking the car, this concurring negligence on the part of the jitney driver in allowing the plaintiff to ride on the running board of the car would not defeat a recovery.

[6-8] No reversible error is shown by the ninth assignment. The defendant pleaded as an affirmative defense that the accident was caused solely by the negligence of the jitney driver, and the burden was upon it to sus-tain this plea, so that there was no error in the charge so placing such burden. Any error in charging the jury as to the burden of proof on the issue of negligence of the plaintiff was obviated by the peremptory charge on the issue and the finding of the jury in response thereto. As we have seen, an essential element of the defense of contributory negligence was that the plaintiff's negligence alleged should be found to be a proximate cause of the injury. Therefore a prima facie cause of contributory negligence was not made by the mere showing of negligence on plaintiff's part, so as to bring the case within the rule announced by the Supreme Court in the case of G., C. & S. F. Railway Co. v. Shieder, 88 Tex. 152, 30 S. W. 904, 28 L. R. A. 538. The burden was upon the defendant, in order to establish its defense of contributory negligence, to show both the fact of plaintiff's negligence and that it was a proximate cause of the injury. A conclusive showing of negligence did not shift the burden on the issue of proximate cause. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Bailey, 150 S. W. 962. Therefore there was no error in instructing the jury that the burden was on the defendant on this issue.

[9] The tenth assignment complains of that part of the charge which submits, as a measure of the mother's recovery in her own behalf, such sum of money—

"as, paid now, will be reasonable compensation to the plaintiff Mrs. Nevada Eaton for the loss of the services, if any, of the plaintiff A. Y. Eaton until he becomes 21 years of age, and for reasonable physician's and sanitarium bills, if any, incurred by her, as the direct and proximate result of the negligence of the defendant if any."

The complaint brought against the charge is that the evidence shows that the injury was temporary, and does not warrant a conclusion that it may continue until the said A. Y. Eaton should reach his majority. There is no claim that the verdict is excessive. We do not think that the jury could have been misled by the terms of this charge into awarding plaintiff any damages to which she was not entitled.

The other assignments are necessarily disposed of by the conclusions announced in the discussion of the assignments considered.

We find no reversible error, and the judgment will be affirmed.

TIMPSON & H. RY. CO. v. STATE.
(No. 2882.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 31, 1920.)

Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 489—Execution of bond suspended order appointing receiver and obligated him to return property.

The legal effect of execution of supersedeas bond by defendant railroad, proceeded against by the state for appointment of receiver, was to suspend order appointing receiver until railroad's appeal therefrom had been disposed of, and it became duty of receiver, if he had taken charge of property, to return it to railroad, and to refrain from exercising powers under appointment when notified of execution and approval of bond.

Application for injunction by the Timpson & Henderson Railway Company against the State of Texas. Writ granted.

R. E. Minton, of Groveton, for plaintiff.

C. M. Cureton, of Austin, and O. L. Stone, of Henderson, for the State.

HODGES, J. On October 3, 1919, the state of Texas, through the attorney general, filed in the district court of Rusk county an application for a receiver to be appointed to take charge of the Timpson & Henderson Railway Company. On March 5, 1920, the application was heard in vacation by Hon. O. L. Brachfield, judge of that judicial district, and an interlocutory order entered appointing H. Y. Noble as receiver and fixing his bond at $10,000. The bond was promptly executed and approved, and Noble thereafter took possession of the railway property. For some reason the order appointing the receiver was not entered of record until April 13th following. The Timpson & Henderson Railway Company perfected an appeal from that order within the time prescribed by law, and executed a supersedeas bond, which had been fixed by the court at the sum of $5,000, conditional as required by law.

This is an original application, filed by the railway company, asking that this court grant a writ of injunction restraining H. Y. Noble from retaining possession and attempting to exercise the functions of a receiver. It is alleged that notwithstanding the execution of the supersedeas bond above referred to, Noble retains control and refuses to surrender possession of the railroad equipment, books, papers, offices, depots, and other property belonging to the railway company. The legal effect of the execution of the supersedeas bond was to suspend the order appointing the receiver until the appeal therefrom had been disposed of. Carter v. Carter, 40 S. W. 1030; Cemetery Ass'n v. Cemetery Ass'n, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 668, 60 S. W. 679; Waters-Pierce Oil Co. v. State, 107 Tex. 1, 106

S. W. 326; Houston, B. & T. Ry. Co. v. Hornberger, 141 S. W. 311; Id., 108 Tex. 104, 157 S. W. 744. It was the duty of the receiver, if he had previously taken charge of the property, to return it to the railway company and refrain from attempting to exercise any of the powers conferred upon him by the order of appointment, when notified of the execution and approval of the supersedeas bond.

We are of opinion that the writ prayed for should be granted; and it is so ordered.

HOUSE v. HOUSE. (No. 2253.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
May 27, 1920.)

1. Wills \Leftrightarrow 372—Trial court exclusive judge of facts and credibility of witnesses.

In proceedings to probate a will, the trial judge was the exclusive judge of the facts proved, the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given their testimony.

2. Evidence \Leftrightarrow 590—Court could disregard testimony of interested witness.

The trial court, in proceedings to probate a will, had a right to discredit any portion of the testimony of proponent, an interested witness, which he regarded as having been colored by her interest.

3. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 931(5)—Court must assume trial judge disregarded interested testimony.

Court of Civil Appeals must assume trial court disregarded any portion of testimony of interested witness which he regarded as colored by her interest, if assumption is necessary to sustain judgment rendered.

4. Trial \Leftrightarrow 142—Undisputed evidence, giving rise to different inferences, presents a question of fact.

That evidence concerning material issues was undisputed does not make them any the less issues of fact, as it is only when reasonable minds would not differ as to the inferences to be drawn from a given state of facts that the question becomes an issue of law.

5. Wills \Leftrightarrow 288(1)—Proponent, 13 years after testatrix's death, had burden to show she was not in default.

Under Rev. St. 1911, art. 3248, providing that no will shall be admitted to probate after 4 years from testator's death, unless the party applying was not in default, proponent, proceeding for probate 13 years after testatrix's death, had the burden to show she was not in default.

6. Wills \Leftrightarrow 260 — Coverture of testatrix's daughter-in-law did not excuse failure to move for probate in time.

A married woman, daughter-in-law of testatrix, is not exempt from the limitation of

Rev. St. 1911, art. 3248, requiring proceedings for probate of a will to be instituted within 4 years from the death of testator, though her coverture probably might be looked to as a circumstance tending to excuse her delay.

7. Wills §300—Evidence held to justify finding testatrix's daughter-in-law failed to exercise proper diligence.

In proceedings to probate will by testatrix's daughter-in-law, divorced after testatrix's death, evidence held to justify finding of trial court that daughter failed to exercise degree of diligence imposed by Rev. St. 1911, art. 3248, on those who have right to probate testamentary instruments, in failing to move for probate of will for 18 years after testatrix's death, and 9 years after her own divorce.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Henry J. Dannenbaum, Judge.

Proceeding for probate of the will of Mary West House by Rosa Cave House, contested by Henry C. House. From an order refusing probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Abraham, of Los Angeles, Cal., and Kittrell & Kittrell, of Houston, for appellant.
E. P. & Otis K. Hamblen and A. R. & W. P. Hamblen, all of Houston, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This appeal is from an order of the district court of Harris county refusing the probate of an instrument claimed to be the last will and testament of Mrs. Mary West House. The facts show that prior to 1904 Mrs. Mary West House resided with her husband in Houston, Tex. They had but one child, Henry C. House, the appellee in this suit, who was at that time married to the appellant Rosa Cave House. Some time prior to her death Mrs. House prepared in her own handwriting and placed in the family safe the following instrument:

"Mary House, born New York, July 17, 1834—Texan since March, 1838—a Daughter of the Republic when it was no United States, but under brave Sam Houston: Wishes Ladies Parish Association, Ladies Annex of Y. M. C. A. and all old Houstonians to attend my obsequies. My nephew Jonie to have my horse Ned and my carriage. My diamonds to my niece L. B. My Solitaire ring and gold thimble to Eva House, Cali. Whatever furniture Rosa does not want give to my Cousin Emily—Henry knows who—I have forgotten her name, am sorry to say. May 3d, 1900. When Mr. House dies Rosa and Henry will have all we own but must see that Joe never wants. Want to be dressed in white cashmere with white satin ribbon, white silk hose and nice white underwear. Laid out by my old friends Carrie Keegans and Lottie C. Barret, if living themselves, with Tillie the nurse to help them."

This instrument was inclosed in an envelope which bore the following indorsement in the handwriting of Mrs. House:

"Mrs. H. C. House.

"Mother's Wishes, open if anything happens."

After the death of Mrs. House, which occurred on May 8, 1904, the envelope was opened by Henry C. House. The contents were read by him, the appellant (his wife), and her two sisters. The wishes of Mrs. House with reference to her burial and the disposition of the personal property mentioned were observed and her directions carried out. The instrument has continuously since that time, until it was produced in court on the trial of this case in 1918, remained in the possession of Henry C. House. Mr. House, Sr., survived his wife for a few years, and died some time during the year 1911. In the latter part of 1917, more than 13 years after the death of Mrs. Mary West House, the appellant filed her application in the county court of Harris county to probate an instrument, the substance of which is described as follows:

"I, Mary West House, of the state of Texas, born in the state of New York, do hereby will and bequeath to my daughter Rosie and my son, Henry, all of the property that I own or possess, share and share alike.

"I leave to my niece Lillian Barden all of my diamonds and cut glass.

"I want Rosie to see that my nephew Joe shall never want, and any household effects that she cannot use I want her to give to my nephew, Johnny Tucker. I want my friends, Carrie Keegans and Lottie Barret to lay me out, and I wish to be dressed in white."

As a reason for not presenting the writing itself, the proponent alleged that it was not at that time and never had been in her possession or under her control, and was not then within the confines of the state of Texas. The above application was contested by Henry C. House upon two grounds: (1) That more than 4 years had elapsed since the death of Mrs. Mary West House; and (2) because no such will as that alleged in the application had been executed by the deceased. The contestant admitted that a written memorandum of her wishes had been left by his mother, but denied that it was a will or a testamentary document entitled to probate. On the trial in the county court the written instrument heretofore set out was produced in evidence, and it appears to be now agreed by the attorneys representing both parties that such instrument was the memorandum executed by Mrs. House. The county court refused the application, and an appeal was prosecuted to the district court by the proponent. While the case was there pending she filed an amended application, asking that the written instrument produced by the contestant in the county court be probated as the last will of Mrs. Mary West House. The contest was continued upon the two grounds above mentioned—that is, that the right to have the instrument probated as a will was barred by the statute of limitations, and that it was not a testamentary document entitled to probate. From a judgment of the district court, refusing the application to probate, this appeal is prosecuted.

The trial court filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, from which we quote the substance, in so far as it embraces facts material to be considered in the determination of the question now presented:

After the death of Mrs. Mary House in 1904 the contestant and proponent continued to live together as husband and wife until their divorce in March, 1908, at which time their property rights were adjusted by a decree of the court as well as by deeds; but the settlement then made did not include or dispose of any interest of the proponent in the estate of Mrs. Mary West House, claimed by virtue of the alleged will. While the divorce proceedings were pending, the proponent mentioned to her attorney, Capt. James A. Baker, the existence of a written instrument left by Mrs. Mary West House, and described substantially the contents thereof, but told him that the instrument was not signed, whereupon her attorney advised her that it was not a will. The contestant had been in possession of the alleged will and envelope since the date of his mother's death. He had never denied its existence, had never refused to exhibit the same, and was never called on by the proponent to produce the same until the trial in this suit. The contestant continued to reside in Houston after his divorce until the fall of 1914, since which time he has maintained a home at Pasadena, Cal. In 1914 the proponent had a phone conversation with the contestant, during which she asked him if he intended to probate his mother's will, and he replied that he did not. She thereupon informed him that she considered that the will should be probated. The will referred to by her in that conversation was the instrument filed for probate in this suit, and which she had read immediately after the death of Mrs. Mary West House, in 1904. Proponent, however, had a different impression at the time of its verbiage and form, as was made to appear from her pleadings and testimony. At all times subsequent to their divorce the relations between the contestant and the proponent were unfriendly. The contestant has performed the directions contained in the written instrument offered for probate with reference to the horse, carriage, diamonds, solitaire ring, gold thimble, and furniture of Mrs. Mary West House; and if those directions are testamentary there now exists no necessity to probate said instrument for the purpose of executing them.

The court then concluded as a matter of law that in executing the instrument offered for probate Mrs. Mary West House did not contemplate or intend that proponent should receive one-half of her estate, but that the language used was merely an explanation of why she had not by the instrument given proponent and contestant mementoes in the way of trinkets. He also concluded that, since proponent knew that Mrs. Mary West House had executed the above instrument, knew that contestant was in possession of the same, had read it in 1904, and did not thereafter ask that it might be examined by her or her attorneys, that since she was contending in 1914 that said instrument was a will, and was then told by contestant that he would not probate it, in failing to move for the probate of the instrument or any instrument until 1917, she had not met the requirements of the statute, or shown herself entitled in equity to the probate of that instrument at this time, even if it be a will.

There are two assignments of error presented by the appellant. The first complains of the ruling of the court in holding that the instrument offered for probate was not a will; the second complains of the action of the court in holding that the proponent was in default in failing to sooner offer the instrument for probate. Logically, we think, the second assignment of error should be the first considered, since, if it should be determined against the appellant the difficulties presented in the other assignment will be obviated. Article 3248 of the Revised Civil Statutes is as follows:

"No will shall be admitted to probate after the lapse of four years from the death of the testator unless it be shown that the party applying for such probate was not in default in failing to present the same for probate within four years aforesaid. And in no case shall letters testamentary be issued where a will is admitted to probate after four years from the death of the testator."

[1-4] Thirteen years had elapsed between the death of Mrs. Mary West House and the first attempt made to probate that instrument as a will. A little more than 9 years of that time the proponent was a feme sole. The court to whom were submitted the issues of fact concluded that the proponent was in default, and for that reason was not entitled to have the instrument probated, even if it should be considered a will. The question before us is: Was the evidence such as to require the court to make a contrary finding? We are of the opinion that it was not. In this instance the trial judge was the exclusive judge of the facts proved, of the credibility of the witnesses, and of the weight to be given to their testimony. Proof of the conditions which tended to excuse the proponent for not sooner presenting the instrument for probate depended almost exclusively upon her own testimony. She was an interested witness, and the court had a right to discredit any portion of her testimony which he regarded as having been colored by that interest. We must assume that he did this, if such an assumption is necessary to sustain the judgment rendered. That the evidence concerning material issues was undisputed does not make them any the less issues of fact. It is only when reasonable minds would not differ as to the inferences to be drawn from a given state of facts that the question becomes an issue of law. The question before us may be stated in this form: The proponent knew of the existence of the instrument offered for probate, and was aware of its contents at the time the alleged testatrix died. She had the opportunity continuously thereafter to offer it for probate. She failed to offer it for more than 13 years. Query: Did she, under the circumstances, exercise reasonable diligence in filing her application? To say that reasonable minds might differ as to the answer that should be given to that question is, we think, to indulge as much liberality in favor of the appellant as she can justly claim. Had a jury been impaneled in the case, clearly that question should have been submitted to them.

[6] Under the terms of the statute quoted, the proponent had the burden of showing that she was not in default. The only ground relied upon to excuse her delay is that she was advised by her attorney that the instrument in question was not a testamentary document, and therefore was not subject to probate as a will. The term "default" means failure to do the act required; but, as used in the statute quoted, it means a failure due to the absence of reasonable diligence on the part of the party offering the instrument. When that party knows of the existence of the instrument and has full opportunity to file it for probate, a delay occasioned solely by doubts as to the legal character of the instrument is not, as a matter of law, excusable. The probate courts are the proper tribunals for the settlement of such questions. The proponent testified in substance that she knew of the existence of this instrument and read it immediately after the death of her mother-in-law; that she and H. C. House were then living together as husband and wife, and continued to live together for nearly 4 years thereafter. Her attorney, Capt. Baker, whom she consulted at the time the divorce was granted, told her the instrument was not a will. He did not see the instrument, but she repeated to him what she remembered as its contents, gathered by reading it upon the occasion above referred to. Capt. Baker then advised her that the instrument was not a will. She further stated that she afterwards discussed the instrument with many of her friends, some of whom were lawyers. In 1914 she called Mr. H. C. House over the phone and asked him if he was going to probate his mother's will. She told Mr. House then that she considered that the will should be probated; that she had never received her portion of the property, and gave him an opportunity. He replied that he did not intend to probate the instrument. She then told Mr. House that she was going to get a lawyer, and thereafter, in 1917, she consulted Mr. Abrahams, of California, who afterwards filed her application to probate the instrument.

There is nothing in the evidence tending to prove that she and her lawyer could not have inspected the document at any time they sought permission to do so. The court could not fairly assume that Mr. House would have refused to exhibit the instrument to them, had they requested the privilege of inspection. The testimony of the proponent clearly indicated that in 1914, if not before that time, she had ceased to fully rely upon the judgment of Capt. Baker, who had advised that the instrument was not a will subject to probate; yet, without any reason being shown, she thereafter waited for approximately 3 years before taking any steps to seek legal assistance in having the instrument offered for probate. While there is no specific command in our law that wills shall be probated within any given length of time, it is manifestly a part of the public policy of this state that this shall be done as early as practicable after the death of the testator. It seems reasonable to hold that, in order to escape the consequences of default, a degree of diligence above that usually adopted as a measure of ordinary prudence or care should be required of those having the privilege of probating testamentary instruments. The considerations which underlie the public policy increase the urgency of the performance of the duty which the law has coupled with the privilege of probating wills.

[6] The appellant, it is true, was a married woman for nearly 4 years after the death of Mrs. House, Sr.; but the law did not place any obstacle in the way of her filing an application for the probate of this instrument, if it be subject to probate. A married woman is not exempt from the limitation which requires such proceedings to be instituted within 4 years from the death of the testator. While her coverture probably might be looked to as a circumstance tending to excuse her delay, it did not exempt her from the limitation.

[7] We are of the opinion that the state of the evidence was such that the trial court had a right to conclude that she failed to exercise that degree of diligence which the law imposes upon those who have the right to probate testamentary instruments.

The judgment will be affirmed upon the grounds stated. We deem it unnecessary to discuss the other questions raised in the appeal.

GRAHAM et al. v. KNIGHT. (No. 2295.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana.
May 20, 1920.)

1. Injunction §118(1) — Petition of fence owners insufficient to entitle to relief.

Petition for injunction by fence owners, alleging that defendant tore the fence down, converted the material to his own use, threatened to kill an owner, if he found him on the land, etc., held insufficient to entitle plaintiffs to injunction.

2. Pleading §8(6)—Allegation entry on land was unlawful and wrongful a conclusion.

Allegation of petition of fence owners for injunction against defendant's interfering with their possession by tearing the fence down, etc., that defendant's entry on the land was unlawful and wrongful, held a mere conclusion of the pleader, and not entitled to force in construing the legal effect of the averments.

3. Injunction §172—Dissolution of temporary writ discretionary, where allegations denied by answer.

The truth of the allegations of the petition for injunction, so far as material to the matter before the trial court, having been denied in the answer, the court, under Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 4663, acted within his discretion when he dissolved the temporary writ.

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County;
H. F. O'Neal, Judge.

Suit by T. N. Graham and others against M. H. Knight. From a judgment dissolving a temporary injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This appeal is by appellants, T. N. Graham, W. T. Williams, S. A. Raffaelli, W. W. Whitfield, and Susie Whitfield from a judgment rendered March 8, 1920, dissolving a temporary injunction theretofore granted restraining appellee, M. H. Knight, from disturbing them in their possession of certain land.

The hearing in the court below was on the pleadings of the parties, which were sworn to, and the affidavits of certain other persons, made a part of appellee's answer. In their petition appellants alleged that on November 17, 1919, and long prior to that time, they had the land fenced, were in actual possession of and using and enjoying it, and had leased it for the year 1920. They further alleged that on or about December 15, 1919, appellee unlawfully went upon the land and wrongfully tore down and removed the fence, converting the material therefor to his own use. They further alleged that on or about December 20 appellee threatened to kill appellant W. W. Whitfield if he "caught said Whitfield on said land again," and that the threat was seriously made, "for purpose," quoting, "of intimidating the said W. W. Whitfield and the other plaintiffs herein." They further alleged that appellee was "preparing to unlawfully construct a fence of his own on and around the land in furtherance," quoting, "of unlawful designs to oust plaintiffs and each of them." And they further alleged that they would suffer "irreparable damage and injury to their property and right to use and enjoy same," unless they were granted the relief by injunction for which they prayed. In addition to such relief, appellants prayed for a money judgment against appellee for $150 as the value of the fence, and for $750 as damages. In his answer appellee did not deny that he tore down and removed the fence appellants referred to, nor that they owned same; but he did deny that appellants were ever in actual possession of and using and enjoying the land as they alleged they were, and alleged the fact to be that he was the owner of the land and held actual possession thereof at the time appellants commenced their suit, and that he and those under whom he claimed title had the land fenced, and held actual possession of and used and enjoyed it all the time from February 25, 1901, until the time when his answer was filed, to wit, January 5, 1920. He further alleged that appellants had been trespassing on the land, and prayed for an injunction restraining them from trespassing further thereon. The affidavits attached to the answer supported the allegations therein in regard to appellee's claim of title and in regard to the possession and use he and those under whom he claimed had made of the land since said February 25, 1901.

Todd, Graham & Williams and Rodgers & Rodgers, all of Texarkana, for appellants.
Mahaffey, Keeney & Dalby, of Texarkana, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above.) The contention presented by the assignments is that the trial court erred when he overruled certain exceptions urged by appellants to appellee's answer. The ground of the exceptions was that there was no denial in the answer of material allegations in appellants' petition. The argument is that the trial court therefore should have treated the allegations as true, and hence that he abused the discretion he had when he dissolved the temporary injunction.

[1] The contention assumes that the allegations in the petition, if taken as true, entitled appellants to relief by injunction. We do not think so, and therefore would not reverse the judgment, if we thought the answer was subject to the objection urged to it. As we view the petition, the allegations did not entitle appellants to such relief, and the trial court, for that reason, if for no other, should have dissolved the writ. San Antonio Water Supply Co. v. Green, 198 S. W. 631.

The fact that appellants owned a fence on the land, and that appellee tore it down and converted the material thereof to his own use, may have entitled appellants to recover damages of appellee, but it certainly did not entitle them to an injunction. The wrong, if it was one, was complete, and such a writ was not a remedy for it. Whitaker v. Dillard, 81 Tex. 359, 16 S. W. 1084; Acme Cement Plaster Co. v. American Cement Plaster Co., 167 S. W. 183.

So, the fact, if it was one, that appellee threatened to kill appellant Whitfield if he found him on the land, did not entitle appellants to the writ—certainly not, in the absence, as was the case, of allegations showing a right in Whitfield to go thereon. 14 R. C. L. 376.

Of course the fact that appellants had leased the land for the year 1920 was not a reason why the writ should have been granted.

Nor was the fact that appellee was preparing, if he was, to construct "a fence of his own on and around the land in furtherance of a design he had to oust appellants therefrom," of itself a reason why the writ should have been granted. Unless it appeared from the allegations in the petition that appellants had a right to the possession of the land as against appellee, they were not entitled to have him restrained from going upon and building a fence on it. They did not specifically allege, nor did they state facts showing, they had such a right. They did not allege either that they owned the land or were entitled to possession of it. Indeed, they did not even allege that their possession of the land was lawful. The averments with reference to this phase of the case were merely that—

"On and long prior to November 17, 1919, they had and held the land in their actual physical, open, and notorious possession, holding same under a good, sufficient, and secure fence, peaceably and without molestation, using and enjoying adversely to all others."

They might have had such possession of the land, and yet have been mere naked trespassers thereon.

[2] If it should be said that the defect just suggested was cured by the allegation that appellee's entry on the land was "unlawful and wrongful," the answer is that the allegation is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and not entitled to force in construing the legal effect of the averments in the petition. Birchfield v. Bourland, 187 S. W. 422.

"The rule of pleading," said the court (Weaver v. Emison, 153 S. W. 923), "that the statements of a party are to be taken most strongly against himself, is reinforced in injunction suits by the further requirement that the material and essential elements which entitle him to relief shall be sufficiently certain to negative every reasonable inference arising from the facts so stated, from which it might be deduced that he might not, under other supposable facts connected with the subject, thus be entitled to relief."

And see King v. Driver, 160 S. W. 415, Ross v. Veltmann, 161 S. W. 1073, and Shannon v. Hay, 153 S. W. 360, where it was said:

"In an application for an injunction, the well-recognized rule is that allegations of fact must be direct, certain, and particular."

The rule stated is applicable to another view of the allegations in appellants' petition. While appellants alleged that they were in actual possession of the land "on and long prior to November 17, 1919," they did not, except inferentially, allege that they had possession thereof on December 15, 1919 (when, they averred, appellee entered thereupon), or ever afterward. Observing the rule, the trial court might very well have concluded that it did not sufficiently appear from the allegations in the petition that appellants were in actual possession of the land after November 17, 1919.

While appellants sought both mandatory and preventive relief, the trial court granted their prayer only so far as it was for a writ restraining appellee from interfering with them in their possession and use of the land. The predicate for the relief the court granted was, of course, the allegations in the petition that appellants had actual possession of the land and that appellee was threatening to resort to unlawful means to deprive them of such possession. As we construe the answer, appellee not only denied that appellants had such possession of the land, but also denied that they were entitled to possession thereof, and alleged that he (appellee) owned it, that he was actually in possession of it from February 25, 1901, to the date of the filing of the answer.

[3] If, therefore, we doubted the correctness of the conclusion reached, that it did not appear from the petition that appellants were entitled to the relief they obtained, we nevertheless would affirm the judgment; for the truth of the allegations of the petition, so far as they were material to the matter before the trial court, having been denied in the answer, the court acted within his discretion when he dissolved the writ. Article 4663, Vernon's Statutes; Harris v. Thomas, 217 S. W. 1068; K. & L. of Honor v. Cole, 62 Tex. Civ. App. 500, 131 S. W. 1180.

The judgment will be affirmed.

KIRTLEY et al. v. SPENCER et al.
(No. 1659.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo.
April 28, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 2, 1920.)

1. Charities —21(4)—Beneficiaries sufficiently described.

Testamentary gift to trustees, invested with discretionary powers as to manner of expenditure, to aid a school founded by testator, at which white children between the ages of 6 and 21, shall be admitted free of tuition, preference to be given those who have been in attendance before and those who reside in the district, held to sufficiently describe the beneficiaries, and to be good as a gift to a public charity.

2. Wills —62—Survivor under joint will estopped to renounce.

A will of husband and wife, whereby they give their property to trustees for a charity, the trustees to pay half of the income to the survivor for life, held a joint and mutual will, estopping the survivor, after the death of the other and the probate of the will and acceptance of benefits under it, from renouncing it.

3. Judgment —747(1)—Judgment on disclaimer in action to remove cloud held conclusive of rights.

Where, after death of husband and probate of will of himself and wife, giving their property to trustees for a charity, subject to payment of half the income to the survivor, she conveyed a half interest therein to a university, and at her request suit was brought by the trustees to remove cloud caused thereby, judgment in their favor, on disclaimer by her, was sufficient to foreclose any right asserted by her contrary to the will.

4. Judgment —686—Heirs of party barred.

Persons claiming interest in land as heirs are barred by judgment foreclosing any interest of the person through whom they claim; they being in privity with her.

5. Trusts —173—Suit by trustee held not breach of fiduciary relation.

Trustees, to whom husband and wife by their joint and mutual will devised property for a charity, subject to the payment of half the income to the survivor, did not abandon their fiduciary relation to the survivor by bringing suit to remove cloud placed on the title by her deed of an interest in the property, executed after death of the husband and probate of the will.

6. Judgment —456(2)—Suit to set aside barred in 4 years.

A suit, in so far as it is one to set aside a judgment, is barred in 4 years after the judgment was obtained.

Appeal from District Court, Collin County;
F. E. Wilcox, Judge.

Action in the form of trespass to try title by Rachael E. Kirtley and others against Cora D. Spencer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

George P. Brown, of McKinney, and Allen G. Fisher and William P. Rooney, both of Chadron, Neb. (John B. Barnes, of Lincoln, Neb., of counsel), for appellants.

Head, Dillard, Smith, Maxey & Head, of Sherman, and Abernathy & Smith, of McKinney, for appellees.

HUFF, C. J. Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard resided in Collin county, Tex., and owned the land in controversy in this suit. The property involved in this suit was all community property of Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard. On the 5th day of January, 1897, Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard, having no children then living or descendants of any children living, after discussion of the disposition to be made of their property, by agreement made a joint and mutual will, by the terms of which all of their property was willed to certain trustees named, which was a perpetual body in trust for the benefit of the school known as "Alla," which Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard had established on the land and partly maintained for many years prior to the death of Moses Hubbard. Moses Hubbard departed this life about the 26th day of May, 1906, and the said joint and mutual will of the said Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard was duly probated in Collin county, Tex., on the 31st day of July, 1906, and the probate of said will has never been at any time reversed or in any manner modified. Upon the death of Moses Hubbard, in pursuance of said will, the trustees named in the will went into possession of all of the property, and continued in possession of the same from that date until the present time, administering the trust under the terms of said will. On the 20th day of June, 1912, Mary Jane Hubbard, by deed, attempted to convey to the Texas Christian University an undivided one-half interest in all of the lands involved in this suit, being the same land that Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard, under their joint and mutual will, had bequeathed to the trustees hereinabove mentioned. On January 11, 1913, the trustees named in the joint and mutual will of said Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard instituted a suit in the district court of Collin county, Tex., against the Texas Christian University and Mary Jane Hubbard, in an action to remove cloud from title to the undivided half interest Mary Jane Hubbard had attempted to convey to the Texas Christian University. In said cause both defendants, Mary Jane Hubbard and the Texas Christian University, filed a disclaimer, and on February 22, 1913, judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, the trustees hereinabove mentioned, against

Mary Jane Hubbard and the Texas Christian University, removing cloud from title, and in which they recovered the undivided half interest which Mary Jane Hubbard attempted to convey to the Texas Christian University. That judgment became final, and it has never been appealed from or in any way set aside. On the 20th day of February, 1913, the Texas Christian University reconveyed to Mary Jane Hubbard pendente lite the undivided half interest that she had theretofore attempted to convey to the Texas Christian University, which deed was filed for record February 24, 1913. Mary Jane Hubbard departed this life on the 7th day of February, 1914. On the 14th day of May, 1914, the will of Mary Jane Hubbard was duly probated, which, after making numerous bequests, contained a residuary clause, under which residuary clause Cora D. Spencer, one of the defendants herein, took as a legatee all of the estate of Mary Jane Hubbard, not disposed of by special bequest in the said will, and the said will of Mary Jane Hubbard has never in any way been vacated or set aside. Plaintiffs filed this suit in the district court of Collin county, Tex., on the 31st day of August, 1918, in the form of an action of trespass to try title, in which they pleaded their title and seek to have rendered null and void the judgment of the district court of Collin county, Tex., wherein the trustee in said will recovered a judgment against Mary Jane Hubbard and the Texas Christian University. The property involved in this suit plaintiffs claim as heirs at law of Mary Jane Hubbard. The appellees answered by general demurrer, general denial, and plea of not guilty and the statutes of limitations of 2, 3, 4, 5, and 10 years. Upon a trial of the case without the intervention of a jury the court rendered judgment for the appellee for the property involved in the suit. The above statement is taken from the appellee's brief.

Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard had a daughter born to them, named Alla, who died without issue. The evidence is sufficient to show that the school was erected on Dr. Hubbard's land, and the school was named Alla as a memorial to his daughter. They had no other children, and Dr. and Mrs. Hubbard discussed the disposition that should be made of their estate after their death. The doctor was inclined to endow a medical hospital, while Mrs. Hubbard desired to endow an orphans' home, but they finally agreed between them that, as they had lived in that neighborhood and made their fortune among those people, they should devise a means of leaving the property to the use and benefit of their neighbors, among whom they had lived. Dr. Hubbard, previous to his death, contributed considerable money to the support of the Alla school, which is in common school district No. 67 of Collin county, and assisted in the employment of teachers and aided the support of the school in various ways and expressed his desire that the school should become a high school, and, though his pastor apparently sought to induce him to change his will in that particular, he steadfastly adhered to his purpose of leaving his property in trust for the benefit of the school. The will probated recites:

"We, Moses Hubbard and Mary Jane Hubbard, of Collin county, being of sound mind and disposing memory, mindful of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death, wishing to dispose of the effects which it has pleased Almighty God to bless us with, while we have the strength of mind and bodies so to do, make, publish and declare this to be the last will and testament of us and each of us, hereby revoking all others by us made; and we each direct that as each of us die this instrument shall be probated as the will of such deceased person."

Item second provides:

"It is our desire and each of us, that as each of us dies all the property then owned by us shall descend and vest in the following named persons and their successors in this trust, to wit: J. H. L. C. English, Dr. B. F. Spencer, Dan P. English, F. S. Finley and the superintendent of public instruction of Collin county, who shall taken and hold all of the property, real, personal and mixed, owned by us, at the death of either of us, for the purposes and trusts as hereinafter directed, and vacancies in whose numbers shall be filled as directed."

Item third:

"Upon the death of either of us the trustees shall receive rents, revenues and profits arising from all of said property and shall lend all money and have same well secured or invest same in interest-bearing bonds, rent the land. One half of the net proceeds shall be paid to any person in any manner for any purpose, the survivor may direct. The other half shall be used and paid out in the same manner and for the same purposes as the rents and revenues of the property are herein directed to be paid and appropriated, after the death of both of us, but the survivor has the right, during lifetime, to determine the manner of expenditures; that is whether it should be used in employment of teachers, erection of buildings, purchase of apparatus or other germane uses," etc.

Item 4th provides generally that the trustees, after the death of both, shall take and hold the property and divide it into four funds, specifying the manner of dividing the same. Item fifth:

"Believing that we have the love of God in our hearts for the manifold blessings he has bestowed upon us, and desiring to add to the happiness and improvement of our neighbor, we have founded an institution for the increase and diffusion of knowledge, which we have named Alla, and which shall remain permanently located on the same survey on which it is located, to wit: Wade H. Rattan. And it is our desire that the trustees herein provided for shall use the available fund that has been provided for in the employment of teachers, the erection of proper and necessary buildings, the purchase of apparatus and other germane uses; and it is our desire that at this institution of learning all children of white race and whose parents are Caucasian and who are over the age of six and under the age of twenty-one, shall be admitted, free of tuition, but in case more apply than the funds on hand justify, then the trustees, in determining who shall be admitted, are requested to give preference to worthy students, who have been in attendance before and those residing in the school district or adjacent thereto. The term 'germane uses' is intended to receive a liberal construction, and to authorize the use of all means proper by the trustees for diffusion of knowledge, but we do not desire a sectarian school taught. The Holy Bible may be used and we pray may be the guide of both instructor and pupils."

Item 6 provides that the trustees shall not have power to sell or alienate the real estate, but that it shall be preserved, and its rents and revenues be applied for the charitable uses, but provides that, if in the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, after bona fide trial, it shall determine the land cannot so be held, the trustees upon order of court could sell the land and hold the proceeds as a permanent fund. It is their wish, however, that the land, if it could be done legally, should not be sold.

Item 7 stipulates:

"Confiding in the honor and integrity of J. H. L. C. English, Dr. B. F. Spencer, F. S. Finley, and the person who may be superintendent of public instruction, in Collin county, Texas, we appoint trustees of this fund, and executors of each of our wills."

Item 8 provides for filling vacancies in the trustees, in the case of death, resignation, or otherwise, and that the trustees should be residents of Collin county, reciting that—

"It being our intention to create a perpetual body and to this end the trustees may, if advised it would be better to advance the purposes herein intended, incorporate under the name of Alla. No stock shall be issued."

After Dr. Hubbard's death the trustees took charge of the property, collected the rents, paid the taxes, and looked after the property, turning over to Mrs. Hubbard the portion provided for under the will, leaving to her the direction of the investment or application of the rest of the fund. This situation continued until about the 20th day of June, 1912, when she made a deed to the Texas Christian University. She afterwards addressed a letter to Abernathy & Smith, in which she said:

"I desire the joint and mutual will, executed by me and my deceased husband, which has been duly probated, be carried out in all of its terms."

She authorized them to use her name as a party to a suit either as defendant or intervenor, or in any way they might think necessary to carry out the terms of the will, and to vest title in the trustees of Alla school, as recorded in the will. They were requested to endeavor to procure judgment vesting all of the property absolutely in the trustees, subject, however, to the interest and right given her under the will; that is vest absolutely in fee simple in the trustees of said Alla school, subject to her right to receive one-half the rents during her lifetime. This letter was signed by her and properly witnessed, and in the suit instituted Mrs. Hubbard filed a disclaimer:

"I, Mrs. Mary Jane Hubbard, one of the defendants in the above styled and numbered cause, come now and disclaim in favor of the plaintiff any and all right, title and interest in and to any of the lands set out and described in plaintiff's petition, except as herein specified, and agree that the judgment may be rendered in favor of plaintiff, as prayed for in their petition, subject to my rights, in the rents, revenues and profits arising from said land."

Judgment was rendered in that case as heretofore stated, recognizing Mrs. Hubbard's right to one-half the rents during her lifetime under the terms of the will. Before her death Mrs. Hubbard made a will, disposing of certain specific property to certain named devisees, having a residuary clause giving all of the remainder of the property, after satisfying the special bequests, to Cora D. Spencer, her niece. The property disposed of by that will specifically appears to be different property to that disposed of by the joint will of herself and husband, and the evidence indicates that it was property accumulated by her after her husband's death.

[1] The first assignment in effect assails the judgment of the trial court on the ground that the will was void and insufficient to vest title in the trustees because the beneficiaries, under the terms of the will, were not specifically designated, and so general that the beneficiaries may include any white child 6 years and under 21 years of age in the world; that the bequest is to an unincorporated institution, and not for a corporation.

The appellants and Cora D. Spencer are heirs at law of Mrs. Hubbard, and would be entitled to recover but for the will. It is our view that the bequest under the will was to a public charity, and may be sustained. We quote from Paschal v. Acklin, 27 Tex. at page 200:

"It cannot be said that the bequest in favor of the poor of Sumner county is too vague and uncertain a description of the beneficiaries to be sustained as a charity in our courts, where the English doctrine of cy pres has never been recognized. Though this point may, at one time, have been a ground of much debate, it is now too firmly settled to admit of question [citing authorities]. It is, also, said that the bequest is void because it was intended to operate in favor of an unincorporated institution; in fact, one that had, at the testator's death, only an imaginary and ideal existence in his brain. And to sustain this position, the case of Baptist Association v. Hart, 4 Wheat. 1, has been referred to; but this case has, in subsequent decisions in the same high tribunal, been much questioned. But whatever may be its weight as an authority, it is not applicable to the case now before the court. The bequest in that case was directly to the unincorporated association; here it is to trustees, who are capable of taking the estate. In such cases, it has been frequently held that the subsequent incorporation of the beneficiary of the trust, within a reasonable time, is sufficient to support and maintain the bequest [citing authorities]. But without the aid of the subsequent incorporation of the 'Franklin Institute,' the trust was effectual in favor of the beneficiaries pointed out in the will. It was supported by the bequest to trustees, and their execution of it could have been enforced by the beneficiaries in a court of equity [citing authorities]. In Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves., Jr., 36, it is said: 'When an ascertainable object is designated by the donor, in general or collective terms, as the poor of a given county or parish, or when a person is appointed by him to select a described portion, or kind, or number from a designated class, the chancellor, sitting as judge in equity, will interpose upon the ground of trust.' And in Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 354, it is said, 'Whenever the only objection to a bequest is that it is for the benefit of the persons described collectively by some characteristic trait, by which they may be identified, if the bequest is a charity within the statute, and therefore valid, it is as good and available as it would have been at common law, had it been to one competent person in trust for another, identified by the will.' Bell County v. Alexander, 22 Tex. 351, 73 Am. Dec. 268; Laird v. Bass, 50 Tex. 412; O. J., vol. 11, "Charities," § 58 et seq. p. 338.

"Gifts, for the purpose of advancing the cause of education are universally admitted to be valid as public charitable gifts, both under the statute of Elizabeth and also in the United States, in those states where that statute is expressly or by implication not in force. Hence gifts, in general terms, for education, not specifying in what particular mode they are to be applied, are valid where trustees are also appointed, for in such cases courts of equity will contrive a plan for carrying the gift into practical effect. So a fortiori a gift to found public schools or colleges or for the particular purpose of founding schools, seminaries and colleges, or contributing to the maintenance of those already in operation, to pay salaries of teachers in the public schools, to aid in the education of poor children, to educate colored children, to establish public libraries, to increase the amount of public school funds for the education of young persons in the useful and economic arts, for the education of poor students of the Protestant ministry, or for the Catholic priesthood, or to establish a parish school under the supervision of the authorities of the church, is valid as a charitable gift." Underhill on the Law of Wills, vol. 2, § 814.

The record in this case abundantly shows that Dr. Hubbard founded, or built, the school on his land for the benefit of the children of his neighbors and friends. While the schoolhouse is in a common school district and under the control of the laws of Texas, he and his wife, by their will, evidenced a purpose to aid that school and create a fund to maintain it. In appointing the superintendent of public instruction of the county they manifested a purpose to co-operate with the school authorities of the district and the state. He evidently intended it, in part at least, for the use and aid of pupils under and over the scholastic age, prescribed by law. It was his purpose, manifestly, to give his neighbors a high school at their doors, without the necessity of going from home for better school facilities, and to relieve them in a measure from heavy taxation. Though there was no railroad near the school and it was then in a rural district, it seems to have been his purpose inasmuch as the estate would contribute, to overcome those disadvantages. The trustees were invested with discretionary powers; they could pay teachers, erect or improve buildings, etc., to further its progress. We believe that the beneficiaries were sufficiently pointed out and designated. The trustees appointed were capable of receiving and being vested with the title in trust for the uses specified. The will, therefore, we think valid, and vested Dr. Hubbard's interest in the trustees.

[2] We also believe this will to have been the joint and mutual will of Dr. Hubbard and his wife, and entered into upon their mutual agreement and understanding. After Dr. Hubbard's death and the probate of the will, his wife was estopped from thereafter renouncing the will. The trustees took charge of the estate at the death of Dr. Hubbard, dividing the income, giving the wife her proportional part under the will, and the remainder they held and used as directed by her during her life. She received and accepted the services of the trustees in handling the entire estate. We think she is shown to have elected after the death of her husband to accept under the will, at least there is sufficient evidence to sustain a finding to that effect. On the question of estoppel under a mutual and joint will, and the effect of the death of one without revoking or renouncing the will, by the survivor, before the death of such other party, we cite the case of Larabee v. Porter, 166 S. W. 395, where the question is ably discussed and many authorities cited and discussed.

[3-6] We think the request by Mrs. Hubbard made of attorneys to institute suit for the land in order to carry out the will of her husband, and the judgment therein, is sufficient to foreclose any right she may have asserted during her life, and the appellants herein, being in privity with her, are barred by the judgment. Neither do we think the trustees abandoned their fiduciary relation to her in bringing the suit. She had by her deed placed a cloud on the title. They held the title in trust for the named beneficiaries under the will, and if by her act Mrs. Hubbard placed in jeopardy the trust, it was their duty to sue her if necessary. It is asserted the trustees and the attorneys did not explain to her she had a half interest in the property when she filed a disclaimer in the suit. She had undertaken to convey a half interest by her deed to the Texas Christian University. She needed no explanation on that point as to what interest she would take if the will was invalid as to her. If it had not been for the will, upon the death of Dr. Hubbard all the property would have vested in her. If the trustees had informed her she could retain all the estate, they would have violated the trust reposed in them by the will. We find no such abuse of the fiduciary relation or of fraud as would have authorized the trial court to set aside the judgment in favor of the trustees against the Texas Christian University and Mrs. Hubbard. In so far as this was an action to set aside the judgment so rendered, it was barred by the 4-year statute of limitation. Watson v. Railway Co., 73 S. W. 830; Warren v. Foust, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 59, 81 S. W. 323; Wolf v. Sahm, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 564, 120 S. W. 1114, 121 S. W. 561. The second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth assignments of error are overruled. We think them without merit.

The judgment will be affirmed.

KIRBY LUMBER CO. v. LEWIS. (No. 579.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont. May 5, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 240—Argumentative instruction refused.

Argumentative instruction was properly refused.

2. Trial \S 350(3)—Refusal of issue raised by evidence cannot be justified by showing of facts making the issue immaterial, where such other facts are not pleaded.

Refusal to submit to the jury the issue, which was raised by the evidence, whether defendant's alleged agent was authorized by defendant to make the contract sued on, could not be justified by the claim that all the evidence showed that defendant ratified the acts and conduct of such agent in making the contract, where ratification was not pleaded.

3. Judgment \S 248—Evidence to form basis of judgment must have support in the pleadings.

Evidence cannot form the basis of a judgment, without a pleading to which the evidence relates.

4. Damages \S 57—Submission of issue as to whether breach of contract by defendant was fraudulent or willful held error; question being immaterial.

In action for breach of contract to deliver "cull" oxen to plaintiff in exchange for work oxen, court erred in submitting issue of whether contract had been fraudulently or willfully breached; plaintiff being entitled, as damages, to the highest market value of cull oxen between the time they should have been delivered and the date of the trial, regardless of whether breach was willful or fraudulent.

Appeal from Jasper County Court; O. C. Brown, Judge.

Action by J. L. Lewis against the Kirby Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

G. E. Richardson, of Jasper, and Andrews, Streetman, Logue & Mobley, of Houston, for appellant.

Chas. C. Ingraham, of Jasper, for appellee.

HIGHTOWER, C. J. The appellee, J. L. Lewis, sued appellant, Kirby Lumber Company, in the county court of Jasper county, and upon a trial with a jury appellee recovered judgment for $425, with interest at the legal rate until paid. After its motion for new trial was overruled, appellant perfected its appeal to this court.

Very briefly stated, the contention of appellee was that about the 1st of November, 1914, he entered into a verbal contract with appellant, acting through its duly authorized agent, whereby appellee sold and delivered to appellant five work oxen, for which appellant promised and agreed to deliver to appellee five oxen known as or called "cull" oxen; such oxen to be delivered to appellee not later than the latter part of spring of 1915.

Appellant was engaged in the sawmill business at Brown del, in Jasper county, at the time the claimed contract was made, and appellee was engaged in the meat market business at the same place. As work oxen would become unfit for use in appellant's sawmill business, they were called "cull" oxen, and would be disposed of for butchering, and their places supplied by other oxen fit to do the work.

Appellee alleged that under the claimed contract, he delivered to appellant, at Brown del, five good work oxen, but that appellant never did comply with its contract by delivering to him the "cull" oxen, and never paid appellee anything for the work oxen delivered by him. Appellee prayed recovery for the highest market value of the "cull" oxen obtaining between the date they should have been delivered to him and the date of the trial, but, in the alternative, if it should be found that the claimed contract was not made, for the value of the work oxen delivered to appellant.

Appellant answered by general and special exceptions, all of which were properly overruled, and also by general denial and plea of limitation. The jury found that the contract, as claimed by appellee, was made, and found the aggregate value of the "cull" oxen to be $425.

We overrule the first assignment of error, for we think that the cause of action set up in appellee's second amended petition was not, in legal contemplation, a new or different cause of action from that contained in the original petition filed more than two years before. The claimed contract and its breach was clearly alleged in all of appellee's pleadings.

[1] The second and third assignments are overruled, for we do not agree with appellant that there was a variance between the contract as alleged and that proved by appellee; and the fourth assignment is overruled, for the reason that the requested instruction, which was refused as there complained of, was argumentative.

[2, 3] The fifth assignment of error must be sustained. Whether R. B. Cochran was authorized by appellant to make the contract relied upon by appellee was clearly made an issue of fact by the evidence, and the trial court should have granted appellant's request to submit that issue to the jury. Appellee's reply to this assignment is that all the evidence showed that appellant ratified the acts and conduct of Cochran in making the contract, and that therefore it was not error to refuse the issue. We are inclined to agree with appellee that the evidence was sufficient, if not conclusive, to the effect that appellant ratified Cochran's act in making the contract, or at least held Cochran out as having such authority; but the trouble is there was no such pleading by appellee. Evidence cannot form the basis of a judgment without a pleading to which the evidence relates.

[4] The sixth assignment is overruled. Upon the record now before us, we are also of the opinion that there was no necessity for submitting to the jury an issue as to whether the contract claimed by appellee to have been made was fraudulently or willfully breached by appellant, which action of the trial court is made the basis of the seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments, and we would suggest that no such issue be submitted upon another trial. If the contract, as claimed by appellee, was made and breached, then, upon the evidence as reflected by the record at this time, appellee would be entitled to recover the highest market value of the "cull" oxen obtaining between the time they should have been delivered to appellee and the date of the trial; and this would be so regardless of willful breach or fraud on the part of appellant.

Because, however, of the error of the trial court in refusing to submit the special issue as to whether R. B. Cochran was authorized by appellant to enter into the contract declared upon by appellee, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded; and it is so ordered.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. CARVER et al. (No. 6380.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 12, 1920. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1920.)

1. Telegraphs and telephones \S 37(8)—Diligence in delivery required, though addressee is not at address given.

Where death message was directed to address where telegraph company's agent was informed the addressee did not live, being resident, however, in the vicinity, it was duty of company, not only to seek to deliver telegram at address, but, when it ascertained addressee was not there, to make at least some effort to ascertain her whereabouts by making due inquiry, failing of which a finding of negligence would be justified.

2. Telegraphs and telephones \S 66(4)—Evidence held to show delivery of message to telegraph company's agent.

In an action against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a death message, evidence held to show message was delivered to the company's agent, and not merely to agent of a railroad.

3. Telegraphs and telephones \S 68(3)—Damages for physical pain and mental anguish recoverable for failure to deliver death message.

In action against telegraph company for failure to deliver a death message, plaintiff addressee could recover damages arising both from physical pain and mental anguish, which were in contemplation of parties when message announcing dying condition of addressee's mother was sent.

4. Appeal and error \S 1050(1)—Admission of conclusion of witnesses harmless to defendant.

In action against telegraph company for failure to deliver death message, in absence of any evidence to show person to whose address message was sent was agent of addressee for any purpose, if it was a conclusion for both him and addresser to swear he was not her agent, such conclusion was harmless to defendant company.

5. Telegraphs and telephones \S 71 — $1,500 for nondelivery of death message not excessive.

Verdict for $1,500 recovered by daughter against a telegraph company for failure to deliver message announcing dying condition of her mother, whereby she was prevented from attending funeral, held not excessive.

Appeal from District Court, Bastrop County; R. J. Alexander, Judge.

Suit of Nellie Carver and another against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Francis R. Stark, of New York City, and Brooks, Hart & Woodward, of Austin, for appellant.

S. L. Staples, of Smithville, and Maynard & Maynard, of Bastrop, for appellees.

FLY, O. J. This suit was instituted and prosecuted to a judgment for $1,500 against appellant by Nellie Carver, joined by her husband, H. A. Carver. The basis of the complaint against appellant was negligence in failing to deliver a telegram, directed to Mrs. Carver at Houston, Tex., from her brother at Temple, Tex., informing her that her mother was dying in Temple. The cause was submitted to a jury on special issues, and on the responses thereto judgment was rendered in favor of appellees for the sum hereinbefore indicated.

The facts show that about 10:30 o'clock on the morning of January 31, 1918, in Temple, Tex., the following message, with the required toll for transmitting the same, was delivered to the agent of appellant:

"Mrs. Nellie Carver, 3711 Engelke Street, Houston, Texas. Come home. Mama is dying. Your bro., Paul Trammell."

At the time that the message was delivered, Paul Trammell, the sender, told the agent of appellant that Mrs. Carver did not live at 3711 Engelke street, but lived near that point, which was the address nearest to where she lived that could be given him. He accepted the message for transmission. The mother of Mrs. Carver died about 1 o'clock p. m. on January 31, 1918, and was buried at 4 p. m. on February 1, 1918. In compliance with a request, contained in a letter which she received on the morning of February 1, Mrs. Carver left on the first train for Temple, where she arrived about 2 o'clock a. m. about 10 hours after the burial of her mother. She did not know that a telegram had been sent to her until she reached Temple. The telegram was placed in the hands of a messenger about 2:55 p. m. of January 31, and was carried by him to 3711 Engelke street, which was a drug store owned by J. R. Clark, who refused the telegram, telling the boy that he did not know Mrs. Carver and did not know where she lived. The messenger boy left, and returned probably on February 1, 1918, and upon his insisting that Clark receive the telegram the latter did so. It was several days afterwards before it was delivered to some one who asked for it. The boy made no inquiries as to where Mrs. Carver lived, nor made any effort to find her, although the agent at Temple had been informed that she lived near the number placed on the telegram, and, in fact, she lived within 2½ blocks of the drug store. If the telegram had been delivered at any time on the afternoon or evening of January 31, Mrs. Carver could have reached Temple in time to have attended her mother's funeral. She suffered great mental anguish on account of not being present at her mother's funeral, which she would have attended, had the telegram been promptly delivered. The evidence fails to show that Clark had any authority to receive telegrams for Mrs. Carver, and appellant had no information to that effect.

[1] The first, second, third, fourth, and fifth assignments of error question the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and are overruled. Although the message was directed to 3711 Engelke street, it was the duty of appellant not only to seek to deliver it there, but when it ascertained that Mrs. Carver was not there, to make at least some effort to ascertain her whereabouts, by making due inquiry, and, failing to do so, a jury would be justified in finding that it was guilty of negligence. The message conveyed information of the gravest and most important character to Mrs. Carver, and yet no effort whatever was made to locate her or ascertain her place of residence, although appellant had been informed that she did not live at the address, but lived near there. As said by the Supreme Court in Telegraph Co. v. Mitchell, 91 Tex. 454, 44 S. W. 274, 40 L. R. A. 209, 66 Am. St. Rep. 906:

"The duty which the telegraph company owes to the addressee is personal, and cannot be discharged by making inquiry for the person to whose care the message may be sent, nor by applying to the place of business or residence of the addressee; but inquiry must be made for the person addressed, if the circumstances are such as to show that he may probably be found away from such place of business or residence. The place to which a message is sent is but a guide for the messenger, and does not determine the measure of his diligence."

Clark was not the agent of Mrs. Carver in receiving telegrams, and what others may have done in connection with telegrams could not affect her. Appellant was informed, when the message was delivered to it by Trammell, that she did not live at the address given, but near it. Appellant could not have acted on the custom to deliver messages at the drug store, because there is no testimony indicating that it had any knowledge of such custom. When Clark told appellant that he did not know Mrs. Carver and refused the message, it was put on notice that Mrs. Carver had not instructed Clark to act as her agent, and yet no effort was made to locate her. The number given was a guide for the messenger, and, with the additional information that the addressee lived in the vicinity, was sufficient upon which to base a finding of negligence, if no effort was made to find her. Klopf v. W. U. Telegraph Co., 100 Tex. 540, 101 S. W. 1072; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Houghton, 82 Tex. 561, 17 S. W. 846, 15 L. R. A. 129, 27 Am. St. Rep.

918; Postal Telegraph Co. v. Prewitt, 199 S. W. 316.

[2] It is the claim of appellant that there was no testimony that the message was delivered to its agent, but that it was delivered to the agent of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company. Trammell not only swore that the person to whom he delivered the message was the agent of the railway company, but also of appellant. It is singular, in view of the admission in the answer, that the message was delivered to it by Trammell and that it transmitted it and sent it to the street number indicated, that such a contention should be made. The contention is utterly without merit.

[3] The sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments of error complain of charges permitting the recovery of damages arising from both physical pain and mental anguish. The charges were fully authorized by Texas decisions, whatever may be the rule in inferior federal courts and inferior courts of New York and Indiana. Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, 9 S. W. 598, 1 L. R. A. 728, 10 Am. St. Rep. 772, and cases cited; W. U. Telegraph Co. v. Finrock, 191 S. W. 181. The authorities cited do not sustain the contentions of appellant. Both mental and physical suffering were the natural result from conduct causing a daughter to be absent from the funeral of her mother, and such damages must have been in contemplation of the parties when the message was sent.

The tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth assignments of error are overruled. The message was not delivered to any one until the next day after it was sent, and then was delivered to a person not authorized to receive it, and appellant knew that it had no such authority. So far as the matter contained in the requested issues were raised by the facts, they were clearly submitted by the court and in the special charge requested by appellant and given.

[4] There was not one particle of testimony to show that J. R. Clark was the agent of Mrs. Carver for any purpose, and if it was a conclusion for both Mrs. Carver and Clark to swear that he was not her agent, such conclusion could not have damaged appellant. It would seem reasonable however, that it would be permissible for a witness who did not know a certain person, and never held any communication with him or authorized any one else to do so, to state that he was not her agent. Under the facts the court would have been justified in instructing the jury that Mrs. Carver had never authorized Clark to receive telegrams for her. The eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first assignments of error are overruled.

Appellant admitted that the message was delivered to it by Trammell, and objections to Trammell stating that he had delivered the message to its agent, are trivial and without merit. Appellant not only admitted that the message was delivered to it, but that it had transmitted it with diligence and had sought to deliver it. The twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth assignments of error are overruled.

The twenty-sixth assignment of error is overruled.

[5] The verdict is not excessive.
The judgment is affirmed.

FT. SMITH COUCH & BEDDING CO. v. GEORGE. (No. 6218.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
May 19, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 731(1) — Assignment of error that verdict is contrary to law too general.

Assignment of error, complaining of trial court's refusal to set aside the verdict and judgment and to grant a new trial "because the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and to the evidence," without specially pointing out the particular ruling complained of, held too general to be considered.

2. Contracts \S 10(4)—Contract giving salesman exclusive right to sell goods in certain territory held unilateral.

Contract giving defendant the exclusive right to act as plaintiff's salesman in a certain territory held unilateral and unenforceable, in absence of allegation that defendant bound himself to buy any amount of goods from plaintiff, or that contract was for a definite time and could not be abandoned at will by defendant.

3. Principal and agent \S 41—Seller not liable for refusal to sell to buyer with exclusive selling rights, where unable to pay for goods.

Seller, having given buyer the exclusive right to sell its goods in certain territory, would not be liable for damages for refusing to sell its goods to buyer, and for selling to his competitors, if his financial condition was such that he was unable to pay for such goods under the terms of the contract.

4. Justices of the peace \S 45 — Amount in controversy under plea in reconvention determined by considering each claim separately.

In ascertaining whether the justice's court has jurisdiction of a plea of reconvention, the amount in controversy is determined by considering plaintiff's claim and defendant's claim separately, and not by adding one to the other.

5. Set-off and counterclaim \S 35(1)—Plea in reconvention for unliquidated damages as against a claim for liquidated amount held proper.

In seller's action against buyer on a verified account, the court had jurisdiction of buyer's plea in reconvention for unliquidated damages for breach of contract giving buyer exclusive selling rights in certain territory, the amount pleaded and set off in such case being founded on a cause of action arising out of, incident to, or connected with seller's cause of action.

Appeal from Bell County Court; M. B. Blair, Judge.

Suit by the Ft. Smith Couch & Bedding Company against T. B. George, in which the defendant interposed a plea in reconvention. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Clem C. Countess, of Belton, for appellant.

BRADY, J. Appellant brought this suit against appellee in a justice's court, to recover the sum of $155 upon a verified account. Appellee filed a sworn denial of the account, and by plea in reconvention asked judgment for damages against appellant in the sum of $175 for breach of contract. The jury in the justice's court returned a verdict for appellant for $150, and against appellee on his plea in reconvention. Upon appeal to the county court, the jury, without any written charge from the court, returned a verdict for appellant for the full amount of its demand, and for appellee for the full amount of his claim, and from the judgment entered thereon appellant has prosecuted this appeal.

Opinion.

[1] The first assignment of error complains of the refusal of the trial court to set aside the verdict and judgment, and to grant a new trial, "because the verdict of the jury is contrary to the law and to the evidence." This assignment is the first ground in the motion for new trial, and, in effect, is no more than a claim that the trial court erred in not granting a new trial, without specifically pointing out the particular ruling complained of in the court below or here. Under the most liberal interpretation of the rules, we think this assignment must be held bad, because of its generality. Therefore we decline to consider it.

[2] The remaining assignments attack the ruling of the trial court in refusing to sustain certain special exceptions to appellee's plea in reconvention. One of these exceptions raised the point that the contract alleged as the basis of the plea of reconvention was unilateral and void for the want of mutuality. After careful consideration of the question, we have concluded that the assignment presenting this question should be sustained, and the cause reversed for such error.

The contract as pleaded was an agreement that appellee should act as appellant's exclusive salesman in the territory of Temple, Tex., and appellant agreed that no other store or firm should be given the right to handle its goods in the town of Temple. It was not alleged that appellee in any way bound himself to buy any amount of goods from appellant, nor for any definite time to abide by the terms of the contract, which could be abandoned at will by appellee. The contract seems to have been clearly unilateral and unenforceable. Railway v. Mitchell, 38 Tex. 85; Tyler Ice Co. v. Coupland, 44 Tex. Civ. App. 383, 99 S. W. 133; Railway v. Matthews, 64 Ark. 398, 42 S. W. 902, 39 L. R. A. 467; Mutual Film Corporation v. Morris, 184 S. W. 1030.

Since we have decided to remand the case for another trial, it is proper to indicate our views upon the remaining questions presented in the brief.

[3] We are of the opinion that, if an enforceable contract should be alleged, nevertheless appellant would not be liable for damages for refusing to sell appellee its goods, and in selling to his competitors, if the financial condition of appellee was such that he was unable to pay for same. Assuming the validity and binding force of the contract, appellant would not be required to sell and deliver its goods to appellee, if he was unable to pay for the same under the terms of the contract.

We are also of the opinion that the evidence offered to show appellee's damages for breach of the contract was too indefinite, speculative, and uncertain to sustain a verdict. The testimony on this point resolves itself into almost a mere guess or conjecture as to any loss sustained by appellee.

We cannot agree with the contention of appellant that the averments and proof do not show an agreement between appellant and appellee, in that it appears to have been made with the agent of appellant, and without its knowledge or authority. The pleading alleges a contract with appellant, and there is evidence tending to show that it was made in behalf of appellant, and within the actual or apparent authority of the agent.

[4] As to the claim that the plea of reconvention should have been stricken out, because the amount in controversy was not within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, we overrule this contention. The amount claimed by appellant was within the jurisdiction of the justice's court, as was also the amount claimed by appellee in his plea in reconvention. In substance, appellee pleaded a counterclaim, independently of appellant's demand, and the amount in controversy is determined by considering each claim separately, and not by adding the same together, as contended by appellant. Appellee asked for judgment only for the amount of his profits or counterclaim, in the sum of $175, which was within the jurisdiction of the justice's court. Crosby v. Crosby, 92 Tex. 441, 49 S. W. 359; Tucker v. Williams, 56 S. W. 585.

[5] We also hold that the court did not err in overruling the special exception to appellee's plea in reconvention, because it was sought to set up and recover on a claim for unliquidated damages against a claim for a liquidated amount. Our statute permits an unliquidated claim to be set up as a counter-claim to a liquidated demand, where the amount pleaded in set-off is founded on a cause of action arising out of, incident to, or connected with the plaintiff's cause of action. We think the allegations and evidence adduced in support of the counterclaim show such a set-off.

We have not passed upon the question of the validity of the contract as affected by the anti-trust laws. The transactions in this case appear to be interstate in character, and would not seem to fall within the purview of or be controlled by the Texas statute. Albertype Co. v. Gust Feist Co., 102 Tex. 219, 114 S. W. 791. The effect of the federal anti-trust law, or the principles of the common law, upon this contract, have not been determined by us, as the questions have not been raised in the brief, and because of the meager pleadings in the trial courts.

We believe we have sufficiently indicated our views of the law upon the probable issues in another trial, and for the error indicated the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

KOHLER et al. v. UNITED IRR. CO. (No. 6394.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. May 12, 1920.)

1. Waters and water courses \S 257(1)—Remedy for excessive rates by water engineers is by action and not appeal.

Landowners entitled to water rights under contract with irrigation company had no right to appeal from decision of board of water engineers fixing rates, to district court of county in which the irrigation system was located, Acts 35th Leg. (1917) c. 88, § 62 (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, art. 5002i) having no application to such an appeal, in view of sections 56 and 59 (sections 5002c, 5002f); their remedy, under section 61a, as added by Acts 35th Leg. 4th Called Sess. (1918) c. 55, being a suit in district court of Travis county to set aside the rates so fixed.

2. Appeal and error \S 170(2)—Parties having invoked act in petition cannot assert unconstitutionality on appeal.

Parties who not only failed to plead the unconstitutionality of an act, but invoked the benefit of act by their petition, cannot complain of unconstitutionality of the act for first time on appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Hidalgo County; V. W. Taylor, Judge.

Proceedings before Board of Water Engineers of the State of Texas by George W. Kohler and others against the United Irrigation Company. From decision of the board, petitioners appealed to district court. Judgment of dismissal, and petitioners appeal.

Affirmed.

Seabury & George, of Brownsville, and George P. Brown, of Edinburg, for appellants.

D. F. Strickland, of Mission, Glasscock, McDaniel & Bounds, of McAllen, and Andrews, Streetman, Logue & Mobley, of Houston, for appellee.

MOURSUND, J. On April 14, 1919, George W. Kohler and many others filed a petition in the district court of Hidalgo county, and that the petitioners owned land, company. They alleged that the said company owned an irrigation system in Hidalgo county, and that the petitioners owned land, contiguous and adjacent to the canals and laterals, and had for several years irrigated with water from said system; that in addition they own and hold rights under certain water contracts, providing for compensation to the company by means of a flat rate, to be collected from all who hold contracts, without regard to whether water is taken or not, and a water rate, to be paid for water used. It was further alleged that these rates were to be fixed by the company for a period of five years or less, subject, to change by the company at the end of any fiscal year; that all rates so fixed were to be just and reasonable, without discrimination, and figured on a basis stated in the contract and set out in the petition; that the contracts further provided that the flat rate for the period of five years from and after October 1, 1916, was never to exceed the sum of $4 per acre for a fiscal year, and provided a classification of the lands to be irrigated. It was then alleged that the company had from time to time fixed rates, and that prior to October 1, 1918, a flat rate of $4 and a water rate of $2 per acre had been in force; that about August 31, 1918, the company promulgated a flat rate of $5 per annum and a water rate of $3 per acre for irrigation, and in connection with such changes promulgated a new set of rules and regulations, and proposed to enforce all of the same from and after October 1, 1918, the beginning of a new fiscal year; that afterwards the company fixed the water rate at $3 per 90 minutes per head of water; that on or about September 30, 1918, the petitioners, with others, acting through a voluntary association formed by them under the name of the "Water Users Association" of Mission and Sharyland presented to the board of water engineers of the state of Texas, their petition, setting up their rights to water and attacking the rates thus promulgated as unjust, unreasonable, and discriminatory, and also attacking the rules and regulations, and praying for a modification and change of such rates and rules. In this connection it was alleged and shown that all requirements of the statute necessary to vest said board with jurisdiction to hear and determine the matters were complied with. It was then alleged that the cause was set for hearing by said board, and continued to November 7, 1918, and at said time the individual petitioners made themselves parties; that before the completion of the hearing by agreement that part of the complaint relating to the flat rate was withdrawn, this agreement embracing a waiver by the company of any right or claim it might have to an increase of the flat rate at said time; that on February 18, 1919, the board rendered its decision, fixing the water rate at $4 per acre per irrigation, and providing that the volume of water that could be taken in one irrigation was four inches per acre, and the time limit for each irrigation should be 90 minutes. It was then alleged in detail that in arriving at such decision the board erroneously took into consideration items covered by the flat rate, concerning which there was no controversy, and that the rate fixed was excessive, unjust, and unreasonable for other reasons based upon valuation and income; also that the restrictions relating to delivery of water were unreasonable and impracticable, and their effect was to indirectly grant a further increase of 50 per cent. in the rate. After stating fully the grounds relied on to show the unreasonableness of the rate and rules, the petition recites that the plaintiffs now appeal from said decision, filing the petition as their notice in writing of such appeal, and tendering therewith their appeal bond, and praying that after due notice and proceedings as required by law the court do try de novo the case here submitted, and upon final hearing do grant petitioners a judgment "reversing, setting aside, and for naught holding" the said decision and order of the board of water engineers, and fixing and determining a fair, just, and equitable water rate, "based upon the actual and necessary cost of operating said irrigation system and of procuring and delivering the water, as required by the terms of said water contract, without injecting therein any other considerations, and without attaching thereto any new or unreasonable conditions of water service which would in effect increase such rate." They then prayed specifically for a water rate "for the fiscal year commenced October 1, 1918, and thereafter, until set aside in a proper and legal way of $1.50 per acre per irrigation, for a refund of all moneys in excess of such proper water rate as they may show themselves entitled to upon the trial," for costs and general relief.

The company filed a plea in abatement and motion to dismiss, based on the theory that the appeal must be taken to the district court of Travis county, and that in addition the bond was defective. This plea was sustained, and the cause dismissed.

There can be no doubt that the petition was drawn upon the theory that an appeal was authorized to be taken from the order or decision of the board to the district court of Hidalgo county. The act of the Thirty-Fifth Legislature, chapter 88, regular session (Vernon's Ann. Civ. St. Supp. 1918, arts. 4991-5011 $\frac{1}{2}$ w), contains provisions authorizing appeals in certain cases. The petitioners rely on section 62 of said act (section 5002i) for the right of appeal, but when that section is considered in connection with sections 59 and 56 (sections 5002f, 5002c) it becomes evident that the decision from which the appeal was permitted was one from a hearing upon a petition by persons who have no contract for water, but by reason of being owners of a possessory right to land adjoining or contiguous to the canals are entitled to water not contracted to others. No such decision by the board is involved in this case.

{1} While the caption of said act of 1917 contains no provision evidencing an intention to authorize the board to fix and determine rates upon such an application, or any other application, it appears that the caption of the act of 1913 (Gammel's Laws, vol. 16, p. 358) shows that at the time the provisions embraced in sections 56 and 59 were originally enacted, the Legislature regarded them as conferring authority, not only to require the delivery of water not contracted to others, but also to establish and regulate the rates to govern in such cases. In the case of Knight v. Oldham, 210 S. W. 567, the court so construed the provision contained in the act of 1913 (Laws 1913, c. 171 [Vernon's Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1914, art. 5002e]), which was copied into the act of 1917 as section 59. The act of 1917 repealed the act of 1913. The same Legislature which passed the act of 1917 during its fourth called session passed an act amending the said act of 1917, known as chapter 88, by adding certain sections. See chapter 55, Acts 4th Called Sess. 35th Leg. In the emergency clause it was recited that—"There is now no law authorizing the fixing of rates for furnishing water and permitting furnishers of water to apply for a review and revision of orders, rates and decrees."

This act specifically conferred the power and authority upon the board of water engineers to fix reasonable rates, and provided that any person at interest may file a petition in a district court of Travis county against the board as defendant, setting forth the objections to the decision made or rule or rate promulgated by the board. In drawing the bill the language of Rev. St. 1911, arts. 6657, 6658, relation to attacks upon rates and rules of the Railroad Commission, was used in so far as it could be made applicable to the fixing of water rates, rules, etc. Under the terms of the act the burden is placed upon the plaintiff to show, by clear and satisfactory evidence, that the rates, regulations, or orders complained of are unreasonable and unjust to him. By inserting in the act of 1917 (chapter 88) the provisions of said act passed at the special session, at the places where by reason of section number they naturally belong, some doubt is created whether the provision for an appeal contained in section 62 was made applicable to a decision establishing rates made under the provision inserted as section 61a. However, it is inconceivable that the Legislature actually intended to make the right of appeal provided for in section 62 apply to a decision under section 61a, for if it did so a peculiar situation would be brought about. By appealing, instead of suing the board in the district court of Travis county, the provision concerning the burden of proof could be evaded. We have arrived at the conclusion, from a consideration of the several statutes, that the Legislature intended to make the rates and rules promulgated by the board of water engineers conclusive unless set aside in an action brought in a district court of Travis county, and that the statutes can, and therefore must, be construed so as to effectuate such intention. It, therefore, follows that we also conclude that the statutes do not bestow any right to appeal to the district court of Hidalgo county from the decision of the board of water engineers, of which complaint was made in the petition.

[2] Appellants, however, as their first assignment of error, present another theory upon which they hope to sustain the jurisdiction of the district court of Hidalgo county, and that is that the petition should be held sufficient as an original suit, and, being brought in the district court of the domicile of the appellee, the court should have tried the case. This theory is presented apparently as an afterthought, for the petition does not purport to present in the alternative an original suit, nor is a request made for relief by injunction against the enforcement of the rates, and it is evident that no cause of action entitling the petitioners to have the rates attacked by them adjudged unreasonable by the district court of Hidalgo county can be stated in a petition except upon the theory that the act of the Legislature, bestowing upon the board of water engineers the power and duty of fixing and establishing rates, is void. The appellants recognize this fact in their brief, and therein attack the act as in violation of the constitutional inhibition against the delegation of legislative power, but are in the embarrassing position, as it appears to us, of not only having failed to plead that said act was unconstitutional, but, on the contrary, of having shown by their petition that they invoked the benefit of said act, and that the situation now complained of was brought about because the board, although entertaining their petition and affording them a trial, failed to render a decision such as was desired by them. Having used the provision of the statute to procure a decision or order fixing rates, the plaintiffs are precluded from contending that such provision is unconstitutional, if indeed they can be heard to so contend for the first time on appeal. Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) pp. 251, 252; 12 Corpus Juris, p. 769, § 190, Section 199, p. 773; Wall v. Parrot, etc., 244 U. S. 407, 37 Sup. Ct. 608, 61 L. Ed. 1229; Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Garland, 124 U. S. 581, 8 Sup. Ct. 631, 31 L. Ed. 527; Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. Ed. 187; Lewis v. Chamberlain, 69 Or. 476, 139 Pac. 571; State v. Boston & Maine R. R., 75 N. H. 327, 74 Atl. 542; Regan v. Dickmann, (Mo.) 207 S. W. 792.

In view of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to consider the question of the constitutionality of the statute.

It is also contended in the brief that the decision of the board had the effect of impairing the obligation of plaintiff's contracts, and to deprive them of their property without due process of law. No such grounds of attack were pleaded, but, aside from this, as we have held that the statute authorizing the board to fix rates cannot be attacked by plaintiffs, it follows that the objections now under consideration could only be presented in a suit instituted in the court designated by the statute as the one in which the rates can be reviewed.

We conclude that the judgment dismissing the case should be affirmed.

MEYERS v. ABLES. (No. 6192.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
April 28, 1920.)

Appeal and error \Rightarrow 1056(1)—Exclusion of evidence of cost and value of land held harmless to owner sued by broker.

In realty broker's action for commission, exclusion of evidence that value and cost of property was $3,125, offered to show that he would not sell at $2,500, with excess to broker as alleged, was harmless, where jury had before them undisputed evidence that owner was willing to sell at $2,700.

Appeal from District Court, Falls County; Prentice Oltorf, Judge.

Suit by W. H. Ables against C. W. Meyers. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spivey, Bartlett & Carter, of Marlin, for appellant.

E. M. Dodson, of Rosebud, for appellee.

BRADY, J. Appellee instituted this suit against appellant to recover commission on a land sale. The only issue involved was the amount of commission the appellee was to receive for selling the property; it being his contention that he was to receive all that he sold the property for over and above $2,500. Appellant's contention was that he agreed to pay plaintiff a 10 per cent. commission for effecting the sale. The property sold for $3,250, and the suit was for $750, less an indebtedness owing by appellee to appellant of about $95.

The court submitted the case to a jury upon one special issue, namely, What compensation did the defendant agree to pay the plaintiff for procuring the purchaser or bringing about the sale of the property? The jury answered, "All money above $2,500," and judgment was rendered accordingly for the plaintiff.

The only question arising upon this appeal is whether the trial court committed reversible error in refusing to allow appellant to prove that at the time he bought the property it had cost him $3,125, and that it continued to be worth that sum, or more, until the sale in controversy; that he was not embarrassed financially or otherwise, and was not compelled to sell the property, for any reason, at a less sum than he had paid for it. This testimony was offered upon the theory that it was a circumstance tending to show the improbability that appellant ever made the contract as claimed by appellee, and as tending to show that appellant's version of the contract was true and appellee's untrue. The bill of exceptions was qualified by the trial court as follows:

"Defendant testified, without objection, that at the time he purchased the place he held a lien against it for $1,800, and had to take up another lien against it of $1,000, and his counsel argued the fact to the jury that the place had cost him $2,800 for those items alone, which line of argument was not replied to in the closing argument of counsel for plaintiff."

The testimony is of doubtful admissibility, but appellant has cited authorities which tend to sustain the point that it was relevant for the purpose offered, under facts somewhat similar. However, we do not deem it necessary to decide the question. If it should be assumed that the testimony was admissible, and that the matter of its admission or rejection was not within the sound discretion of the trial court, we are nevertheless of the opinion that his ruling does not present reversible error. We will briefly indicate our reasons for this conclusion.

Not only did appellee receive the benefit of the argument, based on his own testimony, referred to by the trial court in the qualification to the bill of exceptions, which showed that the property had cost appellant at least $300 more than appellee claimed he had agreed to take for the property, but the undisputed evidence further shows that appellant first agreed to a sale of the property in question for the sum of $3,000, and that he agreed to pay appellee 10 per cent. of that price for making the sale. This sale was not consummated, but the property was later sold for $3,250. Thus it appears that the jury had before them evidence, not disputed by appellant, that he was willing to sell the property for $2,700 net to him, which was at least $425 less than its value and its cost to him, if he had been permitted to show that its cost and reasonable market value was $3,125. Therefore, if the rejected testimony had been admitted, it would have been little or no evidence that he would not have made a contract by which he was to receive only $2,500 net for the property, as contended by appellee. At least the evidence would have been of slight probative value, in view of the facts shown by other proof.

It is admitted in appellant's brief that, even where error has been committed through the exclusion of testimony which is relevant, material, and admissible, whether such error will require the reversal of a judgment depends upon the probable effect of such evidence upon the result of the trial, if it had been admitted. It is conceded that if it appears that the evidence, if admitted, could not properly have influenced the jury to render a different verdict, the exclusion of the evidence would not be material error. Tested by this standard, we are clearly of the opinion that it does appear that the exclusion of the evidence could not properly have had any effect upon the verdict of the jury, did not injure appellant, and that the same result would have been reached had the evidence been admitted.

No reversible error having been shown, the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

GREEN et al. v. CHURCHWELL.
(No. 6129.)(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
April 7, 1920.)1. Partition \S 63(3)—Evidence held to make prima facie case in favor of daughter against widow.

Proof by plaintiff in partition of a deed to her father, that the grantee was her father, that at the time of execution of the deed he was the husband of defendant, his widow, that he was dead, that plaintiff was his only child, and that defendant was his surviving wife, made a prima facie case for plaintiff entitling her to have half the land set aside to her.

2. Partition \S 62 — Testimony of defendant widow that land was paid for by her inadmissible under general denial.

In suit for partition by a daughter against her father's widow, wherein general denial was pleaded, testimony of defendant widow that the lands in controversy were paid for with her separate means was improperly admitted.

3. Partition \S 16—Suit based on theory of common title not disputed ownership.

A partition suit is based on the theory of a common title and not of disputed ownership.

4. Trespass to try title \S 47(1) — Partition may be prayed for.

Partition of land may be prayed for in a suit of trespass to try title where it is alleged plaintiff owns an undivided interest in the land, and that defendant has ejected him and denied his right of possession, but is merely incidental to the main action, which is to try title.

5. Partition \S 17(2)—Suit may be converted into trespass to try title.

A partition suit in ordinary form may be converted into trespass to try title by defendant's alleging right of possession in himself to all the land.

6. Partition \S 62 — Allegation of ownership means legal ownership and must be established.

Plaintiff's allegation in a partition suit that he is the owner of the land means that he is the owner of the legal title, and he must introduce evidence to establish the fact.

7. Partition \S 56—Plea of not guilty without place.

A plea of not guilty has no place in a partition suit.

8. Partition \S 62—Plea of general denial requires plaintiff to prove only prima facie case.

A plea of general denial in a partition suit only puts plaintiff on proof of facts necessary to make a prima facie case.

9. Partition \S 62—Proof of equitable title inadmissible for defendant widow under general denial.

A widow sued by a daughter for partition could not, under plea of general denial, show equitable title by proving the deed to her deceased husband offered in evidence by the daughter was other than what it purported to be, or that it was made to her husband in trust for her own benefit.

10. Trespass to try title \S 35(2)—Proof of equitable title in widow by deceased husband holding in trust for her inadmissible under general denial.

In trespass to try title by a decedent's daughter against his widow, wherein the latter pleaded a general denial, evidence of equitable title in the widow, showing that the deed to her deceased husband offered in evidence by plaintiff daughter was other than what it purported to be, or was made to the husband in trust for the widow's benefit, would not be admissible for her.

Appeal from District Court, San Saba County; W. M. Allison, Special Judge.

On motion for rehearing. Motion granted, judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

Walker & Burleson, of San Saba, for appellants.

Rector & Rector, of San Saba, for appellee.

JENKINS, J. [1] Appellant brought suit for partition of two tracts of land. The petition was in the form prescribed by article 6097, Revised Statutes. Appellant, to sustain her cause of action, introduced a deed to J. C. Churchwell, and proved that J. C. Churchwell was her father; that at the time of the execution of said deed he was the husband of defendant, Mrs. Lela Churchwell; that J. C. Churchwell was dead; that she was his only child; and that Mrs. Lela Churchwell was his surviving wife. This made a prima facie case, entitling her to have set aside to her one-half of the land in controversy.

Appellee was permitted, over objection of appellant, to offer evidence to the effect that the lands in controversy were paid for with her separate means.

Appellant objected to this testimony upon the ground that such fact was not pleaded, which objection was overruled. Such testimony was admitted, and upon special issue the jury found that the land in controversy was the separate property of appellee. Appellee pleaded only a general denial and a plea of not guilty.

[2-5] We are of the opinion that the court erred in admitting this testimony. A partition suit is based upon the theory of a common title, and not of disputed ownership. Sedgwick & Wait on Trial of Land Title, § 166. Partition of land may be prayed for in a suit of trespass to try title, where it is alleged that the plaintiff owns an undivided interest in the land, and that the defendant has ejected him therefrom, and denies his right of possession. McLean v. Moore, 145 S. W. 1074. But in such case partition is only an incident of the main action, which is to try title. A partition suit in the ordinary form may be converted into a suit of trespass to try title by the defendant alleging title and right of possession in himself to the whole of the land in controversy. De La Vega v. League, 64 Tex. 205; Banks v. Blake, 143 S. W. 1184, 1185.

[8] In the absence of such allegation the part of defendant, a partition suit is not a suit to try title. It is true that the plaintiff must make out a prima facie case. His allegation that he is the owner of the land means that he is the owner of the legal title, and he must introduce evidence to establish this fact.

[7, 8] A plea of not guilty has no place in a partition suit. A plea of general denial only puts the plaintiff on proof of facts necessary to make a prima facie case. Mims v. Mitchell, 1 Tex. 447; Townes on Pleading, 365, 366, and 370.

[9] The only facts necessary for plaintiff herein to have made a prima facie case—that is, to show that she held the legal title to a one-half undivided interest in the land in controversy—was to prove the facts, which it is hereinbefore stated she did prove, and which were not denied by the defendant. The defendant could not, under a plea of general denial, show an equitable title in herself by proving that the deed offered in evidence was other than what it purported to be, or that it was, as defendant claimed, made to her husband in trust for her benefit. Wiedner v. Hell, 26 S. W. 781; Griffin v. McKinney, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 432, 62 S. W. 78.

[10] Not only is such evidence not admissible in a partition suit, but it would not be admissible in trespass to try title. In such case, if the defendant desires to prove equities outside of those disclosed by a deed, such equities must be pleaded. Groesbeeck v. Crow, 85 Tex. 200, 20 S. W. 49; Matthews v. Moses, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 494, 52 S. W. 113; Rippetoe v. Dwyer, 49 Tex. 506; Robbins v. Hubbard, 108 S. W. 775; Peak v. Brinson, 71 Tex. 310, 11 S. W. 269; Moody v. Rowland, 100 Tex. 370, 99 S. W. 1112.

The evidence introduced by appellee in this case was in the nature of confession and avoidance; that is to say, that she, in effect, said to the plaintiff, although everything that you have testified to is true, and these facts show a prima facie legal title in you, yet there are other facts which avoid the force of the deed under which you claim, and these other facts show an equitable title in me.

As shown by the authorities above cited, such facts could not be proven unless they were pleaded. The doctrine that defective pleadings may be cured by verdict and judgment, as stated in Ellis v. Howard, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 566, 80 S. W. 633, cited by appellee, has no application to the facts of this case.

For the reason that the court erred in admitting testimony hereinbefore referred to we grant appellant's motion for rehearing, and reverse and remand this cause for a new trial.

KIRBY LUMBER CO. et al. v. CONN et al. (No. 575.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 14, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Trial \S 352(1)—Issue as to adverse possession held not erroneous.

An issue, "Do you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff O. has been in peaceful and adverse possession of the land described in plaintiff's petition for a period of 10 years next after the year 1896?" was not erroneous, as limiting the jury in their answer to the 10 years immediately following 1896.

2. Adverse possession \S 44 — Adverse occupancy must be for consecutive period of years.

In order to gain title by adverse possession, occupancy must be for a consecutive period of the required number of years.

3. Adverse possession \S 108—Necessity for designation on ground of land claimed.

As between the record owner and a limitation claimant, the latter cannot claim a specific 160 acres by actual possession for 10 years of less than 160 acres, unless the 160 acres so claimed, has been definitely designated on the ground for 10 years before the institution of the suit, but the limitation claimant can avoid such rule by showing that the specific 160 acres is a fair partition as between him and the record owner.

4. Tenancy in common \S 55(1)—Maintainable by one joint tenant against trespasser.

Since a limitation claimant of an undefined part of the land of another is a joint tenant with the record owner, the limitation claimant can maintain trespass to try title for a specific part of the land against third persons, who showed no title, although he has not occupied all of such land, as there can be no partition, except as between owners.

5. Adverse possession \S 57—Adverse occupancy for 10 years held sustained by evidence.

In an action by one claiming land by adverse possession, evidence held to sustain a finding that plaintiff held the land as described in his petition for a period of 10 years.

Appeal from District Court, Newton County; W. T. Davis, Judge.

Action by Mrs. S. N. Conn and others against the Kirby Lumber Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Andrews, Streetman, Logue & Mobley, of Houston, for appellants.

Warren & Conn, of Houston, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought in the usual form of trespass to try title by Charles Levias and wife, Ella Levias, and Mrs. S. N. Conn, as sole devisee and independent executrix of the estate of her deceased husband, R. C. Conn, against John H. Kirby and the Kirby Lumber Company. Levias and wife alleged that they were owners of 160 acres of land on the James Gray survey, in Newton county, Texas, describing it in their petition by metes and bounds, basing their claim on the statute of limitation of 10 years. Mrs. Conn held under Levias and wife, and claimed the timber on the land. Defendants answered by general demurrer and plea of not guilty, and the 3, 5, and 10 year statutes of limitation.

The case was submitted to the jury on the following issue:

"Do you believe, from the evidence, that the plaintiff Charles Levias has been in peaceful and adverse possession of the land described in plaintiff's petition for a period of 10 years next after the year 1896?"

—to which the jury answered "Yes." In connection with this issue the court submitted the statute of 10 years' limitation, and defined "peaceable possession" and "adverse possession." On this verdict judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, from which judgment the defendants have appealed.

Under all their assignments of error, appellants raise the issue that there was no evidence that Charles Levias had had peaceable and adverse possession of the specific 160 acres of land described in the petition for 10 years next after the year 1896. The testimony of Levias is that he entered upon the James Gray survey in 1896, and raised a crop on it, and that he was on this survey from that date until this suit was filed in 1917, cultivating, using, and enjoying the same and claiming 160 acres of land; that he built his house on it during the year 1897, and lived on it continuously from that time until this suit was instituted in December, 1917. In 1907 A. L. Shaw surveyed for Levias and wife 160 acres of land out of the James Gray survey, so as to include their improvements. Prior to this time Levias had been claiming an undivided 160 acres of land. After the survey he claimed to his marked boundaries. The land as surveyed by Shaw was the land described in plaintiffs' petition. In 1908 Levias and wife, by their warranty deed, conveyed to the said Shaw the east one-half of the land for a recited consideration of $125 cash, but in fact no consideration was paid. Shaw was employed by Levias to clear up his title, and agreed to give him one-half of the land for his services. At that time Shaw was not an attorney, and after consulting with competent counsel, he advised Levias that it would be best to take no action to clear up the title, but to wait until suit was brought against him. Shaw took no further steps in the matter. Afterwards R. C. Conn bought the timber on the entire 160 acres from Levias and wife, and then paid Shaw about $300 for a quitclaim deed to his interest in the 160 acres. No line was ever run between the east and west halves. The defendants showed no title in themselves.

[1, 2] In construing the issue submitted to the jury, appellants contend that the court limited them in their answer to the 10 years immediately following 1896; that is to say, the years 1897 to 1906, inclusive. We do not so construe the charge. In answering this issue, the jury were required to consider the occupancy of Levias from January 1, 1897, until the institution of this suit in December, 1917, and any consecutive period of occupancy for 10 years during that period will sustain the verdict of the jury. Appellants' assignments require us to examine the evidence to see if this verdict can be sustained. No question is made but what Levias lived on this land from 1897 until 1917, and that he claimed 160 acres during all this time; but appellants contend that the 10 years' occupancy from 1897 to 1907 cannot sustain a verdict to the specific land surveyed in 1907, citing Bering v. Ashley, 30 S. W. 838; L. & T. Lbr. Co. v. Kennedy, 103 Tex. 297, 126 S. W. 1110; L. & T. Lbr. Co. v. Stewart, 61 Tex. Civ. App. 255, 130 S. W. 199; Wickizer v. Williams, 173 S. W. 288, 1162; Patterson v. Bryant, 191 S. W. 771; Dowdell v. McCardell, 193 S. W. 182; Lockin v. Johnson, 202 S. W. 168.

[3] By these authorities it is now settled, beyond dispute, that, as between the record owner and a limitation claimant, the latter cannot claim a specific 160 acres of land by actual possession for 10 years of less than 160 acres, unless the 160 acres so claimed, including the improvements, has been definitely designated on the ground for 10 years before the institution of the suit. To avoid this rule, a limitation claimant must show, by pleading and proof, that the specific 160 acres is a fair partition as between him and the record owner. In this case, while the testimony would sustain such a finding, the issue was not raised by plaintiffs' pleadings.

[4] There can be no partition, except as between the owners. In this case the defendants failed to show any title in themselves. As the plaintiffs were joint tenants with the record owners of the balance of the survey, they could maintain this action to this specific 160 acres as against the defendants, who showed no title in themselves. Hill v. Smith, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 25 S. W. 1079; Padgett v. Gullmartin, 106 Tex. 551, 172 S. W. 1101.

[5] As we construe the evidence in this record, it fully sustains a finding that plaintiffs held the land as described in their petition for a period of 10 years. As shown by the testimony of Levias and his wife, Ella, something like 25 or 30 acres was under fence.

As shown above, no dividing line was ever run between the east and west halves. Ella Levias thus testified as to the location of the improvements on this 160 acres:

"As near as I can come to it, my house and field are somewhere close to the center of this 160 acres."

By this testimony Ella Levias raised the issue as to the location of the improvements on the 160 acres of land. If these improvements were about the center, then a portion of the cleared land must have been on the east half. This being so, the possession of Levias and wife was not disturbed nor broken by the execution of the deed to A. L. Shaw. It is true that Mr. Shaw testified:

"Ella Levias and Charles Levias by that deed (referring to the deed executed to him by Charles and Ella Levias) conveyed to me the east half of that 160 acres that I surveyed out. Their improvements were on the west portion of the 160 acres."

It is not shown by any statement made by appellants that Shaw was ever on this land after he surveyed it in 1907, more than 12 years before his testimony was given in this case. As reflected by this record, it appears that Ella Levias, though a negress, was an intelligent witness, and was thoroughly familiar with the boundaries of her land. We believe that her testimony sustains the verdict of the jury.

We have examined all the assignments raised by appellants, and, as we understand them, what we have said here disposes of all the legal propositions raised.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment of the trial court is in all things affirmed.

SMITH v. COBURN et al. (No. 548.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont. Feb. 18, 1920. On Rehearing, May 25, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error \S 1011(1)—Court finding on competent testimony not disturbed.

A finding by the trial court, sustained by competent testimony, will not be disturbed though there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding to the contrary.

2. Estoppel \S 118—Evidence held to show that claimant did not know property was included in mortgage.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage lien, where part of the property was claimed by another, evidence by the claimant that he did not know his property was included in the mortgage, when it was executed in his presence, held sufficient to sustain a finding that he did not consent to the mortgage so as to be estopped to claim the property.

3. Estoppel \S 94(1)—Recording chattel mortgage does not estop one not a party and ignorant of its contents.

The filing of a chattel mortgage in county records does not estop one who had no knowledge of its contents and was not a party to it from claiming the property as his own.

4. Chattel mortgages \S 48 — Description of crop held too indefinite.

A description in chattel mortgage of a crop which does not mention the year in which it was to be raised, nor specify the land on which it was to be grown, is too indefinite to cover the particular crop without proof of intention of the parties to specify the crop.

5. Appeal and error \S 877(2)—Plaintiff cannot complain of judgment for one defendant against another.

Where plaintiff appellant has no interest in a judgment rendered by one defendant against another, and neither defendant complains of that judgment, plaintiff's assignments of error attacking it will be overruled.

6. Chattel mortgages \S 275—Chattel mortgagor not necessary party to issue between mortgagee and adverse claimant.

Where the evidence showed that a chattel mortgagor had no interest in the crop covered by the mortgage, he is not a necessary party in foreclosure suit to issues raised by claimants of the crop as against the mortgagee who had seized it.

7. New trial \S 102(1)—Lack of diligence to procure evidence warrants denial.

A new trial for newly discovered evidence was properly denied where the suit had been pending nearly three years, the witnesses were personally acquainted with plaintiff and his attorney, and plaintiff wholly failed to show diligence in procuring their attendance.

On Rehearing.

8. Evidence \S 601(4)—Proof that tort-feasor bought crop as a certain grade held to warrant finding of grade.

Proof that one who converted a crop of cotton to his own use by seizing it under a chattel mortgage executed by one not the owner, bought it on the basis of middling lint cotton, and resold it so that the owner had no opportunity to establish the grade, is sufficient to warrant a finding that the cotton was of that grade where the tort-feasor made no proof that it was of a lesser grade.

9. Evidence \S 18—Court judicially knows value of cotton depends on its grade.

The Court of Civil Appeals, as a matter of common knowledge, knows that cotton marketed in Texas in any year differs in grade, and that its value materially depends upon its grade.

10. Appeal and error \S 740(2)—Assignment as to finding held multifarious.

An assignment that the court erred in finding that the cotton replevied was middling lint cotton, and in fixing the value thereof at stated price at the time of the trial without deducting the expenses of marketing, is multifarious, under Courts of Civil Appeals rules 24, 25 (142 S. W. xii), apparently stating three different errors in one assignment.

11. Appeal and error \Leftrightarrow 742(6)—Assignment not supported by proposition will not be considered.

An assignment of error to the fixing the value of replevied cotton without deducting the expenses of marketing is not in itself a proposition, and where it is not supported by a proposition of law it cannot be considered.

Appeal from Montgomery County Court; A. W. Morris, Jr., Judge.

Action by C. T. Smith against T. H. Coburn and others. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant Coburn, but in favor of the other defendants, for property claimed by them, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McCall & Crawford, of Conroe, for appellant.

F. McDonald, of Montgomery, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This suit was instituted in the county court of Montgomery county by appellant, C. T. Smith, against T. H. Coburn, on two promissory notes of $50 each, with interest and attorney's fees, and to foreclose a chattel mortgage lien on a mule, horse, wagon and cows, and on the corn and cotton raised by Coburn and his help on a farm in Montgomery county, Tex. He also made Charley Johnson and G. M. Scott defendants, alleging that they were asserting some sort of claim to this property. Plaintiff sued out a writ of sequestration, and seized the corn and cotton claimed under the mortgage. Coburn was served by publication, and the trial judge appointed counsel to represent him. Defendants Scott and Johnson answered to the effect, first, that they had no interest in any of the property claimed under the mortgage, except the cotton and corn and cotton seed; second, that the corn, cotton, and cotton seed belonged to Johnson, and that Coburn had no interest in it; third, that, in the beginning of the year 1916, Coburn and Johnson agreed to cultivate the crop together, and that Coburn executed a rent note to Scott, who owned the land, and that Johnson agreed that his part of the crop should also be liable for the rent; that Coburn left the country, did nothing towards cultivating the crop, and did not carry out his part of the contract, and that Johnson cultivated the crop by himself, and therefore Coburn had no interest in it. Johnson also prayed for the possession of his crops seized under the writ of sequestration, or the value of same, and for damages for the wrongful levy of the writ. Scott further pleaded a landlord's lien against Johnson's crop, asking for foreclosure of same, and for judgment against Johnson on his rent note, and for the advances made him.

Plaintiff filed a supplemental petition, alleging that Johnson knew that Coburn had executed the mortgage on the crops, was present when the mortgage was executed, claimed no interest in the crops, held himself out as being a hired hand to Coburn, and that Johnson was now estopped to assert any personal interest in the crops; that, if he did not know of the existence of the mortgage as a fact, plaintiff duly filed the mortgage in the proper records of Montgomery county, and that Johnson was given constructive notice of the mortgage and of its contents, and was therefore estopped.

The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff against Coburn for the amount of his debt, with a foreclosure of his lien on all of the property except the crops, and on this issue judgment was against plaintiff. Judgment was for Scott for the amount of his debt against Johnson, and for a foreclosure of landlord's lien on the Johnson crop, and for Johnson for the title and possession of the cotton and corn and cotton seed seized under the writ of sequestration, or their value. To this judgment plaintiff duly excepted, and has brought the case here for revision.

Appellant has filed a very able brief in this case, advancing 25 assignments of error, and as abstract legal questions most of these propositions are sound, but, as we view this case, it is determined by the trial court's conclusions of fact. By proper assignments the correctness of these are questioned by appellant. We will discuss the vital issues without special reference to the assignments.

[1] First. The court found that this crop belonged to Johnson, and that Coburn had no interest in it. There is abundant evidence in the record to sustain this finding. It is true the court could have found contrary to this, but being sustained by competent testimony, we will not disturb this finding.

Coburn and Johnson agreed to work this crop together, Coburn to make ties to pay expenses, and Johnson to work the crop; but Coburn left the county, and in no way complied with his part of the contract. Some of the witnesses testified that he worked on the crop just one-half day.

[2] Second. The court found that Johnson was not estopped to assert a claim to this property. Plaintiff and his witnesses testified that Johnson and his wife were present when Coburn executed the mortgage given to secure the first note, and represented himself as being Coburn's hired hand; made no claim to any interest in the crop. This was denied by Johnson. He said he knew that the plaintiff and Coburn were fixing up some kind of papers, but he thought it was a mortgage on Coburn's ties, and that he had no intimation that it was a mortgage on the crops, and did not learn this fact until long afterwards.

This testimony raises an issue of fact. The trial court heard the witnesses, saw their manner of testifying, and we cannot say that he was wrong in making this finding.

[3] The fact that this mortgage was duly filed in the chattel mortgage records of Montgomery county, in view of the fact that Johnson had no actual knowledge of its contents, could not work an estoppel against him.

Third. By proper assignments appellees raise the question that plaintiff's mortgages did not include this crop. The first mortgage is as follows:

"* * * And for such sums — hereby bargain, sell, and convey, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and convey, unto the said C. T. Smith, his heirs and assigns, the following described property, to wit: [Here follows description of the cows]; and on cotton, corn, and other products raised by — on my own place or other places in Montgomery county, Texas, or cultivated by me or my help during the year 191—, and all rental interest that may be due — from renters on said place or places above mentioned, and on my claims, interest, and liens as landlord for advances made to my tenants or otherwise."

The second mortgage, after describing the cattle, says:

"All the cotton, corn, and other products raised by — on the — place or other places in Montgomery county, Texas, and cultivated by — during the year 191—, and all rental interest that may be due — from renters on said place or places above mentioned, and all my claims, interest, and liens as landlord for advances made to my tenants or otherwise."

[4] Nowhere is mentioned, in either of these mortgages, the year in which the crop was to be raised, and the second mortgage is entirely too indefinite to include any particular place in Montgomery county. This cross-assignment is well taken.

As we have sustained the trial court in finding that Coburn had no interest in this property, and that Johnson was not estopped, and having found that these mortgages did not include the crops for 1916, it must follow that the trial court was correct in holding that appellant was not entitled to a foreclosure of the mortgage lien on the cotton and corn seized under the sequestration.

The trial court was not in error in fixing the grade of this cotton at middling. The plaintiff bought the cotton, after it was seized under the writ of sequestration, and testified that he bought it as middling. The same line of testimony sustains the court in finding the market value of the cotton seed.

[5] As appellant has no interest in the judgment entered by the court in favor of Scott against Johnson, and as neither of them complains of the judgment, it being entered on their respective pleas, we overrule appellant's assignments attacking the same.

[6] As Coburn had no interest in the crop raised by Johnson, he was not a necessary party to the issues raised by Johnson and Scott and their answer to plaintiff's petition. Plaintiff had seized this crop, alleging that Johnson and Scott were asserting some claim to it. They answered that they were the owners of the crop, thus making an issue between them and Smith, to which Coburn was not a necessary party.

[7] Appellant was not entitled to a new trial because of the newly discovered testimony. This suit had been pending in the county court of Montgomery county nearly three years. These witnesses were personally acquainted with the plaintiff and plaintiff's attorney, and appellant has wholly failed to show proper diligence in securing their attendance.

In view of the disposition made by us of the assignments above discussed, appellant's other assignments become immaterial, and are overruled.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment of the trial court is in all things affirmed.

On Rehearing.

On rehearing, appellant insists that we are in error in holding that the mortgages introduced by him were void. We did not intend to so hold. All we said was that these mortgages were too indefinite to cover the crops raised by Coburn on the Scott place during the year 1916. By proper pleading and proof, under the rule announced in Perkins v. Alexander, 209 S. W. 789, and Clark-Boyce Lbr. Co. v. Commercial National Bank, 200 S. W. 199, appellant could have shown that it was the intention of the parties to subject to these mortgages the crops to be raised on the Scott place during the year 1916. However, inasmuch as we have sustained the trial court's finding that Coburn had no interest in such crops, a further discussion of this question is immaterial, because appellant could not subject the cotton involved in this suit to these mortgages.

[8] In stating in our original opinion that "the plaintiff testified that he bought it [the cotton] as middling," we misconstrued his testimony. His testimony was that he bought it on the basis of middling lint cotton, and paid the highest price that was offered for it at that time. The record does not show that either of the appellees ever saw this cotton after it was picked. Appellant took charge of it, shipped it out, sold it on the Houston market, and appropriated the proceeds. Also it does not appear that any one except the appellant knew the true grade of this cotton. It affirmatively appears that he had placed it beyond the ability of appellees to show the true grade.

[9] As a matter of common knowledge, we know "that cotton marketed in Texas in any year differs in grade, and its value materially depends upon its grade." Brass v. Railway Co., 218 S. W. 1040. When appellees traced this cotton into the hands of appellant, and showed that he had wrongfully converted it to his own use, and had placed it beyond their power to show its correct grade, and when they further showed that he had bought the cotton on the basis of middling, and that middling cotton was of the market value of 30¼c per pound, it then became the duty of appellant to show the correct grade of the cotton, and on his failure so to do it will be presumed that affirmative testimony as to such grade would have been against his interests, and that it was to his interest to conceal the correct grade and value of the cotton. At least, when appellant remained silent and failed to show the correct grade, an issue of fact was thus raised against him, and the court's finding on that issue is conclusive on us. Beaumont, Sour Lake & Western Ry. Co. v. Myrick, 208 S. W. 935; Railway Co. v. Day, 104 Tex. 237, 136 S. W. 438, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 111; Pullman Co. v. Cox, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 120 S. W. 1060; Pullman Co. v. Nelson, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 223, 54 S. W. 626; Insurance Co. v. Tillman, 84 Tex. 31, 19 S. W. 294.

In Brass v. Railway Co., supra, the Supreme Court held that it was the duty of the plaintiff to show the correct grade and value of the cotton; but in that case it is not shown that the defendant knew the correct grade, or had concealed the grade from the court. Appellant relies upon that case as being in point, and has cited it to us on his proposition of reversible error. We think there is a clear distinction between the two cases.

The court did not err in fixing the value of the cotton seed at $28. This is the sum appellant received for the cotton seed when he sold it. When the cotton was seized under the writ of sequestration, the officer executing the writ employed the defendant Johnson to pick the cotton and paid him for the picking. Under the direction of appellant, the cotton was hauled to the gin, ginned, wrapped, and sold. This expense is taxed as court costs against appellant. The trial court rendered judgment against him for the market value of the cotton as ginned and wrapped, and did not allow any credit for the picking and other expenses incurred. On rehearing appellant insists that we were in error in not sustaining his assignment complaining of this ruling of the court; citing Brown v. Leath, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 264, 42 S. W. 655, 44 S. W. 42.

[10] The sixth is the only assignment we find in his brief raising this issue, which is as follows:

"Because the court erred in finding that the two bales of lint cotton replevied by plaintiff was middling lint cotton, and fixing the value thereof at 30¼ cents per pound at the time of the trial, without deducting the expenses of marketing therefrom."

This assignment is clearly multifarious. It would seem that three different errors are stated in this one assignment. Rules 24 and 25 for Courts of Civil Appeals (142 S. W. xii). Russell v. Old River Co., 210 S. W. 705.

[11] However, waiving this objection to this assignment, we have considered the only proposition advanced under it, which is as follows:

"There is no evidence in this record showing that the two bales of cotton sued for herein, and for which recovery is had in favor of Chas. Johnson against plaintiff and the sureties on his replevy bond, was middling grade cotton of any particular grade."

Though appellant in his assignment of error complains of the refusal of the court to deduct the expenses of marketing the cotton, he does not advance a proposition of law under this assignment showing in what manner the ruling of the court on this issue was error, nor does he advance the assignment itself as a proposition. In view of this fact, we are without authority to consider this question as raised on motion for rehearing. The rule is thus announced in Vernon's Sayles' Civil Statutes, under article 1612, vol. 1, p. 843, where a long list of authorities is collated:

"Assignments of error which are not propositions in themselves, and are not followed by propositions as required by rule 30 (67 S. W. xvi), will not be considered."

As stated in our original opinion, in view of the finding of the court that Coburn had no interest in the cotton in controversy, appellant's assignments, except those discussed by us, become immaterial, and it would serve no useful purpose to discuss them further. The motion for rehearing is in all things overruled.

SCHEPS v. GILES. (No. 588.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 19, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Appeal and error — 1040(10)—Overruling of exceptions on ground of misjoinder of actions held harmless.

Though one paragraph of plaintiff's petition for damages for breach of a contract of employment alleged damages not properly included within exemplary damages growing out of breach of the contract, the overruling of an exception to the petition on the ground of misjoinder of actions was harmless, where the prayer and fourth paragraph limited recovery to exemplary damages based on the breach of the contract, and such issues alone were submitted to the jury.

2. Damages — 89(2) — Malicious breach of contract subjects wrongdoer to exemplary damages.

While ordinarily exemplary damages are not allowed for breach of contract, the breach may be accompanied by such malicious and oppressive conduct as to subject the wrongdoer not only to actual but also to exemplary damages.

3. Master and servant — 41(5)—Exemplary damages for breach of contract of employment held warranted.

In an action for damages for breach of contract of employment, held, that employer's conduct in asserting before others that plaintiff, a woman, was a liar, etc., was so wanton and malicious as to warrant the allowance of exemplary damages.

4. Trial — 143 — Conflicting evidence is for jury.

It is for the jury to determine conflicts in the evidence.

5. Master and servant — 41(5)—$500 exemplary damages for discharge held not excessive.

An award of $500 exemplary damages for breach of contract of employment held not so excessive or unreasonable as to show passion or prejudice; it appearing, according to plaintiff's testimony, that her employer accused her of being a liar.

6. Exceptions, bill of — 54—Bystanders' bills filed after term and unverified cannot be considered.

Bystanders' bills filed in April after trial had in November, which were not verified by bystanders or any one else, and which were filed after adjournment of the term at which cause was tried, cannot be considered.

Appeal from Harris County Court; R. M. Love, Judge.

Action by Anna Giles against Adolph Scheps. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Heidingsfelders and Norman C. Kittrell, all of Houston, for appellant.

Rowe & Kay, of Houston, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This suit was brought by the appellee against the appellant for damages, actual and exemplary, for breach of the following contract:

"I, Adolph Scheps, hereby agree to pay in salary to Anna Giles for eight months within one year, $25.00 for services per week as trimmer and two months between seasons at $18.00 per week, two months vacation—no pay one month in summer and one in winter. I, Adolph Scheps, also agree to pay Miss Giles' transportation from New York to Houston, Texas, only.

"[Signed]

A. Scheps.
"Anna Giles."

The case was submitted to the jury on the following issues:

(1) "Was plaintiff discharged by the defendant substantially as alleged in plaintiff's petition?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

(2) "Was the discharge of plaintiff by defendant without lawful cause therefor?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

(3) "If you find the answer to foregoing question No. 1 in the affirmative, and only in such event, then what amount do you find to be due the plaintiff under said contract?" To which the jury answered, "$280.27."

(4) "Was the discharge of plaintiff by defendant without lawful cause and done in a malicious and humiliating manner, and did the same pain and humiliate the plaintiff?" To which the jury answered, "Yes."

(5) "If you answer the question in special issue No. 4 in the affirmative, and only in such event, then say by your answer to said issue what amount you find as exemplary damages?" To which the jury answered, "$500."

On this verdict, judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant has appealed to this court and has assigned errors.

[1] Appellant's first assignment of error is that the court erred in overruling defendant's special exception to plaintiff's petition on the ground of misjoinder of causes of action.

In the first paragraph of her petition, plaintiff states the contract. In the second paragraph she alleges the breach thereof by defendant, and states her actual damages in the sum of $318.50. The balance of her petition is as follows:

"III. Plaintiff alleges that at the time of the tortious breach of the contract by said defendant, as aforesaid, the said defendant was insulting, oppressive, and threatening in his manner and publicly and in the presence of one Mrs. Glasgow called the plaintiff a liar several times, and without any excuse or justification therefor, discharged the plaintiff. That the words spoken and pronounced in public against and concerning this plaintiff were violently abusive, and were false and untrue and were willfully, maliciously, and falsely spoken and pronounced in public by the said defendant for the purpose, and with the intention not only to injure this plaintiff, but to humiliate her and cause her to lose the esteem and respect of her friends, and the same did injure her in her business and profession; and such language did injure and humiliate her and cause her much mental pain and distress to her damage in the sum of $500, for which sum this plaintiff sues as and for exemplary damages.

"IV. That by reason of the premises plaintiff has sustained actual damages in the sum of $318.50.

"That by reason of the malicious, willful, wrongful, and fraudulent breach of his said contract with the plaintiff, she is entitled to recover exemplary damages in the sum of $500.

"Wherefore, premises considered, plaintiff prays the court that the defendant be cited to appear and answer this petition, and that on final hearing hereof she have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $318.50, actual damages, and for the sum of $500 as exemplary damages; for costs of suit in this behalf expended, and for such other and further relief, in law or in equity, to which she may be entitled; and as in duty bound the plaintiff will ever pray."

If by her third paragraph she has stated damages not properly included within exemplary damages, growing out of the breach of contract, she has waived such relief by the fourth paragraph of her petition and by her prayer. It clearly appears that plaintiff was suing for $318.50, the balance due her under the contract, and for $500 exemplary damages "by reason of malicious, willful, wrongful, and fraudulent breach of said contract with the plaintiff." She prays:

"That on final hearing hereof she have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $318.50, actual damages, and for the sum of $500 as exemplary damages."

Such exemplary damages are merely based on the breach of the contract. These were the only issues submitted to the jury.

[2-4] Ordinarily, exemplary damages are not allowed for breach of a contract, but the breach may be accompanied by such malicious and oppressive conduct as to subject the wrongdoer not only to actual damages, but also to exemplary damages. G. C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 543, 46 Am. Rep. 269; Tignor v. Toney, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 518, 35 S. W. 881; Hooks v. Fitzenrieter, 76 Tex. 277, 13 S. W. 230; Burnett v. Edling, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 711, 48 S. W. 775; Southwestern Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Luckett, 60 Tex. Civ. App. 117, 127 S. W. 856; Oklahoma Fire Ins. Co. v. Ross, 170 S. W. 1064. As shown by the testimony of appellee, in which she was fully corroborated by Mrs. Glasgow, appellant was very insulting to her at the time he discharged her. She said:

"I went to work on Thursday morning, and Mr. Scheps had three hats laying aside, and he asked if that was all the work I had done the day before, and I said, 'No,' and he said, 'Where is it?' and I said, 'You came up here yesterday and carried it down,' and he said: 'You are a liar. I didn't do anything of the kind.' And I said: 'You are mistaken, when I came in from lunch I met you coming down with a lot of hats, and in the afternoon you came and got some more.' And he said, 'You are a liar. I didn't do anything of the kind.' And I then said to Mrs. Glasgow, 'Don't you remember all the hats I trimmed in the morning with the flowers on them?' and she said, 'Sure I remember,' and he said: 'I don't need you to prove anything by either one of you. You are both one. Take your hat and coat and get out. I wouldn't tolerate you another minute.' He told me three times to take my hat and coat and get out. He did not make any motion, or move, or anything; just stood there and talked with me in a very abusive manner. He walked around the table toward me, but that is not the time I left. I waited until he went downstairs. No, sir; I was not afraid of him, but his language humiliated me, surely it did, because I never had anything like that happen to me before in my life. Mrs. Glasgow was present at the time this took place. It made me feel badly and hurt my feelings, too, to think that I had tried to do my duty, and then to be talked to like that."

Appellant's version, in which he is corroborated by one of his witnesses, is as follows:

"When I went up there in the morning, I noticed a hat that had been laying there five or six days and had not been fixed; and I told her, 'This buckle needs tacking,' and I looked around, and I said, 'Miss Giles, have you had any orders yesterday?' and she said, 'No,' and said, 'Why?' and I said, 'Have you trimmed any more than these hats?' and she said, 'Yes,' and I said, 'Where are they? Here are the hats, the three hats.' And she said, 'I did trim more than three hats,' and I said, 'Where are they?' and she snapped me up and said, 'Do you mean to call me a liar?' and I said, 'No.' So I said: 'I didn't call you a liar. Here are the three hats that speak for themselves. Here is the proof of the pudding.' And she said, 'Mrs. Glasgow, didn't I trim more than three hats?' and in reply, she said: 'Yes, I think so, I think you trimmed some with flowers.' And I said, 'What is the use of taking her into the conversation, she is tending to her work?' and she said, 'Do you mean to call us both a liar? She was sore and angry, and she had a hat in her lap, and she got hold of the hat and was about to swing it, and I saw that, and I said: 'I think you and I are through. You better get your hat and coat and leave.' She told me, 'You are one,' and got hold of the hat as if to throw it at me, and I immediately left the workroom and went downstairs, and Miss Giles sat up there about 20 minutes, and I got busy at my desk, and she picked herself up and left."

Cam Kay, attorney for plaintiff, testified as follows in regard to the statement by Mr. Scheps:

"I drove down to his place after I wrote him this letter, and I asked if he wanted to make a settlement of this thing, or did he want to go to court, as Miss Giles had told me she was going to sue him and have him prosecuted, and he asked what we would be satisfied with, and I told him we would be satisfied with the payment of her money up to the end of her contract, and he said: 'I cannot give you an answer now; I will have to see my lawyer, and will tell you to-morrow.' And the next day he didn't come up, and I telephoned him and asked him if he had seen his lawyer, and he said yes, and that he would come up, and he came up and said he did not tell me he wanted Miss Giles to go back to work. He did say, 'My lawyer has written her a letter and registered it,' and I said: 'I have nothing to do with that. You pay her according to her contract up to the 18th day of January, and she will be satisfied.' And he said, 'I will not do that,' and I said, 'There is nothing open but to go into court.' I was looking out for Miss Giles' case, and I did ask him if her work was satisfactory, and he said, 'Absolutely, no disagreement at all about her work,' and I said, 'Did she fulfill her contract?' and he said, 'Yes, but she disputed my word, and I would allow no woman to work for me and dispute my word,' and I said, 'She says you called her a liar,' and he said, 'That will be settled in court,' and I said, 'All right.'"

We believe the testimony of plaintiff and her witnesses. Mrs. Glasgow, and Mr. Kay, bring this case within the rule announced by the decisions cited above. The issue being properly submitted, it was for the jury to decide who was telling the truth. As this issue was resolved in favor of the plaintiff, we will not disturb it.

[6] The third assignment of error complains of the judgment as being excessive and unreasonable, and that it was rendered through passion and prejudice. This assignment is overruled. If the defendant used toward Miss Giles the language testified to by her (and the jury were the proper judges of this issue), the verdict was in no sense excessive and unreasonable.

[8] The second assignment complains of the admission of certain testimony. Appellant has attempted to present this question in six bystanders' bills of exception, which are not approved by the trial judge; each of them having this statement:

"The above bill of exception No. — (this being filled by the number of the bill of exception), which reflects the true facts was presented to the judge of the court and to counsel for appellee, and same could not be agreed to, as between counsel for appellant and ap-pellee and the court, the trial judge refused to sign the same or order same filed. Therefore this bill is presented and the undersigned witnesses thereto state that they and each of them were present at the trial of the above cause and were present in court at the time the facts in dispute occurred, and that same as set out above is true and correct. We further state that we are citizens of the City of Houston, Harris County, Texas.

"[Signed] N. L. Jacobs.

"Ed Carr.

"P. G. Houchins."

These bills of exception were filed April 4, 1919. This case was tried November 29, 1918. None of these bills were verified by the bystanders, nor by any one else. The term of the court during which the case was tried adjourned on January 4, 1919. As presented by these bills of exception, we cannot review the action of the court in admitting the testimony complained of.

Justice Carl, in Kenedy Mercantile Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 167 S. W. 1094, states the rule:

"Appellant has one bill of exceptions, which is not approved by the trial court, but which is signed by three persons who are called bystanders. The parties so signing do not swear to the matters set out in the bill. The judgment was November 25, 1913, and the bill of exceptions is dated January 6, 1914. It has been held that, to meet the requirements of article 2067, the bill must be prepared and sworn to and filed at the time of the occurrence of the matters to which it relates (Dehougne v. Western Union Tel. Co., 84 S. W. 1068; Shook v. Shook, 145 S. W. 699), and when it is not verified it will not be considered. (G. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Holt, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 330, 70 S. W. 591.) The affidavit of one bystander is not sufficient since the statute requires three. Taylor v. State, 87 S. W. 1039."

The fourth assignment is that the court erred in not entering judgment for defendant, as per prayer therefor made by defendant; and the fifth is that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for new trial for the reasons set forth therein. These assignments are in all things overruled.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment of the trial court is in all things affirmed.

LUDTKE et ux. v. WILSON. (No. 586.)

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Beaumont.
May 17, 1920. Rehearing Denied
June 9, 1920.)

1. Adverse possession §114(2)—Description of land by party claiming adversely sufficient to sustain verdict.

In trespass to try title, evidence for defendant describing land occupied adversely held sufficiently definite to sustain a verdict in his favor.

2. Adverse possession §98—Naked possession not extended by construction beyond actual occupancy.

When naked possession alone is relied on as constituting title to land, there must be an actual occupancy of the land, and the possession cannot be extended by construction beyond the actual occupancy.

3. Witnesses §37(6)—Witness competent to testify as to boundary line.

Where a witness testified that he had known the location of the boundary line between several lots all his life, that there were marked trees there recognized as being on the dividing line, and that he was present when a survey of certain property was made and the line between the lots was marked, the court erred in not permitting him to testify as to the location of such line in regard to certain improvements.

Error from District Court, Harris County; J. D. Harvey, Judge.

Action by H. T. D. Wilson against W. F. Ludtke and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

Pritchett Harvey and F. L. Jones, both of Houston, for plaintiffs in error.

Harry Holmes and Louis, Campbell & Nicholson, all of Houston, for defendant in error.

WALKER, J. In our discussion of this case, we will speak of plaintiffs in error as appellants and the defendant in error as appellee. This action was in trespass to try title, brought by the appellee, H. T. D. Wilson, against the appellants, W. F. Ludtke and wife, and involves the south half of block 12 of the Royal addition to the city of Houston, Harris county, Tex. Block 12 is in the southwest corner of the Royal addition and is a part of lot 8, and on the south boundary line of lot 8 of the original subdivision of the Harris and Wilson two-league grant. The case was tried to a jury, and on conclusion of the evidence a verdict was instructed for the appellee.

[1] Many years ago this Harris and Wilson grant was subdivided into several lots, the upper tier including lots 7 and 8 and the lower tier including lots 14, 15, 16, and 17. Lot 8 contained about 250 acres, and lots 15 and 16, as shown by a pencil sketch made a part of this record, lie immediately south of lot 8 and contain about 40 or 50 acres each. The north boundary line of lots 15 and 16 is the south boundary line of lot 8, the northeast corner of 15 being the southeast corner of 8 and the northwest corner of 16 being the southwest corner of 8. About 1854 August Ludtke, the father of appellant, acquired a claim to a portion of lot 15. In a partition he was awarded about 26 acres off the west side of this lot, extending from the Buffalo bayou, which was the south boundary line, to the north boundary line, which was the south boundary line of lot 8. Old man Ludtke built his improvements on the south end of his tract and raised his family there. The appellant was born on lot 15 and has lived practically all his life on this lot. About 1887 or 1888 old man Ludtke promised to give his two boys, the appellant and Pete, 30 acres of land off the north end of lot 15. The land was not surveyed, but the father and the boys stepped it off, marking one corner. The boys improved this land, thinking they were on lot 15, built houses and stockpens, and cleared up about 5 acres. Years afterwards appellant bought the north half of block 12, as described in appellee's petition, from a man named Bettis, and moved from his 5-acre improvements to the north half of block 12. According to the testimony of appellant, his 5-acre improvements extended beyond lot 15 and onto the southeast corner of the land in controversy. Appellant described his inclosure on lot 12 as being about the size of three city lots, 50 feet wide and 100 feet long, lying on the south boundary line and extending north. On cross-examination he said, emphatically, that he did not know where the dividing line between lot 8 and lot 15 was; that he did not know the exact location of the south boundary line of lot 12, nor the exact location of the east line of lot 12, but, taking his testimony as a whole, we believe that this issue was fairly raised. He had lived there all his life. He had bought the north half from Bettis, and was living on it. Bettis had the lot under fence at one time. Appellee had had trouble with Bettis in establishing the line between his claim to the south half and Bettis' claim to the north half. Appellee introduced a blueprint map of lots 15 and 16, and this map shows that Ludtke's fence on lot 15 extended into lot 8. Appellant further testified that he had had this corner of lot 12 under fence for about 30 years, and that his fence was still there. If appellant's improvements extended on to the southeast corner of lot 12, his description is sufficiently definite to sustain a verdict of the jury. The issue raised by his testimony as to this encroachment should have gone to the jury.

By their third assignment, appellants complain of the refusal of the court to submit to the jury the following charge:

"Gentlemen of the Jury: If you believe from a preponderance of the evidence that the defendants and those under whom they claim had ten years' peaceable and adverse possession (as those terms are hereinbefore defined) prior to August 18, 1910, of any part of the south end of lot No. 8 of subdivision of Harris and Wilson two-league grant of land in Harris county, Tex., cultivating, using, or enjoying the same, then the defendants would be entitled to hold not to exceed 160 acres of land, including their improvements, and if you so find, you will find for the defendants," etc.

[2] This assignment is overruled. Appellants cannot recover beyond their actual inclosures on lot 8. The testimony of appellant brings his claim clearly within the rule announced in Bracken v. Jones, 63 Tex. 184, he said:

"At the time my father gave us this land, he was claiming it as his, as a part of the property which he owned in that vicinity. He was claiming it under the deed he had from old man Haley, and he claimed it to be a part of lot 15, I think, and we thought it was a part of lot 15 when we went out there. Our father thought he was giving us a part of the land he bought from Haley. My father bought from Haley the south half of lot 15. He left the north half out. Later on Wilson sued my father for a partition of lot 15, in which suit we were supposed to get the west half, and that was because in the deed from Haley to my father he conveyed him an undivided one-half interest in lot 15, and at the time our father conveyed the land to us he was living on the west half of it. He was living on the 26-acre tract known as the Ludtke homestead tract. My father did not assert claim to any part of the land until he bought it from Haley. When he bought from Haley he moved over on to that and half of 82 acres is what he claimed, but in the suit 26 acres was awarded to him."

[3] The court erred in excluding the testimony of J. M. Ludtke as to the location of the dividing line between lots 15 and 16 and lot 8. He testified that he had known the location of this line all his life; that there were marked trees there recognized as being on the dividing line. He further testified that he was present when his father's west half of lot 15 was surveyed out, and the line between 15 and 8 was marked. The record shows lot 12 was on the south boundary line of lot 8. If permitted by the court, the witness would have testified that the improvements of W. F. Ludtke extended from lot 15 on to lot 8, and that W. F. Ludtke lived on block 12 of the Royal addition on the south end of lot 8.

For the errors discussed, this cause is reversed and remanded for a new trial.

WILLIAMS LUMBER CO. et al. v. DUDLEY & HEALAN. (No. 34.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 7, 1920.)

1. Logs and logging — Evidence held to warrant finding that contract for cutting and manufacturing timber was modified.

In an action for a balance claimed due on a contract for the cutting of timber and the manufacturing of the same into lumber, evidence held to warrant a finding that the provision as to stacking the lumber for measurement was modified.

2. Appeal and error — Verdict on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

A verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed by the appellate court.

3. Logs and logging — Evidence as to amount of lumber from logs held admissible, in view of modification of contract.

Where a contract for the cutting of timber and manufacture of the same into lumber, which provided for the stacking of the lumber for measurement, was modified, and defendants were allowed to move the lumber as it came from the mill, evidence as to the measurement of the logs cut and as to the amount of lumber which would be produced therefrom is admissible over objection that proof of the amount of lumber was made in a fashion different from that fixed by the contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Van Buren County; J. M. Shinn, Judge.

Action by Dudley & Healan against the Williams Lumber Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

S. W. Woods, of Marshall, for appellants.
Appellees, pro se.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellees entered into a written contract on June 18, 1918, with B. J. Powell, one of the appellants, whereby it was agreed that appellant should cut the standing timber on a large body of land owned by appellant, and manufacture the same into lumber for the price of $7.50 per thousand feet, board measure, and an additional sum of 50 cents per thousand feet for stacking the lumber on the millyard. The contract provided that appellees should manufacture the lumber according to certain specifications, and to stack it on the millyard and Powell should "check up and accurately measure all lumber cut and stacked under this contract and according to the specifications under the contract."

Appellees instituted this action against Powell and his coappellant Williams Lumber Company, alleging that the latter was a partner with Powell in the transaction, and that Powell acted as the agent of said corporation, that appellees had manufactured 1,007,508 feet of lumber under the contract, and that appellants had paid thereon the sum of $5,462.01, leaving a balance of $1,640.92, and had refused to pay said sum. Judgment is prayed for the amount of the balance due under the contract. Appellants filed answer, denying that Williams Lumber Company was a party to said contract or was interested therein, and denied that Powell was indebted to appellees in any sum for lumber manufactured under the contract. The answer sets forth the amount of lumber manufactured under the contract by appellees according to the contention of appellants, and also alleges that appellants had paid to appellees the sum of $145.74 in excess of the amount due, for which judgment over against appellees is prayed for. There was a trial of the issues before a jury, and the judgment was in favor of appellees for the recovery of $1,250.

[1] It is contended here that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the verdict, and that the court erred in permitting appellees to make proof of the amount of lumber manufactured according to a different basis than that specified in the contract. The contract provides that payment be made at the specified price per thousand feet according to the measurement designated as "board measure," that appellees should stack the lumber on the yard, and that Powell should measure it after it was cut and stacked and pay for it according to the prices mentioned. The contention, however, of appellees is that the contract was changed by mutual agreement concerning the requirement that appellant should stack the lumber on the yard, and that it was agreed instead that appellants should accept the lumber as it came from the saw and haul it away to the lumber yard of the Williams Lumber Company at Shirley. It is earnestly insisted by counsel for appellants that there is no proof in support of this contention, but we are of the opinion that there was sufficient testimony justifying the submission to the jury.

The testimony of one of the appellees, who gave personal attention to the transaction with appellants, is rather vague as to what was actually said between the parties, but there is testimony to the effect that appellants hauled the lumber away as taken from the saw without requiring it to be stacked, and that there was an agreement between the parties that appellants could have the lumber sticks used in stacking lumber for the purpose of stacking it in piles on the millyard at Shirley. If, as contended by appellees, the lumber was accepted by appellants as it came from the saw and was hauled away by them, that constituted a waiver of the express stipulation of the contract with respect to the stacking on the millyard, even though there was no express agreement that the contract should change in any regard.

[2, 3] Appellees introduced proof showing the measurement of the logs cut from the land and hauled into the mill, and the amount of merchantable lumber contained in each log. They also introduced proof tending to show that board measure, which means the grading and measurement of each board after being manufactured, exceeds the log measure about 20 per centum on average logs—in other words, that the output of logs properly manufactured into lumber will, according to board measure, be on an average 20 per centum in excess of log measurement. There is scarcely any dispute about that, and the testimony in this case shows that most of the logs would run about 30 or 33½ per centum according to board measure over log measure. This proof was adduced by appellees, not for the purpose, as we understand it, of changing the rule of measurement specified in the contract, but to show what amount of the lumber was manufactured under the contract according to the kind of measurement specified in the contract. In other words, the amount to be recovered was sought to be established by proof of the quantity of lumber according to board measure, but in order to arrive at it appellees proved what the actual measurement was according to the rules for log measure, and then added the percentage of gain.

If, as contended by appellees, the lumber was taken from the saw and hauled away before being stacked, this was the only available method of proof to establish what the amount of lumber was according to board measure. Powell was, according to the terms of the contract, to check and measure the lumber after it was stacked on the yard, but this was not done because that feature of the contract was changed, and appellants hauled the lumber away before it was stacked. We think that the court was correct in allowing appellees to make out their case by the only kind of testimony that was available, that is, by proving the amount of lumber in each log according to accepted standards of measurement, and then by adding the amount of difference between log measure and board measure. There was a conflict in the testimony as to the character of the logs, whether the appellees measured in rotten logs which did not produce merchantable lumber, but we think that there was enough testimony to show that after reasonable deductions were made for rotten logs and lumber not properly manufactured there was an average gain of 20 per centum over the log measurement. Appellants presented before the jury what they claimed to be an accurate account of the amount of lumber according to board measure, and it was much less in quantity than the amount that appellees contended they had manufactured. This conflict, however, was settled by the verdict of the jury, and we are of the opinion that there was sufficient testimony to support the verdict. There was also testimony tending to show that Williams Lumber Company was a party in interest under the contract, and that Powell acted as the agent of that company in making the contract. The contention of appellants is that Williams Lumber Company was not interested in the contract, but was merely a purchaser from Powell of the lumber manufactured under the contract. There are many circumstances proved by the evidence which, standing alone, would not be sufficient to establish the interest of Williams Lumber Company in this contract, but when all were considered together they warranted the inference by the jury that the Williams Lumber Company was a party to the contract, and not merely a purchaser of the lumber from Powell. It is unnecessary to undertake to detail those circumstances.

There were objections to the ruling of the court with respect to instructions to the jury, but the objections are based mainly on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the issues; and, since we have reached the conclusion that the evidence was legally sufficient on each of the issues presented, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the court's charge.

Judgment affirmed.

GOOD et al. v. STATE LINE OIL & GAS CO. et al. (No. 31.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 31, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Garnishment \S 107—Creditor first serving acquires prior lien.

As between general creditors and a particular debtor, the one obtaining and first serving a writ of garnishment upon a third party owing the debtor will acquire a prior and paramount lien thereon to the extent of his claim.

2. Stipulations \S 14(10)—Findings held not supported by agreed facts.

In a garnishment proceeding where other creditors intervened, a finding by the chancellor that funds garnished were trust funds belonging to all the creditors was not supported by an agreed statement of facts, "It is agreed that the creditors set out herein are due the amounts set opposite their respective names as individuals; * * * that no creditor is in a position to identify the funds garnished."

Appeal from Craighead Chancery Court; Archer Wheatley, Chancellor.

Suit by J. R. Good and others against the State Line Oil & Gas Company and others, in which H. J. Spencer and others intervened. From an adverse decree, the plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Appellants pro se.

E. L. Westbrooke, of Jonesboro, for appellees.

HUMPHREYS, J. Appellants instituted suit in the Craighead chancery court, western district, against appellees, State Line Oil & Gas Company, P. C. Ford, manager, and P. C. Ford, to recover amounts set opposite their respective names, as creditors of P. C. Ford. Said appellees being nonresidents, a writ of garnishment was issued and duly served against the Bank of Jonesboro to impound money deposited in said bank by the said P. C. Ford. A warning order was issued against the appellees aforesaid in the manner, form, and for the time prescribed by law. Subsequently interventions were filed by appellees H. J. Spencer et al., claiming amounts set opposite their respective names, as creditors of the said P. C. Ford, under the same conditions as amounts due appellants by the said P. C. Ford, and praying that they be permitted to share in the funds deposited to the credit of P. C. Ford in the Bank of Jonesboro and theretofore garnished by appellants. Thereupon appellants filed a motion to strike said interventions from the files, alleging priority as creditors of the said P. C. Ford by reason of the writ of garnishment they had caused to be issued and served upon the Bank of Jonesboro, impounding funds deposited therein by the said P. C. Ford, and alleging further that the interveners had no equitable rights in the fund.

The cause was submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts embodying the substance of the pleadings and evidence, from which the court found that $1,888.81 was on deposit in the Bank of Jonesboro in the name of P. C. Ford, but that neither P. C. Ford nor the State Line Oil & Gas Company had any ownership therein, but were trust funds belonging to appellants and interveners in proportion to their respective claims. In accordance with the findings the court decreed that the Bank of Jonesboro should pay to the clerk of the court, who had theretofore been appointed receiver on the application of the interveners, the trust fund aforesaid, and that the receiver, Ben Eddins, should apportion said amount between all claimants who had filed their claims prior to the 15th day of October, 1918, pursuant to an order theretofore made, in proportion to their respective claims, as designated by the amounts set opposite the name of each. From the findings and decree of the chancery court, an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

[1, 2] Appellants insist that the court erred in decreeing interveners' participation in the funds before appellants' lien thereon, by reason of the garnishment, had been discharged.

"The lien of garnishment dates from the time the garnishment writ is served upon the garnishee." Bergman v. Sells & Co., 39 Ark. 97.

"Service of process on a garnishee creates a lien in favor of the plaintiff on the money due from the garnishee to the defendant, and upon constructive service the court may ascertain the amount due from the garnishee to the defendant, and subject such money to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim." St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Vanderberg, 91 Ark. 252, 120 S. W. 993.

It follows therefore that, as between general creditors and a particular debtor, the one obtaining and first serving a writ of garnishment upon a third party owing the debtor will acquire a prior and paramount lien thereon to the extent of his claim. Interveners' contention, however, is that the garnished fund was a trust fund held for the benefit equally of appellants and interveners, and that appellants could not acquire a paramount lien thereon by virtue of garnishment proceedings. Interveners' contention would be correct if the facts in the case supported the finding and decree of the chancellor. The agreed statement of facts in this particular is as follows:

"It is agreed that the creditors set out herein are due the amounts set opposite their respective names as individuals, and that the said P. C. Ford is due the parties set out herein the sums set opposite their names; that no creditor is in a position to identify the funds garnished; that the sum of $1,888.81 is deposited in the Bank of Jonesboro to the credit of P. C. Ford and the Bank of Jonesboro is indebted to the said P. C. Ford in the sum of $1,888.81."

The agreed statement of facts does not support the finding and decree of the court, nor the contention of interveners that the garnished fund was a trust fund in which all of the creditors were equally interested in proportion to their respective claims. The court therefore erred in ordering the receiver, Ben Eddins, to distribute the fund equally between all creditors who filed their claims prior to October 15, 1918, in proportion to the amount claimed by each. The order should have been to pay appellants' claims in full with any balance over to the interveners equally in proportion to their respective claims.

The decree is therefore reversed and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter a decree distributing the fund in accordance with this opinion.

HESTER v. CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO.
et al. (No. 35.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 7, 1920.)

1. Railroads ⇨103(1) — Notice of defective stock guards essential to recovery for damage to crops.

An owner of a crop cannot recover damages for injuries to the crop by hogs by reason of the fact that defendant railroad's stock guard was in a defective condition, where written notice of the defective condition of the stock guard was not served upon the railroad or its agent, under Kirby's Dig. §§ 6644, 6645, as amended by Acts 1909, No. 53.

2. Railroads ⇨103(1)—Fence law penal and strictly construed.

Sp. & Priv. Acts 1911, No. 447, as amended by Acts 1913, No. 53, requiring railroads to build and maintain fences along their right of way, etc., is a penal statute and must be strictly construed.

3. Railroads ⇨113(4)—Civil action for damages to crops not maintainable against company violating penal statute requiring fencing.

No civil action for damage to crops will lie against a railroad for a violation of Sp. & Priv. Acts 1911, No. 447, as amended by Acts 1913, No. 53, requiring a railroad to build and maintain certain fences and stock guards.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Saline County;
W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by Joe Hester against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Thomas and J. S. Utley, both of Benton, for appellant.

Thos. S. Buzbee, H. T. Harrison, and C. L. Johnson, all of Little Rock, for appellees.

WOOD, J. This action was brought by the appellant against the appellee. The appellant alleged, in substance, that the appellee operated a railroad over 100 miles long in the state of Arkansas and over certain lands in Saline county, Ark., describing them; that in the year 1918 appellant cultivated a crop of corn consisting of 30 acres on the land described; that prior to 1918 the appellee had constructed stock guards on both the east and west sides of the inclosure of the lands at the points where the railroad enters the inclosure, but had negligently failed and refused to maintain said stock guards in a suitable and safe condition; that appellee prior to the year 1918 had erected a fence along each side of its right of way over said lands, but had negligently permitted them to become so out of repair as to not be substantially and sufficiently in condition to keep live stock from passing through and under said fence and into the adjoining lands of the appellant as described in the complaint; that as a result of the negligence of appellee in failing and refusing to keep and maintain said stock guards in a suitable and safe condition, and in negligently permitting said fence to become out of repair as aforesaid, that hogs passed over said stock guards onto appellee's right of way and thence through said right of way fences onto said lands of appellant, destroying his crop and damaging him in the sum of $1,120, for which damages he prayed judgment. The appellee demurred to the complaint on the grounds: First, that the complaint does not allege that written notice had been given the appellee or its agent that the stock guards were in a defective condition. Second, because the allegations of the complaint are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the appellee. The court sustained the demurrer and entered judgment dismissing appellant's complaint. From that judgment is this appeal.

[1] First. The complaint does not state a cause of action under sections 6644 and 6645 of Kirby's Digest, as amended by Act 53 of the Acts of 1909, p. 135, for the reason that the complaint does not allege that the written notice required by the statute had been given. The giving of this notice is a condition precedent to the right of recovery in an action based on that statute. C. R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Adams, 84 Ark. 14, 106 S. W. 200.

[2, 3] Second. The complaint does not state a cause of action under Act 447 of the Acts of 1911, as amended by Act 53 of the Acts of 1913. The statute is as follows:

"Section 1. Every firm, person or corporation owning or operating any railroad over one hundred miles in length, which extends into or through Grant, Hot Spring, or Saline counties, Arkansas, shall be required to build and maintain a fence along each side of their rights of way therein substantially and sufficiently to keep all mules, horses, hogs, sheep, cattle, goats, and stock of all kinds off said rights of way.

"Sec. 2. Said persons, firms or corporations shall provide and maintain gates, with good latches or openings, at least eight feet wide, at all private road crossings, and stock guards at all public road-crossings; and shall also be required to provide open crossings with stock guards every two miles, if there should be no opening or crossing within four miles of each other. No right of way shall be fenced through towns and municipal corporations, and a space of not less than three hundred feet shall be left open at all flag stations thereon.

"Sec. 3. If said railroad right of way fence should contain any gates as herein provided, any persons using same in crossing or entering the said right of way shall be required to close and fasten the gates behind them, and any said person failing to comply with the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction therefor, shall be fined in any sum not less than one dollar and not more than ten dollars for each separate offense."

"Section 4. Any said person, firm or corporation, violating the provisions of this act, shall be fined any sum not less than fifty dollars and not more than five hundred dollars for each offense, and each day shall constitute a separate offense."

This statute is penal. Its violation is a misdemeanor and subjects the offender to a fine. It does not provide any remedy by way of civil action to those who may be damaged by reason of its violation, nor that the penalty may be recovered by any individual nor by the state for the benefit of any individual. Penal statutes are strictly construed; therefore no civil action will lie for damages against the appellee railroad for the violation of the above statute. State v. International Harvester Co., 79 Ark. 517, 98 S. W. 119; Choctaw & Memphis Ry. Co. v. Vosburg, 71 Ark. 232, 72 S. W. 574; St. L., M. & S. E. Ry. Co. v. Busick, 74 Ark. 589, 86 S. W. 674, and other cases in 4 Crawford's Digest, "Statute," § 71, pp. 4694, 4695.

In the cases from Missouri cited and relied upon by counsel for appellant to sustain their contention, the causes of action in those cases were founded upon a statute which expressly made the corporation liable "in double the amount of all damages which shall be done," etc., by reason of its failure to comply with the provisions of the statute. Of course, cases based upon such a statute can have no application here.

The judgment is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

MYERS v. WHEATLEY et al. (No. 391.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. May 10, 1920.
Rehearing Denied June 25, 1920.)

1. Guardian and ward \S 163—Findings on exceptions to account of guardian res judicata in suit to falsify final account.

Findings of the probate court on exceptions by ward to account of her guardian on final settlement are res judicata as to items involved in a suit in equity by the ward against the guardian to surcharge and falsify the guardian's account, the testimony concerning the items being practically the same in both cases, the approval of a final settlement being an adjudication of all matters involved in it.

2. Guardian and ward \S 163 — Finding that ward ratified expenditures res judicata.

Where a ward, after reaching majority, on trial of exceptions to guardian's account, testified that she was willing to pay for anything that she had received from her guardian, and that he should receive credit for whatever he had furnished her, the probate court was justified in finding that she ratified expenditures of all matters in the final settlement to which she made no objection, and she cannot claim, in a suit in equity against the guardian to surcharge and falsify his final account, that allowance of certain credits was erroneous by reason of the ward's minority at the time the expenditures were made.

Appeal from Randolph Chancery Court; Lyman F. Reeder, Chancellor.

Suit by Ethel Alton Myers against J. A. Wheatley and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a decree for plaintiff for only part of the relief demanded, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ethel Alton Myers brought this suit in equity against J. A. Wheatley and United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company to surcharge and falsify the final account current of J. A. Wheatley as her guardian.

It appears from the record that J. A. Wheatley, as guardian of Ethel and Jesse Alton, minors, filed two annual accounts current with the probate court, showing the state of his accounts as guardian of said minors. On January 15, 1919, he filed his third and final settlement in the probate court. Ethel Alton had married a man by the name of Myers, and had become of age at the time the final settlement was filed in the probate court. She filed exceptions to the account of her guardian, and these exceptions were heard upon her testimony, the testimony of her guardian, and his first and second annual accounts.

Ethel Alton Myers testified in the probate court that after she had married she purchased two mules from her guardian for $300, a wagon for $50, and some feed and other things; that she had disposed of all the articles purchased from her guardian before she became of age. These items were embraced in her guardian's second annual account.

Ethel Alton Myers gave her testimony in the present suit and again testified that she had bought these articles from her guardian while she was yet a minor, and had disposed of them before she became of age. She testified that the team was not worth what she paid for it.

On the other hand, her guardian, J. A. Wheatley, testified that after she married she bought the team, wagon, and other things from him to be used by her husband in farming, and that they were worth what she paid for them.

Other testimony will be referred to in the opinion.

The chancellor surcharged the guardian's account as to certain items, and dismissed the complaint of the plaintiff as to the others. The plaintiff has appealed.

J. L. Taylor, of Corning, for appellant.

Jerry Mulloy and E. G. Schoonover, both of Pochontas, for appellees.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). It appears from the record that the item of $300 for the purchase of the mules and the item of $50 for the purchase of the wagon were embraced in the exceptions to the third and final account current of the guardian. The plaintiff, Ethel Alton Myers, was then of age, and filed exceptions to her guardian's account. The guardian and the ward both testified in that proceeding about the same items, and their testimony was practically the same as it is in the present case.

[1] The court found against the ward in favor of the guardian upon the exceptions to his third and final account current. This was a judgment of the court which was conclusive as to these items, and the matter is now res adjudicata. All questions relating to these items were necessarily involved in the exceptions to the final settlement of the guardian in the probate court. The approval of the final settlement was an adjudication of all matters involved in it, and if the ward thought the judgment confirming her guardian's account was erroneous, she should have appealed. Nelson v. Cowling, 77 Ark. 351, 91 S. W. 773, 113 Am. St. Rep. 155; Nelson v. Cowling, 89 Ark. 334, 116 S. W. 890; Beakley v. Cunningham, 112 Ark. 71, 165 S. W. 259; Moore v. Allen, 121 Ark. 335, 181 S. W. 908.

[2] It is also claimed by counsel for the plaintiff that the accounts should be surcharged and falsified because they show that the guardian expended for the maintenance of the ward more than the clear income of the estate, without having previously obtained an order of the probate court therefor, and that the case comes within the rule announced in Campbell v. Clark, 63 Ark. 450, 39 S. W. 262. Therefore counsel claims that the accounts should be restated by giving such credits only as the probate court should have allowed in the first instance, and that the court erred in holding that the guardian might obtain credits exceeding the income of his ward's estate.

As we have already seen, the ward was of age at the time the guardian filed his third and final settlement. She filed exceptions to his account, and strenuously opposed his getting credit for certain items. The record shows that the first and second annual accounts of the guardian were thoroughly gone over in that proceeding. The ward stated in plain terms in that proceeding what items of her guardian's account she objected to. No objection was urged to the account that she was not of age at the time certain items were furnished to her, and that these items exceeded the income of her estate. The items in question were necessities, and she does not complain that she did not receive them.

On the trial of the exceptions she testified that she was willing to pay for anything that she had received from her guardian, and that he should receive credit for whatever he had furnished her.

Under the circumstances, the probate court was justified in finding that she ratified the expenditure of all matters in the final settlement to which she made no objection. It is true that judgments of this sort are not to be extended by mere intendment to matters not necessarily involved in the determination, but it is equally clear that all questions necessarily involved in the inquiry then before the court must be regarded as finally and conclusively settled by the adjudication in that proceeding. In that proceeding the whole state of the accounts between the guardian and the ward was gone into, and the court, after restating the account in certain particulars, confirmed it. The ward being then of age and having filed exceptions as to all items of the first and second annual settlement, the court was justified in finding against him on the point now under consideration. Hudson v. Newton, 83 Ark. 223, 103 S. W. 170.

Counsel for plaintiff places much reliance in the case of Stubblefield v. Stubblefield, 105 Ark. 594, 151 S. W. 994. We do not think that case has any application to the facts in the present case. There the judgment was reversed and the lower court was simply directed to take as a basis for settlement the sum shown to have been due in the guardian's last settlement, unless an affirmative showing should be made that there were notes or other property in his hands not included in that settlement. The very basis of the exceptions to the guardian's final settlement in the probate court as shown by the record in the present case was that the court had erred in allowing certain credits to the guardian.

As we have already seen, testimony was taken as to these items, and they were adjudicated in that proceeding. If the ward thought the judgment of the court was erroneous, she should have taken an appeal.

Therefore the decree will be affirmed.

YAZOO & M. V. R. CO. v. HELENA WHOLESALE GROCERY CO. (No. 38.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 7, 1920.)

1. Pleading \S 248(3)—Change in exhibit to complaint for damage to shipment did not change cause of action.

In an action against railroad for damage to a shipment, where plaintiff was allowed to strike out the word "to" from the exhibit in the nature of an account of the damaged shipment sold, and to insert the word "for," so that the exhibit read "Sold for" the railroad, instead of "Sold to," there was no amendment changing the cause of action and permitting recovery on one different from that pleaded.

2. Principal and agent \S 111(3)—Telegram held to have defined authority of agent relative to damaged shipment.

Telegram to railroad's agent at station from its claim department relative to handling of a damaged shipment of potatoes held to have defined the agent's authority in regard to such shipment.

3. Principal and agent \S 111(3)—Telegram to agent, where damaged shipment refused, assumed liability and agreed to pay.

Telegram of railroad's claim department to its agent at a station relative to a damaged shipment refused by the consignee held to have assumed liability and agreed to pay it, leaving it open to the agent to determine the extent of liability to the best advantage.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Phillips County; J. M. Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Helena Wholesale Grocery Company against the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fink & Dinning, of Helena, for appellant.
R. B. Campbell, of Helena, and Sam Latkin, of Little Rock, for appellee.

SMITH, J. The complaint in this case consists of two counts, in each of which damages to a car of potatoes were claimed. The Helena Wholesale Grocery Company, appellee here, was plaintiff below and was the consignee in both shipments. There was an exhibit to each count of the complaint, and they are identical in form, except as to dates and amounts. Exhibit A reads as follows:

"Helena, Ark., 5/25/16.
"Sold (to) for Y. & M. V. Railroad:
Articles. Weight. Price.
65 bags potatoes hauled to dump. 162½ 1.09 177.13
To labor overhauling 175 bags.....175 .10 17.50
194.62

"Car No. 23312. Initial Soc."

[1] Over the objection of appellant, appellee was allowed to strike out the word "to" and insert the word "for," so that, as a result of that amendment, the exhibit was made to read "Sold for" the railroad, instead of "Sold to" the railroad. Appellant insists that this amendment changed the nature of the cause of action, and permitted a recovery upon a cause of action that was entirely different from the one stated in the complaint. We think, however, that the change was, in fact, an unimportant one, as it is apparent that, without reference to the amendment, the sum sought to be recovered is the damage to a shipment of two cars of potatoes.

The testimony is chiefly directed to the second car, although, according to the testimony offered on appellee's behalf, the two cars were handled under the same direction from a Mr. Howell, who was appellant's agent at Helena, the place of delivery of the two shipments. The amount of damages appears to be undisputed, and the jury returned a verdict on each count for the sum sued for.

As to the first car, it may be said that, according to the testimony on appellee's behalf, Mr. Howell directed appellee to take charge of that car and dispose of the potatoes to the best advantage, and to present a claim for the damage, and that this was done. The instructions to the jury authorized a finding for appellee for both cars, provided there was a finding that the agent of the railroad company had authorized appellee to dispose of the potatoes and that the railroad company's agent was authorized to make that settlement. The railroad company asked no instruction, except one directing a verdict in its favor, and, while the testimony is conflicting, both as to the agent's authority and as to his directions to appellee concerning the shipments, the testimony is legally sufficient to show that the agent possessed the necessary authority and that he exercised it.

It is insisted, however, that as to the second car the jury was not warranted in finding that the agent had made a settlement in regard thereto, for the reason that the undisputed testimony shows that this settlement was made pursuant to a telegram from the general claims department at Chicago. It appears that Mr. White, the president of the grocery company, refused to receive this second shipment, whereupon Mr. Howell wired the claims department in Chicago for instructions, and in response received the following telegram:

"Exchange wires date, ART 10763, potatoes, consignee can't legally abandon shipment, have him take, handle best advantage, submit a claim, wire delivery."

When shown this telegram, White stated that he would handle the car of potatoes, but that he would do so for the railroad company.

[2] We agree with appellant that, whatever may have been the authority of Howell in regard to other shipments, this telegram defined his authority in regard to this second shipment. White admits that he saw this telegram, and he must therefore be held to have known that it measured and defined Howell's authority so far as that shipment was concerned; but it does not follow, on that account, that the judgment as to the second car must be reversed.

[3] The telegram set out above was sent in response to one advising the claims department of the damaged condition of the shipment and of the consignee's refusal to receive it. The purpose of the telegram from the claims department was to insist that appellee could not legally abandon the shipment, but it did not deny liability for the damage then existing. Upon the contrary, the telegram, fairly interpreted, concedes liability and expresses a purpose to discharge it. The consignee was directed to handle the shipment to the best advantage and to submit a claim for such damages as could not be avoided.

This direction to submit a claim would appear to indicate that the railroad company was not questioning its liability for the damages, but desired to investigate only the extent of that liability, and, as we have said, the testimony is undisputed as to the amount of damage. So that if, as we have concluded, the telegram, set out above, assumed liability and agreed to pay it, and the extent of this liability is undisputed, it is unimportant to determine whether the instructions given were applicable to the second car, as well as to the first one.

We conclude, therefore, that there is no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

SKINNER v. STONE. (No. 37.)

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. June 7, 1920.)

1. Frauds, statute of §110(1)—Offer to sell land in county held sufficiently definite.

Where an owner, in reply to an inquiry as to his price on a described 80-acre tract of land in a named county, offered to sell his 120 acres in that county, and it was shown that he owned only one 40-acre tract in addition to the 80-acre tract, the offer sufficiently described the land to comply with the statute.

2. Specific performance §28(2)—Conveyance of fee by warranty deed implied where contract did not specify.

Where the contract provided for the sale of the land without specifying the kind of conveyance, it will be implied that a conveyance of the fee by deed with general warranty was intended.

3. Specific performance §13—Existence of easement known to both, but not mentioned, does not prevent specific performance.

The existence of a railroad right of way on land agreed to be sold, which was known to both parties, does not prevent specific performance of the contract because it failed to mention the easement, since its exception from the conveyance will be implied.

4. Specific performance §94—Request to send deed to bank held not condition which prevented enforcement of contract.

Where purchaser accepted vendor's offer to sell the land for cash, later request in the letter of acceptance that the vendor execute the deed and forward it to a designated bank for delivery on payment of the price was not a condition of acceptance which prevented specific performance of the contract, but was merely a suggestion as to the method of performance.

5. Specific performance §97(3)—If vendor for cash desires money instead of check he must give purchaser opportunity to pay.

Since in ordinary transactions a check or draft is regarded as the equivalent of money, a vendor cannot avoid specific performance of his contract to sell for cash on the ground that the purchaser did not tender payment in money, without giving the purchaser a chance to pay in money after the offer was accepted.

Appeal from Clark Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by Will W. Stone against Lewis Skinner. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Callaway, of Arkadelphia, for appellant.

J. H. & D. H. Crawford, of Arkadelphia, for appellee.

SMITH, J. This is a suit to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain lands in Clark county owned by appellant, Lewis Skinner. The suit is based upon the following correspondence:

"Gurdon, Ark., June 8, 1919.

"Mr. Lewis Skinner, Perryville, Ind.—Dear Sir: I am in the land business here, and will buy either your timber on the east half of the northeast quarter of section 21, township 9 south, range 20 west, Clark county, Arkansas, or I will buy land and timber if you will make me a fair price on it. What do you want for it?

"Very truly yours, Will W. Stone."
"Perryville, Ind., June 28, 1919.

"Mr. Will W. Stone, Gurdon, Ark.—Dear Sir: Your letter received asking for prices on land owned by me in Clark county, Arkansas. I will sell land and timber, 120 acres, for $2,500 cash.

"Yours truly, Lewis Skinner."

"Gurdon, Ark., July 5, 1919.

"Lewis Skinner, R. F. D. No. 1, Perryville, Ind.—Dear Mr. Skinner: Your price for your 120 acres of land near Smithton, Clark county, Arkansas, is rather high, but I am accepting your offer to take $2,500 cash for this land, and am inclosing your deed Arkansas form for you to make deed to Will W. Stone and have acknowledged before a notary public, attach draft to deed and send to the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, Gurdon, Arkansas, and I will take care of same.

"Very truly yours, Will W. Stone."

It will be observed that the first letter was a proposal to buy the timber on the east half, northeast quarter, section 21, township 9 south, range 20 west, or to buy both the land and the timber, and in response appellant proposed to sell 120 acres of land and timber for $2,500 cash. The testimony taken at the trial showed that appellant owned, in addition to the 80 acres above described, a 40-acre tract, making 120 acres, and that he owned no other land in that county, and that the two tracts constituted the land referred to by appellant in his letter as the "land owned by me in Clark county, Arkansas."

It also appears from the testimony that appellant made no response to the letter of July 5th, but, instead, came down to Clark county, and went over his land and made inquiry about its then market value without letting appellee know of his presence in the neighborhood. Finally, when pressed to close the deal in accordance with the correspondence set out above, appellant declined to do so upon the ground that the minds of the parties had not met upon certain essential details. First, as to the kind of deed which should be made, whether quitclaim or warranty. Second, that appellant had previously granted a right of way over a portion of the land to a sawmill company for a railroad, and the parties had not reached an agreement in regard to this easement. It is also urged that appellant knew nothing about the responsibility or solvency of the Merchants' & Farmers' Bank, of Gurdon, Ark., and could not therefore be compelled to accept this bank as his agent in closing the transaction, and that no tender of the purchase money had been made, and that appellee's offer to "take care" of a draft to be attached to the deed could not be treated as a tender. It is also said that the letters set out above do not meet the requirements of the statute of frauds, in that the property to be conveyed is not sufficiently described.

[1] Answering this last insistence first, it may be said that appellant's letter, fairly construed, proposed to sell all the land owned by him in that county, and the testimony shows that to have been 120 acres. Appellee's first letter describes particularly and exactly 80 acres of the land, and the testimony makes the remaining 40 acres equally as certain. Miller v. Dargan, 136 Ark. 237, 206 S. W. 319; Fordyce Lumber Co. v. Wallace, 85 Ark. 1, 107 S. W. 160; Hirschman v. Forehand, 114 Ark. 436, 170 S. W. 98.

[2] Upon the question of the kind of deed contemplated by the parties, this court has held that—

"Where a party agrees to convey land, and there is nothing said as to the nature and extent of the title to be conveyed, nor anything connected with the transaction, going to indicate the particular species of conveyance intended; the law implies a deed in fee simple, and with covenants of general warranty." Holland v. Rogers, 33 Ark. 255; Witter v. Biscoe, 13 Ark. 422.
